age of two hundred years. Large carp will become very tame in ponds where they are regularly fed. Sir John Hawkins says he was assured by a friend of his, that he saw a carp come to the edge of a pond, from being whistled to, by a person who fed it daily. He is a very difficult fish to take, being so remarkably shy, that the greatest nicety must be observed in fishing for him; and the first step to be taken is to throw in plenty of groundbait the day before you intend to commence operations: for this purpose boil two pecks of beans, with four ounces of fine honey, and four grains of musk: let them boil a quarter of an hour, and preserve them to bait; when you use them, take some of these beans, and put them into some river-water to boil; and when they begin to bubble, put the quantity of two small beans of aloe succirrus into the pot, and let it boil a little. When cold, bait the pond, and it will set them a scouring, and make them so hungry that they will bite at anything. The next morning bait your hook with the biggest beans, and let the point of your hook just pierce the skin of them; fish close to the bottom; let your tackle be very fine, and you will have good sport. Another ground-bait is made of bread and bran, worked into a paste, and made into little balls; throw these in the evening before you intend to fish, and by four o'clock be by the water side; approach as cautiously as you can, and keep out of sight as much as possible; bait with a small bright red worm. When you have a bite, give him time; and when you perceive he is sailing away with your bait, strike pretty quickly; and, if he be a large fish, play him well before you attempt to land him, as he is a very strong fish; but, being leather-mouthed, you need not be under any fear of losing him, if he be fairly hooked.

A person who angles for carp must arm himself with abundance of patience. They always keep in the deepest parts of ponds or rivers, where there is but a small running stream: they will seldom bite in cold weather. They not only delight in worms, but in a variety of sweet pastes, of which there is great variety; the crude of honey and sugar, mixed up with fine flour, and minced fine, and a little cotton or white wool, to make it adhere to the hook. If you fish with gentles anoint them with honey, and have your tackle dyed a pale blue. An excellent ground bait, also, is to take a lot of ale grains and mix them well with blood, baiting the ground with them: the bait may be either a gentle, a green pea, paste, or the red worm. The spawn of the carp is exceedingly rich and good, and may be dressed many ways, so as to be a most exquisite sauce: some say it is the finest eating in the world.

THE TENCH.

The Tench is angled for in exactly the same manner as the carp, but does not grow to such a size; five or six pounds being a good size for a tench, though they have been found larger. They spawn in June. They are called the fishes' physician, because the slime which is spread all over them is said to have such healing qualities for wounded fishes; and the pike is said to be so aware of this property that he will not feed upon them.

A DISCIPLE OF ISAAC WALTON.

TRAGICAL AFFAIR.—A lady, still in the prime of life, and retaining considerable beauty, though she had been married ten years, in 1838 deserted her husband, who is a merchant at Nantes, and came to live at Paris with a clerk in a commission-warehouse, with whom she became intimate when visiting Nantes, on business. After a union of four years, the lover felt or pretended to feel a qualm of conscience, and announced a few months ago to his mistress that they must part, as he had determined to form a legitimate alliance with another lady. After some violent struggles, the repudiated woman appeared to be resigned; but a few days ago wrote a letter to her seducer, urging him to pay her a final visit, as she had communications to make of importance to their mutual interests. He went to her apartment, where she renewed her earnest entreaties for a re-establishment of their relations; but, finding him inexorable, she produced a knife which she, in their halcyon days, had given him as a present, but mourned on their parting, and plunged it several times into her breast. The astounded young man called aloud for help, and the neighbours rushed in. To them the jealous woman declared that it was he who had done the deed, pointing at the bloody knife on the floor. The commissary of police was called in, received from the exasperated woman, who appeared to be dying, a calm and deliberate repetition of the charge; upon which the supposed murderer was taken into custody and sent to prison. When, however, on a subsequent day, the officers of the law came to take her examination in the presence of the young clerk, she relented, confessed that it was her own attempt upon her life, and completely exculpated the prisoner, who was thereupon set at liberty. The infatuated woman was taken to the hospital of St. Louis, where she has since expired.—Galignani.

SUPPOSED WRECK OF THE MAGNET SLOOP-OF-WAR.—In the Borsenhalles of the 21st instant appears an account of a vessel having been raised near a place called Oro, and taken into Malmo, which, it is supposed, is the Magnet sloop-of-war, commanded during the war of 1809 by Captain Morris. She mounted two 9-pounders and sixteen 32-pound carronades. From her appearance it is surmised that she has been many years under water. The most curious circumstance is the excellent state of the works of three silver watches found in the cabin, which, it appears, after the inspection of a watchmaker, are capable of being repaired. She is built of oak, copper-fastened, and is represented to be worth the expense of raising her.

FLORICULTURE.

THE DAHLIA.

This flower, named after Dahl, a celebrated Swedish botanist, and which is now so common in our country, is said to have been introduced into England by Lady Holland in 1804. It was first discovered in Mexico, in 1720, by Baron Humboldt, who sent some specimens to the botanical gardens at Madrid, and from thence it was disseminated over Europe. But little attention was paid to it on its first introduction; and up to the year 1820, very slight progress seems to have been made in its cultivation, yet latterly it has risen to such importance, that most beautiful and innumerable varieties have been produced by the florists of this country within the last few years. The soil for dahlias should consist of equal portions of sand and loam; these ought to be mixed with a small quantity of all hotbed, and a little peat. The dahlia may be propagated by seeds, by a division of the roots, or by cuttings from the lower part of the stem; if by the first, they should be sown in a mild hotbed in February or March, and they will be ready for planting out in May. Propagation with the root is by dividing it so that each piece contains an eye, similar to the plan adopted with the potato; but it will be found that in dahlias the eyes are not scattered but concentrated round the collar of the root. When it is attempted to rear a plant by means of cuttings, the cuttings should be stuck in sandy loam with a bottom heat, and protracted by a bell glass: three weeks is sufficient time for the formation of the root, and up to this period the plant must be shaded from the sun. There is a hardness about the full-grown plant to a certain degree, that enables it to bear all the changes of temperature; but this point passed it immediately falls off and never rallies again during the same season. A sharp frost will in one night shrivel up the most healthy flower; this more particularly happens if planted in a low situation.

Observations.—Finish laying picotees as early as possible. The most valuable kind of dahlias may still be propagated; the earth between the morning plants should be loosened. Tulips, lilies, hyacinths, irises, and other hardy bulbs may now be sown in boxes or pans, chrysanthemums should be repotted and kept in a warm situation out of doors; they should be watered when the sun shines on them, as this, though injurious to most flowers, is beneficial to this particular plant. Finish piping pinks, pansies, and all biennials.

MONEY MARKET.

CITY, Wednesday Evening

In foreign stocks and railway shares business was of the most limited description, but quotations were maintained by the firm condition of prices in the English market

Edinburgh and Glasgow railway shares, were quoted 47; ditto, New, 3½. Great Western, 90; ditto, New, 63½; Brighton, 34¾ to ¾; South-Western, 62½; North Midland, 59½; Paris and Rouen, 11½; and Thames Haven, unregistered, 8.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since Saturday the arrivals of English wheat have amounted to 3840 quarters, chiefly from Essex and Kent. On Monday the prices of this article declined from 4s. to 6s. per quarter; and since that day, owing to the fine weather for the harvest, and the thin attendance of buyers, the demand has rated excessively heavy, and the quotations have suffered a further depression of from 1s. to 2s. per quarter, without effecting a clearance. From abroad, 17,960 quarters of wheat have been received, nearly the whole of which has been entered for home consumption. So little has been passing in either free or bonded sorts, that the rates have been almost nominal. Barley and malt have gone off slowly, at barely previous quotations; and the same observation may be applied to beans and peas. From Ireland we have received nearly 15,000 quarters of oats, while the demand for them has ruled extremely slow.

REPRINT.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

This week brings the labours of Parliament to a close, and the members betake themselves to their black game. It will be well in the meanwhile, if the country does not arrive at the conclusion, that they have been playing a black game with the people, at least in two of their most important features of domestic legislation—the re-enactment of the New Poor-law, and the non-enactment of any measure to afford immediate relief to national distress. In these double sins of commission and omission, they have furnished food for Chartist oratory during the recess; and have given colourable cause of agitation to all the desperate grievance-mongers who go about exciting discontent. Whereas, had the Poor-law been rescinded, and the general poverty momentarily relieved, the brawlers of turbulence might have roared their sedition to the winds; and even the immediate and dangerous application of the new Income-tax might have been, under the prospect of a revival of trade and relief of duties by the operation of the new Tariff, comparatively patiently received. As it is, however, we fear that Parliament leaves behind it a terrible and too-deserved amount of public dissatisfaction.

There are, nevertheless, a few domestic measures which demand our general thanks. First and foremost of these is the Mines and Collieries Bill, introduced by Lord Ashley, and considerably damaged in its transition into a law; but still a measure of infinite importance and humanity, and every way honourable to the character of Christian legislation. The promised Slave-trade Abolition Bill is a feature of bright future hope; but as yet it is a promise only, and the same must, for the present, be said of another humane measure—the Insolvent Debtors' Bill, which was almost tantamount to the abolition of imprisonment for debt; but which has been arrested at the close of its career, although its companion, the Bankruptcy Bill, has been hurried into a law with all imaginable rapidity. We regret this defeat of the humane intentions of nearly all the law lords, and indeed, of the majority of the Upper House of legislature, by the dilatory movement of the Commons, who were apparently more occupied with visions of the bird and gun, than with anxiety to bestow a genuine boon of liberty and justice upon an eagerly expectant community. Yet the Bankruptcy Bill—an excellent measure, and running in its progress almost neck and neck with the other—obtains the preference, and will receive the Royal assent. The Insolvent Bill had passed the Lords and two readings in the Commons, and only waited to be committed and read a third time, points which there was abundance of room to have achieved, if the House had employed more, and wasted less, of the time of the country upon personal discussions concerning the bribery and corruption of its members.

Moreover, we are of those who believe that our young and gentle Queen Victoria would have derived a generous and peculiar pleasure from confirming this act, which would have gone so far to spare the feelings, and relieve the misfortunes, of very large classes of her subjects—classes that have been too fearfully extending under the pressures of trade and credit, and under an ill-advised system of persecution, applying itself equally to reverses and to crimes. The new act would have checked swindling, too, most efficiently; and every philanthropist rejoiced in the prospect of its becoming law. There is as much truth as boldness in the assertion, that the law of imprisonment for debt is like a great Inquisition, rife with the most cruel and tantalizing of tortures. It turns the spirits with the screw of a writ; it extorts a confession with a cognovit; it banishes mercy with a judgment; and upon the wheel of an execution it breaks a heart. Prison is not the proper home, either for poor and honest tradesmen, or for poor and honest gentlemen, whom misfortunes have bowed down. Give them as receptacles for rogues and swindlers if you will, and let the law be just and strong enough to enforce true distinction. In a wholesome state of society, not one cruel or vindictive process should be endured.

Another bill has passed, which we regard most favourably, and it has afforded us great pleasure to perceive that among certain members of the House of Commons, a sort of literary festival has this week recorded and celebrated its triumph. We speak of the Authors' Copyright Bill, which will be a fine protection for literary men, and one which those plentiful (though seldom plenty-blest) purveyors of the mental pabulum of the empire so dearly purchase, and so abundantly deserve. Lord Mahon, Sergeant Talfourd, D'Israeli, and other literary gentlemen and members of the legislature, are to be thanked for this genial boon. The literature of England is surely, for its civilising influences, as much entitled to protection as its trade.

The Income-tax and the Tariff have meanwhile both begun their work; the one in the way of technical preparation, the other practically in its effect upon public commerce, and a modified relief of the pressure of duties on food and other articles of domestic consumption. We are glad to be able to record strong proofs of its beneficial tendency in these respects, and to add, that the abundance of the crops very much brightens the prospects of tranquillity during the recess, of which the prorogation of Parliament would otherwise have left us but a cheerless aspect and a gloomy front.

It is right, while glancing at the political deeds of the session, to notice, that the "House of Bribery" vindicated its character to the last. Southampton, Ipswich, Nottingham, &c., all got their writs, in spite of all the evidence, of unfitness to worthily exercise the franchise, against them. There have been fresh elections in several boroughs, and they have all returned candidates of Conservative principles, so that the minister's majority is not on the decrease.

In the contemplation of the parliamentary progress of affairs, the conduct of Sir Robert Peel, as Premier, may deserve some observation. It is right to acknowledge that it has been distinguished by considerable boldness, and marked by the best second-rate ability of statesmanship; and we must all remember that the first and highest order does not exist among us now.

There is some truth then in the moderate remark of the Herald, "that the session of 1842 will be favourably narrated in the political life of Sir Robert Peel; if it have not achieved much for the country, it has at all events established the superiority of the Premier over any other public man; if it have not placed him on a level with Pitt, it has elevated him far above all his contemporaries; if it have not demonstrated him to be a great Minister, it has proved that he is the best the present poverty of our statesmanship can afford; in the midst of surrounding littleness it has brought forth one man taller than the rest."

The drawback even to this praise is that Sir Robert Peel has not the genius to meet, upon enlarged principles, the great exigencies of the country, but he has gone as far towards doing so as his circumstances and his party would allow; and, amid all the elements of divisional opinions and conflicting interests, he has managed to preserve, in the House of Commons, one of the largest and most obedient majorities that ever threw strength and safety about a minister's career. Not even these, however, will maintain him either securely or honourably in power, if he have not an eye to the evil pressure of the great distress that is abroad; and if he do not employ the recess upon the anxious labour of invention in devising expedients for relieving the misery and promoting the happiness of the people. And now—

"Farewell the session, and God bless the Queen."

PROROGATION OF IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

WE cannot select a more favourable opportunity—than during the week of prorogation, and just when the closing or closed labours of Parliament have been made the theme of our retrospective leader—to place before our readers an illustration of that imposing ceremony, as it is performed in the House of Lords by our most gracious Queen in person. The dignified bearing of our beloved Sovereign, upon every occasion on which she has had to meet either her Council or her Parliament, has ever impressed all present with its Queenly character, and borne the stamp of the high courage, energy, and decision which have marked the regal nobility of all her race. On more recent occasions, the interest of these ceremonials has been increased by the presence of her Royal Consort, and the public have flocked with freshened loyalty and eagerness to cheer her progress to and from the House. The prorogation of the present session will, we hope, dismiss the people's representatives to thoughts of something more than rural pleasure and pastime, so that their recall to duty may become ominous of the improvement of the condition of her people in all parts of the land.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—We have received the Paris papers of Tuesday. They announce that the Chamber of Deputies elected M. Las Cases as its fourth secretary on Monday afternoon. M. Las Cases belongs to the Conservative party; so that, with the exception of M. Lacrosse, who is a friend of M. Dufaure, the entire bureau (the whole of the officers) of the House are ministerialists. M. Sauzet, the new President, was afterwards installed with the usual formalities. With the exception of these incidents, and a speech delivered by M. Laffitte when vacating the presidency, which he had exercised as the senior deputy, these journals contain nothing worth noticing. Of this discourse the opinions of the press are various. By some, it is deemed obscure; by others, that it clearly sets forth the speaker's meaning, and unquestionably it conveys that he (M. Laffitte), having been one of the founders of the present dynasty, would give his best support to every measure tending to insure its consolidation. After expressing his personal regret for the death of the Duke of Orleans, M. Laffitte advised all parties to union, in order to secure to France and the new dynasty the guarantees which were still wanting to the respective rights of both. "For my own part," added he, "after having placed at the service of the Revolution and dynasty of July, a popularity acquired by constant devotedness to my country's welfare, I can now do myself the justice to say, that never having deserted the principles or engagements of my whole life, I am to-day what I was yesterday, the sincere friend of the government which we have freely chosen, but with all its conditions of truth, progress, and national dignity. I am certain, gentlemen, of expressing your sentiments as well as mine, when I add, that our duties towards the Crown would be badly understood, if they could make us forget a single day our duties towards France." After M. Laffitte had concluded, M. Sauzet ascended the tribune, gave the President, pro tempore, the usual accolade, and addressed thanks to the assembly for the honour it had conferred upon him in calling him for the fourth time to the presidential chair.

The Regency Bill was presented to the Chamber of Deputies on Tuesday. It consists of five articles founded on general principles, and would experience little or no opposition. It was expected that the Chambers would be prorogued by the 25th inst.

The Journal des Débats announces that Count St. Aulaire, the French Ambassador to the Court of London, has been attacked for some days with a bilious fever, which does not appear to be dangerous, but which retains him in his bed, and retards his return to England.

The funds improved still further on Tuesday, from the increasing confidence in the strength and stability of the ministry.

Accounts from Toulon of the 5th inst. state, that the squadron commanded by Admiral Hugon was on the point of weighing anchor, most of the ships having received clean bills of health on the 4th.

FRANCE.—The election of President of the Chamber of Deputies (as we announced in our 3rd edition last week) terminated more in favour of Ministers than was anticipated. The total number of deputies is 459. Owing to double elections, and other causes, not more than 445 were capable of voting. 429 were present on Friday, including the candidates. The first ballot was as follows:—M. Sauzet, 210 votes; M. Barrot, 133; M. Dufaure, 39; M. Gras Previlli, 22; M. Dupin, 17; M. Berryer, 3. In this M. Sauzet wanted three votes of the absolute majority; consequently it was necessary to have another ballot. The result of this was, than M. Sauzet had 227 votes, M. Dufaure 184, and about 18 lost votes.

M. Sauzet was accordingly declared to be duly elected as President.

In the first ballot, M. Dupin's and M. Salvandy's friends voted against the ministerial candidate. In the second ballot they rallied to it, and secured the majority. This majority may not be personally attached to M. Guizot, but it is evidently firm enough and strong enough, not to allow of his overthrow this session.

"The real forces of the opposition," says the Débats, "are represented by the 131 votes of M. Barrot, with the 25 legitimist votes, and 2 lost. This makes 158 for the opposition, and this number has varied little during the last ten years. The liberal opposition has invariably counted from 150 to 160 votes, and it remains so still."

The opposition prints see things in a different light. They argue that were all the malcontent parties to unite against the ministry they could count but M. Sauzet's 210 votes of the first ballot, whilst his opponents would have a few votes more.

The election for Vice-President took place on Saturday, as follows:—Number of voters, 390, absolute majority, 196. M. Salvandy had 223 votes; M. Bignon, 208; General Jacqueminot, 205. These three, all conservatives, were elected. M. Belleyme, another conservative, had 162 votes; De Tracy, Vivier, Gannernon, in fact, all the candidates of opposition, had about 160 votes.

THE MOORS AND THE FRENCH.—We extract the following from a Gibraltar letter, July 23, in the Herald of Madrid:—"On the evening of the 18th, as some Moorish soldiers were firing at a mark on the seashore, near Tangiers, several sailors of one of the French men-of-war, at anchor before the town, got into their boat and came near to see the exercise. As they approached the land the Moors directed a general discharge against them, but the sailors having no reason to suppose that the guns were loaded with ball, continued to row on. A second discharge, however, proved that the Moors were not firing with blank cartridge, for the sail of the boat was perforated in various places, and one of the men was wounded slightly on the head. They returned to their vessel and reported what had occurred. The inhabitants of the town, on learning the circumstance, were in great alarm, particularly as all the French vessels refused to receive the captain of the port. The next day their uneasiness calmed down on learning that the life of the French sailor was not in danger, and the Moorish authorities had arrested twelve of the perpetrators of this cowardly act, and had promised full reparation."

PARIS, MONDAY.—On Monday afternoon the Chamber of Deputies proceeded to the election of four secretaries. There were 383 deputies present, and the absolute majority was 192. M. Laffitte was in the chair, as the definite bureau is only constituted when it is completed. M. de L'Espee and M. Bassy D'Anglas, conservatives, obtained the absolute majority.

The funds were higher, 70f. 35c. and 118f. 85c. being the closing prices for the account of the Fives and Threes. The rise on Saturday's quotations is 20c. in both. There was much business doing. Bank of France shares 5f. higher; Spanish Stock quite neglected; Neapolitans and Romans higher. Railroad shares, except the Versailles Left Bank, are improving.

SPAIN.—The Madrid mail of the 1st inst. announces that the infante Don Francisco de Paulo and his indefatigably intriguing wife, the Princess Carlotta, and family, had left the capital; and, we learn through Bayonne, that they were expected at St. Sebastian on the 4th.

Mr. Washington Irving, the American Envoy, had presented his credentials to Espartero, at the Palace of Buena Vista. Senor Albuquerque, the Brazilian Minister, had also presented his credentials to the Regent. The official speeches on this occasion had not been published.

The journalists in Madrid had just flattered themselves that they had overcome the difficulties of the printers' strike, when they were threatened with a fresh coalition of the compositors.

By our Barcelona correspondent of the 2nd we learn that fifteen military officers had been sent to Saragossa, to await orders from the Madrid Executive, in consequence of seditious toasts which they had drunk at a dinner of Moderados or Christinos, on the anniversary of Queen Christina's fête day.

According to the Correspondal, the Lisbon Cabinet had given satisfaction to the Spanish Government, relative to the brigands on the frontiers, and the Portuguese authorities had been ordered to offer every assistance in the capture of the robbers, who took advantage of the territory to elude pursuit.

THE OVERLAND MAIL BY GERMANY INSTEAD OF FRANCE.—A letter from Trieste, July 28, in the Augsburgh Gazette, states, that Mr. Waghorn is shortly expected in that town, to organize a service of correspondence for the East India Company by that route. The letter adds, that Trieste is recovering a little from the late commercial crisis. Our Paris letters maintain that the despatches by the Trieste line, could be in London before the Marseilles telegraph despatch could reach Paris. It is of great importance to establish the German line, after the impediments thrown in the way of expresses through France by the post-office.

AMERICA.—The packet-ship North America, Captain Lowber, which sailed from New York on the 19th ult., arrived off Liverpool on Saturday night, after a quick passage of 17 days. She has brought papers four days late than those previously in our possession.

We do not find in any of the papers any precise information with regard to the negotiation between Lord Ashburton and the United States government. The only information is gathered incidentally from a statement in the Bangor Courier, respecting the north-eastern boundary. This journal says, "It is stated here, and is true, that Captain Talcott and his surveying party north of the St. John have been recalled, while the party south of the river will continue their topographical survey. This movement is supposed by some not only to indicate, but almost to prove, that the 'boundary question' has been agreed upon." The Portland Argus, described as a paper likely to be well informed on the subject, says, "No settlement of any of the difficulties has yet been finally agreed upon, but we have no doubt that preliminaries have been arranged, which, if carried into effect, will be satisfactory to Maine. The final result may not be known short of two or three months, but that it will be satisfactory, when known, we have many reasons for believing." And the Journal of Commerce of the 19th ult. thus speaks of the negotiation generally:—"We have abundant reason to believe that the negotiation with England is substantially concluded, and that, if everything is not finally settled in every particular, nothing has been left in any other than a safe and amicable position."

The Tariff Bill, which had been so long before the House of Representatives, passed the House on the 16th ult., by a vote of 116 to 112. The Bill would, it was expected, receive the consent of the Senate by a bare majority of one. Whether, that expectation being fulfilled, it would receive the approbation of the President, was uncertain. The present opinion seemed to be that it would.

A bad feeling prevailed between Mexico and the United States. The President, in pursuance of a call of the House of Representatives, had transmitted to the House the correspondence which had taken place between the governments of the two countries. The tone of the Mexican minister's letter is severely censured. The Americans, ridiculously enough, affect to believe that it was written under English dictation, for the purpose of provoking a quarrel with the United States, while Lord Ashburton was negotiating for the amicable settlement of the disputes between England and America! No material alteration had occurred in the money or stock-market in the interval between the sailing of the Caledonia and the North America. Remittances for the payment of the interest on the Virginia State Stock, arrived at New York on the 15th ult., but too late to be forwarded to London by the Caledonia, from Boston, on the 16th. The exchange on London was quoted at 106½ to 106¾: on Paris, 5f. 40c. to 5f. 40c.

Accounts from Houston, the capital of Texas, had been received to the 4th ult. The Congress met at Houston on the 28th of June. Next day President Houston delivered his message, which was confined principally to a statement of the embarrassed state of the national treasury. The President is for disposing of the public lands as the most prompt way of meeting the financial exigency. After briefly reviewing the incursions of the Mexicans, and his own course relative to the preparations for an offensive war, he submits the whole matter to the discretion of Congress, recommending especially to their favourable notice the national navy.

TURKEY.—CONSTANTINOPLE, July 20.—I announced to you in my letter of the 17th of May, that Izzet Bey, the chamberlain, and Tevfik Bey, the secretary of the Mubein, had been dismissed from office, and that the probable consequence of their disgrace would be the fall of Izzet Mehemet, the Grand Vizier, who was in a great measure dependent upon their influence. The intelligence, though somewhat premature, was substantially correct. Sentence was then passed on these functionaries, though some delay, as usual, occurred in its execution. They are to be replaced by Shefvig Bey and Achmet Bey, and the general impression at the Porte, and among the corps diplomatique, is, that the Topal, or lame Vizier, as Izzet is called by the Turks, having lost his official crutches, will himself speedily succumb. The Beiram, it is thought, will bring some important changes in the Turkish Cabinet. Old Khosref, who had been sitting torpid for upwards of a year in "the corner of retreat," has begun to bestir himself again; all the window-shutters of his palace on the Bosphorus, which had so long excluded the light of Heaven—hateful, it would appear, to the eyes of the ex-Minister—have been suddenly thrown open to admit the sunshine of imperial favour, which, as a matter of course, is to follow the Sultan's forgiveness. It is by some anticipated that he will be named President of the Council, and by others Grand Vizier. A rumour also prevails that Redschid Pacha will be recalled from Paris, and resume his place in the Cabinet. We may, in that case, expect a salutary reaction in favour of liberal and enlightened principles, accompanied with more conciliatory measures in the foreign policy of the Porte. The Prince of Hesse Cassel was last Sunday presented to the Sultan by Serim Effendi, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and was received by his Majesty in the kindest and most distinguished manner. Indeed, since the arrival of the Prince at Constantinople, the greatest attention and respect have been paid to him, apparently to prove that nothing like personal offence was intended by the refusal of the firman for the admission of the ship of war in which he came into the Dardanelles. The Porte is still busied with preparations for hostilities with Persia. The cavalry was shipped three days ago to Samsoun, on the coast of Asia Minor, and the infantry to Syria; it will be marched through Damascus to Bagdad. The despatches received from this quarter through Beyrout, considerably qualify the accounts previously received, as to the extent of the victory claimed by the Turks over the Persians at Suleymaniah. The number killed of the latter is reduced to 25.

THE WAR IN AFRICA.—By a despatch, dated Constantina, July 24, General Negrier informs the Minister of War, that tranquillity at present reigns from one extremity of the provinces to the other. The last operations of General Levasseur had reduced the Kabyles of Sahel. The Kalifa of Medjana, El-Mokrani, with 400 horsemen and 100 of the tirailleurs of Constantina, is going through the tribes of the west that have not been yet visited. He has forced the Kalifa of Abd-el-Kader to take refuge with Ben-Salem, who has himself some idea of submitting to France. The communications between the provinces of Constantina, Algiers, and Tittery are nearly open. El-Mokrani is in hopes of being able to re-establish the great market of Sylah, which has been discontinued these five years.

THE PORTE AND TUNIS.—The Semaphore of Marseilles contains a letter from Tunis, July 21, which says:—"A Turkish frigate has just arrived here, under the escort of an English corvette, having on board an ambassador from the Porte, with the ultimatum of the Grand Seignor. The chief conditions are, that the Bey, in his quality of Pacha of the Ottoman Porte, is immediately to put in execution the treaties with the foreign powers which at present are in force in the Turkish empire. He is to suppress all monopolies of trade, and to reduce the number of regular troops from their present number of 20,000 to 1500, as this number, it is said, is quite sufficient to maintain order in the interior: the Grand Seignor engages to send succours of his own troops in case any foreign attack should take place. Finally, the Bey is to draw up each year an exact state of his expenses and his receipts under the control of an agent of the Porte, so that the surplus over the expenses may be transmitted to Constantinople. As might be expected, the Bey refused to submit to such hard terms, and the ambassador returned as he came."

WEST INDIES.—The Thames West India steamer has arrived, and brings papers with her to the 9th of July from Jamaica; 1st, from Demerara; 2nd, from Barbadoes; 24th of June, from Trinidad; 30th, from St. Lucia; and from other islands to corresponding dates.

The only fact to be gleaned from the Jamaica journals is, that the crops are likely to prove more propitious, and the produce of those already manufactured was sufficient to freight nearly twenty vessels which were in port at Falmouth. One vessel, it is stated, had taken in as much as 900 hogsheads of sugar.

The political movements in the Demerara legislature occupied the attention of the public, but they are not of a character to excite any interest. The question had even, which had threatened serious results to the planters, had abated.

At Trinidad, and other of the islands, the news of the recent attempt upon the life of her Majesty, with the life of the culprit, and the facts connected with the case, absorbed a good deal of notice. The progress of Trinidad as an agricultural colony is spoken of in the papers as being most satisfactory. The governor of this island, it is stated, is about to visit Europe for the benefit of his health.

Intermediate dates from the islands of St. Vincent, Antigua, and St. Lucia, have also arrived. Several shocks of earthquakes had been felt at Antigua, and one also at Barbadoes, and these were about the middle of the month of June. So it would appear that the symptoms of these awful visitations, which have worked such disastrous effects at St. Domingo, have been experienced and feared on the coasts of the British possessions in the West Indies.

HANOVER.—The Crown Prince celebrated the ceremony of his betrothal with the Princess Mary of Saxe Altenburg on the 20th ult., and returned immediately afterwards to Hanover. The King is drinking the waters at Ems. At the conclusion of the session of the Estates the King confirmed the vote of the Chambers for presenting the sufferers by the fire at Hamburgh with 100,000 dollars.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS, FRIDAY.

The royal assent was given by commission to several bills;—there lordships were engaged in detail business, of forwarding other bills a stage, and adjourned at five till Saturday at two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, FRIDAY.

MR. LEFROY gave notice that he should, on Monday, move a new writ for Ipswich.—The house went into committee on the Newfoundland Bill, and after some opposition from MR. O'CONNELL and MR. HUME, who divided the house four times, the bill passed in the committee, and the house resumed.—MR. O'CONNELL then moved for some papers as connected with the late trials for ribbonism in Armagh. Lord ELIOT did not oppose the motion generally, but could not give all the papers.—MR. O'CONNELL divided the house; and the papers were refused by a majority of 18. The County Courts Bill went through committee pro forma.—Several petitions were presented respecting the wine trade.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply to MR. K. YORKE, said, it never could have been that sufficient time had not been allowed to fill up the Income-tax returns, Government would allow a proper time, and afford every facility. He had also been asked if two papers were left, was it necessary to fill up both? If a gentleman resided in two places, the one his place of business, the other a country residence, in that case it would be necessary to fill up each paper, and deliver them properly, as they would be different persons.—MR. BERNAL asked whether the statement was authentic that the Government of India had ordered the withdrawal of the troops from Affghanistan?—SIR R. PEEL said he understood despatches had just been received, but he had not yet had an opportunity of reading them. He had received the letter stating that they had arrived since he came into the house. The house then passed to the order of the day, on the third reading of the Ecclesiastical Corporation Treasury Bill.—After some opposition to the order of the day, the house went into committee on the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Bill.—The clauses were agreed to up to the 88th, when the Chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again to-morrow (Saturday).—MR. MASTERMAN moved a resolution in favour of the wine-merchants' petition, but withdrew it after some discussion. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS, SATURDAY.

Their lordships met at two o'clock, when several private bills were advanced a stage; and some public ones forwarded. A message from the Commons brought up several bills, which were considered; and their lordships adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY.

Some bills were read a third time and passed. Another division on the Newfoundland Bill took place, by MR. B. WALL moving it be read a third time that day three months: on the division, the third reading was carried by 64 against 21. The house then took into consideration the amendments of the Lords on the Mines and Collieries Bill. Lord ASHLEY expressed his poignant regret that their lordships had made the amendments they had: but said he was compelled to accept them, rather than lose the bill, which affirmed the principle of not being obliged to sacrifice the children to save the women. The house generally expressed regret at the lords' amendments; even SIR R. PEEL (who defended the House of Lords from some observations made on them), said he regretted some of the alterations.—The house agreed to the whole of the amendments.—Lord PALMERSTON moved for copies of all "correspondence connected with the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds," which was agreed to. Adjourned to Monday at twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS, MONDAY

In the House of Lords several bills were advanced a stage. Earl FORTESCUE moved for returns of outrages reported to the Irish constabulary, of which, he said, there had been a fearful increase, from which his lordship inferred that there had been some recent change in the manner in which justice was administered. His lordship then referred to the late trials of Ribbonmen at Armagh, and condemned in severe terms the employment of spies.—The Duke of WELLINGTON acceded to the motion, but ascribed the increase of reported outrages to the greater vigilance and efficiency of the police. The noble duke eulogised the character of the Lord Chief Justice. The person described as a spy had not been employed by the magistrates to allure persons to the commission of crime. The charge had been advanced by the counsel for the defence, but abandoned during the trial. The testimony of the approver had been corroborated by unimpeachable witnesses, whose evidence left no doubt of the guilt of the prisoners.—After a few words from the Marquis of Clanricarde and the Earl of Wicklow, the Earl of GLENGALL said that the apparent diminution of outrages during the administration of the noble earl was delusive. He had repeatedly warned their lordships that it would not last, and that the seeds of sedition had been sown, which would soon bring forth their fruits. The noble earl gave detailed statements in support of this view of the subject.—Lord FITZGERALD said only rose to express his conviction that the inquiry which the noble duke had assured them had been instituted by the Irish Government would be fairly conducted. The motion was then agreed to.—The Earl of HADDINGTON having presented some petitions, took the opportunity of replying to a question put to him some days ago by a noble marquis: "It was not the intention of Government to make an alteration in the line of packets between Donaghadee and Port Patrick."—The Lord CHANCELLOR brought up the report of the select committee, to which the bill on the law of marriage in Ireland had been referred, and in pursuance of its recommendations moved that the bill be referred on Tuesday, to a committee of their lordships' house, with a view to its becoming law during the present session. The present unsettled state of the law was productive of great inconvenience and demoralization to society. After some remarks from Lord Campbell, Lord Brougham, the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Clanricarde, and the Earl of Wicklow, the motion was agreed to.—Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The House of Commons sat at twelve o'clock.—Lord STANLEY moved the third reading of the Newfoundland Bill.—Mr. J. E. HOWARD moved, pursuant to notice, that the bill be read a third time that day three months.—Mr. B. W. HALL seconded the amendment.—The House divided.—For the third reading, 85; against it, 12; majority for the third reading, 43. The bill was then read a third time and passed. Mr. Walter took the oaths and his seat for Nottingham. The hon. member was conducted to the table by Sir R. H. Inglis. The House resolved itself into committee on the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Bill.—On clause 49 being proposed, Mr. B. WOOD moved an amendment to render the joint receipt of the official and trade assignees necessary in small greater in amount than the security given by the former.

After a protracted discussion the committee divided.—For the clause, 59; for the amendment, 16; majority, 35.—On the suggestion of Sir T. WILDE the words permitting certificated special pleaders to be commissioners, and compounders also to be expunged. The other clauses of the bill were agreed to, several amendments having been proposed and negatived by considerable majorities. In reply to Captain FITZROY, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that it was not the intention of the Income-tax Act that the tax should be deducted from the dividends on foreign stocks payable in this country, unless when the parties entitled to receive them were inhabitants of Great Britain.—On the motion of Sir J. GRAHAM, the Boroughs Incorporation Bill passed through its various stages, the standing orders being suspended for that purpose.—In reply to questions from Lord PALMERSTON as to the reported order of the Governor General of India for the withdrawal of the British troops from Affghanistan, Sir R. PEEL gave very strong reasons for withholding the information, and said, "Candahar and Jellalabad may at this moment be the scene of military operations. The death of Shah Soojah has placed the country in a new position with respect to the treaty contracted by Lord Auckland. The relations in which we stand are therefore also to his death made the subject of diplomatic communications. I must, therefore, decline answering any questions as to the instructions that have been given, or the views which are entertained. The facts as to some things actually stand. I have no objection to state. At this moment our troops occupy Candahar. I have reason to believe they also occupy Jellalabad, and have at present no probability of their immediate retirement. That is all the information which, consistent with my sense of duty, I can now give. The British troops occupy these places, and, considering the accounts that may arrive in the next mail, the house, I am sure, will not press me for further information." The statement of the premier was received with loud cheers. Sir R. Peel brought up the report of the North Western American Boundary, which was ordered to be on the table of the house.—Mr. LEFROY rose, pursuant to notice, to move that the Speaker be directed to issue his warrant for the election of a member for the borough of Ipswich.—Mr. H. STEWART seconded the motion.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE moved, as an amendment, for leave to bring in a bill to reenact certain individuals from voting at elections to serve in Parliament, and for preventing bribery and corruption at the election of members to serve in Parliament for the borough of Ipswich.—Mr. BLACKSTONE supported the original motion. Mr. FITZROY also supported it, and arraigned the report of the committee as most unfair. Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL defended the committee, and supported the amendment.—Mr. P. M. STEWART vindicated the conduct of the committee. His position as its chairman had been a most painful one, as it imposed upon him the duty of voting to unseat his most intimate private friend. Mr. Gladstone.—After some further discussion, in which Mr. H. Stuart, Mr. Lefroy, Mr. Williams, the Attorney-General, Mr. C. Buller, Mr. Darby, and Mr. Wyse took part, Sir R. PEEL opposed the amendment, on the ground that the house could not pass a bill of pains and penalties without giving the parties affected an opportunity of being heard at the bar of both houses of Parliament, that a great length of time must necessarily be consumed in this process; and that it would be manifestly unjust to suspend the franchise of a large constituency on account of the offence of a small number of individuals. After a few words from Mr. P. M. Stewart and Mr. Tufnell, the house divided.—For issuing the writ, 86; for the amendment, 32; majority, 54.—The original motion was then agreed to.

Sir R. PEEL obtained leave to introduce a bill to repeal so much of the act of 1809 as respected the slave trade carried on under the flag of Portugal. He moved that the house should allow the bill to be read a first and second time that evening. After a few words from Captain Pechell, the motion was agreed to.—The house then adjourned at half-past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The business in this house consisted chiefly of private bills through the necessary stages, preparatory to the close of the session. The Newfoundland Bill and the Marriage Law of Ireland Bill were the most important of those that were advanced to their respective stages.—The Portuguese Slave Trade Act Repeal Bill was read a first time, on the motion of the Earl of ABERDEEN. Their lordships adjourned till ten o'clock on Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The report of the committee on the Bankruptcy Bill was received, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time on Wednesday.—Sir J. GRAHAM postponed, in expressions of reluctance and regret, the County Courts Bill, to the next session of Parliament. After some further conversation, the bill was passed through committee pro forma, reported to the house, and the report ordered to be received.—The clerk at the table [illegible] that a bill had been forwarded to the house from the House of Lords, intituled "An act [illegible] granting certain elections to be declared null and void."—The house then adjourned till five o'clock. The house having resumed, Sir R. PEEL gave notice that on Wednesday he should move the adjournment of the house until Friday, the 13th instant. In reply to a question from Mr. C. Buller as to the intentions of Government with respect to the members of the reconstituted Exchequer bills, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said "that the result of a cursory perusal of the commissioners' report, and of the evidence upon which it was founded, was to produce upon his mind a very general impression; in fact, left that on the consideration of the circumstances stated in that report, that undoubtedly there existed an equitable claim on the part of some of the holders of these Exchequer bills, on the consideration of the Government—and it would be the duty of the responsible advisers of the country to allow to the house such measures as they might think necessary to afford relief to such persons as might be entitled to their consideration. There were other parties to whose cases further consideration must be given, and it was evident that there was a considerable difference between the several cases which had been investigated by the committee." The right hon. gentleman then proceeded to hint the impossibility of devising the precautions which had arisen during the present session; and thus it must be admitted is lamentable, for it may produce many innocent holders in reference to their commercial transactions and commercial credit, the worst effects of direct and absolute robbery. Mr. HUME brought under the notice of the house the case of a gentleman who had been liberated on paying a fine, after the court had tried him had sentenced him to three months' imprisonment for a brutal assault upon the servant girl at his lodgings. Sir J. GRAHAM vindicated the Recorder of London, who acted upon the representation of Mr. Serjeant Adams, the judge who had tried the case, and stated several circumstances which it is unnecessary to repeat here, tending to show that the opinions of the learned serjeant were well founded.—Sir R. PEEL, after an eloquent tribute to the public services of three officers, moved, "That the house resolve itself into a committee of the whole house to consider of an address to the crown to erect monuments to the memory of Lord Exmouth, Lord De Saumarez, and Sir Sydney Smith."—Mr. HAWES suggested the propriety of giving public monuments to men for civil and scientific services, such as those of Herschell, Watt, and Davy.—The motion was supported with true eloquence by Sir J. COCKBURN.—After several speakers had been heard, the house went into committee, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to, and the report was ordered to be received on Wednesday. The Coventry Boundaries Bill was read a third time and passed, on the motion of Sir J. GRAHAM, after a division on the amendment of Sir C. DOUGLAS, that it be read a third time that day three months.—On this division the numbers were.—For the third reading, 47; for the amendment, 3; majority for the third reading, 44.—The report of the Limitations of Actions (Ireland) Bill was brought up and agreed to, notwithstanding the opposition of Mr. Hawes and Mr. Hume, who divided with only 19 to 41.—The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

In the House of Lords the business was confined to giving the royal assent by commission to various bills, and of announcing the bills before the house in their respective stages.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at twelve o'clock.—Mr. Muldmay and Mr. Hope took the oaths and their seats for Southampton, amidst loud cheers from the ministerial benches. The hon. members were introduced by Mr. Fleming and Sir T. Fremantle.—On the motion of Sir J. GRAHAM, the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Bill was read a third time. The bill was then passed. The Lords' Amendments in the Diocese of St. Asaph and Bangor Bill, and the Colonial Passengers Bill, were read and agreed to. On the motion for reading the Insolvent Debtors' Bill a third time, Mr. T. S. DUNCOMBE rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the house, and to ask a question of the right hon. baronet, Sir J. Graham, relative to the petition of William Gellen, presented on the 4th of August, complaining of the general bad management of the Milbank Penitentiary. If what was stated in the petition was correct, instances of the greatest possible cruelty had been practised by the officers of the Milbank Penitentiary. At all events, the subject was one which required the most strict and searching investigation. The hon. member then complained that the noblemen and gentlemen who had been appointed inspectors; and also whether he intended to recommend that a medical man should be constantly resident in the Penitentiary and the new Model Prison?—Sir J. GRAHAM strongly defended the appointment of the committee of management of the New Model Prison. A better and more effective selection of members could not possibly be made. There could not be an objection to any one member of that committee, and he had no doubt they would most efficiently perform the duties assigned to them. He now had to remark on the management of the Milbank Penitentiary. The hon. gentleman had brought forward several cases of alleged hardships, but the house must recollect that the evidence in support of them was that of a discarded servant. In the course of last year there was an epidemic disease in the prison, which proved fatal in several cases; but every precaution was used, the rules were relaxed, and a nourishing diet instituted. At the same time he (Sir J. Graham) thought in some instances the conduct of the officers was not altogether justifiable. On the whole, he thought the institution well managed, and, from the evidence, it did not appear to be unhealthy. In reply to the hon. member for Finsbury, that the attention would always be directed to the management of the prison by those gentlemen under whose superintendence it was.—Mr. HUME said the Milbank Penitentiary was a disgrace to the nineteenth century, and supposed that the government of prisons should be entrusted to committees.—Mr. GREENE, one of the committee of management of the Milbank Penitentiary, wished to say that he always understood the Secretary of State to be the sole governor. He made all appointments, and all complaints were reported to and adjudicated by him. The greatest pains were taken to see the rules of the prison properly and strictly administered.—After a short discussion, in which Mr Ewart, Mr. Aglionby, and Mr. Hawes joined, Sir J. GRAHAM said he rose to order. The debate was quite irregular. The order before the house was the third reading of the Insolvent Debtors' Bill, and they had opened the debate on another subject, which might last for hours.—The SPEAKER said, the right hon. baronet was quite right in what he stated; the house was proceeding contrary to one of its standing rules. When an order of the day was read, the rule was that no other subject should be discussed until that order was disposed of. After a few observations from Sir I. Wilde, Mr. Greene, and Mr. T. Duncombe, the discussion dropped. The Insolvent Debtors' Bill was then read a third time and passed.—The report on the address to her Majesty, to direct that monuments be erected to the memory of Lord Exmouth, Lord De Saumarez, and Sir Sydney Smith, was brought up and agreed to. On the motion of Mr. Aglionby, a return was ordered of the public expense of the colony of New Zealand.—The house adjourned at a quarter past two, and resumed at five o'clock.—In reply to Mr. Wyse, Lord Eliot stated that it was the intention of Government to introduce an Irish Registration Bill next session. The noble lord took that opportunity of stating that the magistrates had exonerated themselves from the charge of having employed Hagan, the witness at the late trial of Ribbonmen at Armagh, as a spy.—Lord PALMERSTON, in moving for the return of Lord Exmouth, Lord De Saumarez, and Sir Sydney Smith, took occasion to review the whole conduct of the present Administration since it came into power, the leading object of the noble lord being to injure the government of Sir R. Peel, by showing that its principle of policy very closely resembled those of its predecessors in office. Sir R. PEEL replied. He adverted to the various topics of accusation introduced by the noble lord, and concluded with the Parliament for the house.—"Sir, I feel conscious of adhering to the same principles of commercial reform of which I long since expressed approval. I aided Mr. Huskisson in the practical maintenance of these principles. My opinions on the subject of the Navigation Law I stated in 1835 and 1840. And, again, in 1841, when, as a Minister of the Crown, I was taunted with being the instrument of an aristocracy determined on resisting commercial reform, I stated the principles which I wished to retain office. I said then that for the sacrifice of private ease, and even the consolidating enjoyment, the reward I looked for was different from that sought for by the man who would sacrifice his principles. Unless I am at perfect liberty to propose such measures as I conceive to be conducive to the public welfare. But I have another hope—another gratifying consolation, that however much I may have occasionally displeased and disappointed some of my hon. friends however much I may be the object of rebuke in the private parties to which the noble lord has access, but to which I have not, that I have still enough, through your struggle, the same demonstrations of unvarying confidence, and almost unvarying support, which cheered and animated us in the blank regions of opposition."—After some brief remarks from several members, the house was agreed to.—Sir J. GRAHAM obtained leave to bring in a bill for the regulation of elections in England and Wales; and announced his intention to proceed with the bill early in the next session.—The house then adjourned till Friday at half-past eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

On the motion of the Earl of RIPON, the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill, the Exchequer-bills Bill, the Slave Trade (Portuguese Vessels) Bill, the Borough Improvement Bill, the Coventry Boundary Bill, and the Manchester, Birmingham, and Bolton Bill, were severally read a third time and passed.—On the motion that the Newfoundland Bill be read a third time, counsel were ordered to be called in. Mr. Burge then appeared at the bar, and was heard at some length against that clause of the bill (the sixth) by which the Legislative Council and the House of Representatives were to be fused into one assembly.—When the counsel had finished and withdrew, the bill was read a third time.—On the question that it do pass, Lord CAMPBELL moved the omission of the sixth clause. The power of the combined chamber would swamp the popular portion, and make it a mere instrument of registering the decrees of the Governor. The Earl of RIPON said, that this was a temporary measure, and that as it was to be kept that time it expired, the necessity for it would cease. It was introduced to meet a particular evil.—The amendment was negatived, and the bill then passed.

Lord BROUGHAM, adverting to a report to the bankruptcy law a few nights ago, remarked that there was another bill (the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Bill) which he had presented at the same time, and which, he regretted to say, had passed both Houses of Parliament, and it was due to her Majesty's Government that he should, in his own name, express to them the great gratitude he felt for the hearty, steady, and most efficient support they had afforded to this most complicated measure of the law; that he should express not only his own heartfelt gratitude for the advantages thus secured by her Majesty's Government by their support of this measure, but the gratitude of the immense persons who were the objects of it, and of the creditors of those unfortunate persons. Having always, in his humble sphere, and according to the measure of his power, done his utmost to further the noble object of the law, he felt he could not have been doing his duty if he had suffered the present occasion to pass without declaring his heartfelt gratitude to the Government for their support of these measures, and his anxious hope that they efforts in the same cause might be still more fortunate next session. Much had already been done, and that to him was an incitement to hope and trust that still more would hereafter be accomplished. (Cheers, "hear, hear," from the Lord Chancellor.) Their lordships then adjourned till twelve o'clock on Friday.

THE LORD ADVOCATE.—We regret to learn that Sir William Rae, Lord Advocate of Scotland, is confined at his seat, Eskgrove, near Edinburgh, by severe indisposition, so severe that it is doubtful whether he will ever be able to resume his official duties.—Scotch Reformers' Gazette.

NOTTINGHAM ELECTION.—The returning officer made the official declaration on Saturday. The numbers were announced to be—for Mr. Walter, 1835; for Mr. Sturge, 1801; majority, 84. The warrants against Mr. Frearson and Mr. Feargus O'Connor will not be followed up. A petition against the return has been already drawn up, and will be presented before Parliament separates.

ST. MARTIN'S-IN-THE-FIELDS.—Operations for rebuilding the spire of this church, which suffered so much during the late storm, were commenced on Saturday last. Several workmen were employed during the day in conveying the scaffolding, &c., on to the premises, and it is expected that the rebuilding and necessary repairs will occupy at least three or four months. In consequence of the alarm expressed by the neighbourhood and the pew renters, as to the present safety of the church, the services have been suspended until further notice, the duration of which, however, will not be affected by the repairs which the spire will have to undergo.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, August 7.—REPRESENTATION OF TRINITY COLLEGE. An active canvass for the representation of the Dublin University has been entered on by a committee (of which Dr. Wall is one of the secretaries), on the part of Mr. Longfield, and by Mr. George Alexander Hamilton, on his own behalf, on the presumption of Mr. Solicitor-General Jackson being elevated to the vacancy on the bench, caused by judge Foster's death. Mr. Longfield's committee have issued a circular to the electors, in which exception is taken to Mr. Hamilton, on the ground that he has not received his education in the university.

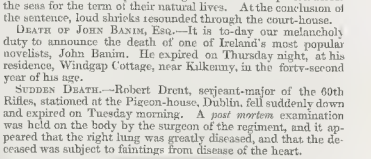
REPRESENTATION OF COLERAINE.—A Belfast paper (the Northern Whig) gives the following paragraph:—"A correspondent from Coleraine informs us it is understood there will shortly be a new election there, in consequence of Mr. Litton's expected appointment to office as Solicitor General. Our correspondent states that a large portion of the electors have strong reasons to be dissatisfied with Mr. Litton, and 'that a gentleman of high standing intends to enter the field on Liberal grounds.' We trust that the Liberals of Coleraine will bestir themselves on this occasion."

BELFAST ELECTION.—The writ for holding the election arrived in Belfast on Thursday, but it is thought the election will not take place till Monday the 15th. On the Liberal side, Mr. Ross, of Rosstrevor, has addressed the electors, and placards have been posted through the town, calling on the Reformers to keep themselves unpledged, as a second Liberal candidate (said to be Mr. Shafto Adair) will offer himself. Addresses have also appeared from Mr. Emerson Tennent (who again notices the strong proof he has given of his attachment to the government, by his acceptance of office), and Lord Hamilton Chichester. His lordship says, he offers himself "professing the principles upon which the present administration has formed its basis." The general opinion is that Mr. Ross and Mr Emerson Tennent will be elected.

CORK ASSIZES, Friday, Aug. 5.—TRIAL OF THE VITRIOL THROWERS.—Judge Ball took his seat on the bench at half-past nine o'clock, shortly after which Daniel Lonergan, John Drew, Daniel Sullivan, and Timothy Herlihy were placed on their trial, for an assault upon Mr. John Wilson, proprietor of the patent saw mills, and casting upon him a quantity of oil of vitriol, to maim or do him grievous bodily harm.—The case for the prosecution having closed, Mr. Freeman, Queen's counsel, addressed the jury for the prisoners. Judge Ball having charged the jury at considerable length, and with much minuteness; they retired, and after remaining in for about twenty-five minutes, returned a verdict of Guilty against the four prisoners.—His lordship then proceeded to pass sentence upon them, and after addressing them in feeling and impressive terms upon the enormity of their offence, he concluded by sentencing them to be transported across the seas for the term of their natural lives. At the conclusion of the sentence, loud shrieks resounded through the court-house.

DEATH OF JOHN BANIM, Esq.—It is to-day our melancholy duty to announce the death of one of Ireland's most popular novelists, John Banim. He expired on Thursday night, at his residence, Windgap Cottage, near Kilkenny, in the forty-second year of his age.

SUDDEN DEATH.—Robert Drent, serjeant-major of the 60th Rifles, stationed at the Pigeon-house, Dublin, fell suddenly down and expired on Tuesday morning. A post mortem examination was held on the body by the surgeon of the regiment, and it appeared that the right lung was greatly diseased, and that the deceased was subject to faintings from disease of the heart.



THE THEATRES.

THE SURREY THEATRE.

A new opera entitled The Little Red Riding Hood, was produced here on Monday night, before a very crowded house, and went off with entire and unequivocal success. The libretto is neatly written, and the plot pretty, though simple. The music is of the Italian school, and is lively and sparkling throughout. From the overture to the finale we were carried along on one uninterrupted stream of harmonious sounds. There are two or three sweet ballads which we predict will become decided public favourites. The opera is the production of a lady, to whose musical genius it does infinite credit. The music was delightfully sung by Harrison, Leffler, Miss Romer, and Mrs. Searle; the choruses were well managed and the mise en scene perfect. The manner in which this opera is produced and played is worthy of the highest praise. Of the Memoirs of the Devil, an adaptation from the French, we can say little; it should have been compressed into a one-act piece.

THE DOG SMUGGLERS.—The contraband trade carried on by dogs on the frontier of France next to Belgium, says the Constitutionnel, continues to increase in extent and activity. The number of dogs thus employed is estimated at 80,000. A premium is given for the destruction of each of the quadruped smugglers, and immense numbers have fallen victims to the measure; but they are immediately replaced by others. Their homes are in France, where they are well fed and kindly treated, and their education consists in sending them from time to time into Belgium, where they are nearly starved, and severely flogged by men dressed as French Custom-house officers; so that they have the uniform in horror, and in the course homeward carefully avoid it, taking a circuitous route as soon as they catch sight of it. When they are let loose to return home, laded with a burden of from five to six kilogrammes of merchandise, they proceed with rapidity, and they are sure of good treatment on their arrival.

PHILOSOPHY OF HEAT.—"Well, my little fellow," said a certain principal to a sucking philosopher, whose mamma had been teasing the learned knight to test the astonishing abilities of her son "What are the properties of heat?" "The chief property of heat is, that it expands bodies, while cold contracts them." "Very good, indeed; can you give me a familiar example?" "Yes, sir; in summer, when it is hot, the day is long; while, in winter, when it is cold, it becomes very short." The learned knight stopped his examination, and was lost in amazement that so familiar an instance should have so long escaped his own observation.

NAPOLEON'S WILLOW.—It is not generally known that there is a very fine tree growing in the neighbourhood of Croydon, a scion from the willow which drooped over the grave of the hero of Austerlitz and Marengo. It was brought from St. Helena, upwards of 15 years ago, by a gentleman on board the General Harris East Indiaman. The tree is a handsome one, and has grown so rapidly, that although, when first planted, it was not the size of "a grey goose quil," it now measures at least 4 feet in girth, and is 30 feet high, with wide spreading branches of proportionate dimensions.

LORD MORPETH AT NIAGARA.

Lord Morpeth, while at Niagara, wrote the following lines in the "Guide Book;" and it is due to his lordship to add, that the effusion is much copied and admired in the United States:—

There's nothing great or bright, thou glorious Fall!
Thou may'st not to the fancy's sense recall—
The thunder-riven cloud, the lightning's leap,
The stirring of the chambers of the deep.
Earth's emerald green and many-tinted dyes,
The fleecy whiteness of the upper skies,
The tread of armies thick'ning as they come,
The boom of cannon, and the beat of drum,
The brow of beauty, and the form of grace,
The passion and the prowess of our race,
The song of Homer in its loftiest hour,
The unresisted sweep of Roman power,
Britannia's trident on the azure sea,
America's young shout of liberty!
Oh! may the wars that madden in thy deeps
There spend their rage, nor climb th' encircling steeps;
And till the conflict of thy surges cease,
The nations on thy banks repose in peace!

DECREES OF HAPPINESS.

If you wish to be happy for a day, get well shaved; if for a week, get invited to a wedding; if for a month, buy a good nag; if for half a year, buy a handsome house; if for a year, marry a handsome wife; if for two years, take holy orders; but if you would be always gay and cheerful, practise temperance.

SOCIAL INFLUENCE OF WOMEN.

Unless our women be brought up in modesty, and with industrious and religious habits, it is vain that we educate the men. It is they who keep the character of men at its proper elevation.

Zeno being told that love was unbecoming a philosopher: "If this be true," replied Zeno, "the fate of the fair sex would be lamentable, not to be loved but by fools."

A physician, passing by a stone-mason's, bawled out to him:—"Good morning, Mr. W——, hard at work, I see; you finish your gravestones as far as 'In memory of,' and then you wait, I suppose, to see who wants a monument next?" "Why, yes," replied the old man, resting for a moment on his mallet, "unless somebody is sick, and you are doctoring him, and then I keep right on!"

A LIE.

"A great lie," says the poet Crabbe, "is like a great fish on dry land; it may fret and fling, and make a frightful bother, but it cannot hurt you. You have to keep still, and it will die of itself."

BOOKS.

In the best books, great men talk to us, give us their most precious thoughts, and pour their soul into ours. God be thanked for books! They are the voices of the distant and the dead, and make us heirs of the spiritual life of past ages. Books are the true levellers. No matter how poor I am; no matter though the prosperous of my own time will not enter my obscure dwelling; if the sacred writers will enter and take up their abode under my roof—if Milton will cross my threshold and sing to me of Paradise—and Shakspere to open to me the worlds of imagination and the workings of the human heart—and Franklin to enrich me with his practical wisdom—I shall not pine for want of intellectual companionship, and I may become a cultivated man, though excluded from what is called the "best society," in the place where I live.—Dr. Channing.

TASSO'S CURE FOR SPEAKING ILL.

The character of Tasso has obtained the highest praise. It is said of him, that there never was a scholar more humble, a wit more devout, or a man more amiable in society. Some person reported to him, that a malicious enemy spoke ill of him to all the world. "Let him persevere," said Tasso; "his rancour gives me no pain. How much better is it that he should speak ill of me to all the world, than all the world should speak ill of me to him."

Schoolmaster—"Robert, compare the adjective cold." Robert—"Positive, cold; comparative, cough; superlative, coffin"

THE VALUE OF THE RIVER THAMES.

Fuller justly says, in his "Worthies of England," that London owes its grandeur and opulence, under God's Providence, to the well-conditioned river Thames, which employs its greatness in goodness—to be beneficial to commerce by the reciprocation of the sides. Hence it was, that when King James I., offended with the city, threatened to remove his Court to another place, the Lord Mayor boldly told him—"Your Majesty may remove the Court at your pleasure, but you cannot remove the river Thames."

EPIGRAM—THERMOPATHY AND HYDROPATHY.

Between hot bathing and cold water cure,
Of holy life at least the patient's sure,—
For, like a parson, in two cures he dwells,
Or, like a Bishop, in a Bath and Wells!

INCOME-TAX ACT.

The following return, to the district assessor, has been made by a gentleman at Islington, of duties payable by him under Schedule D, in respect of his income arising from trade or professions, foreign possessions or securities, possessions in Ireland, dividends in the public funds, interest of money, annuities or annual payments derived from property out of Great Britain, &c., as to all which the act requires that parties should render a specific account in the schedule referred to.

"EX NIHILO NIHIL FIT."

I exercise neither a "a trade" nor "profession,"
Nor boast I of "foreign" nor Irish "possession;"
Unable I am, too, to reckon, most true it is,
On income from aught in the "funds" or "annuities."
As for "foreign securities"—there I'm at sea—
All such, I declare, are most foreign from me.
From "interest" I never gained anything yet,
Save the "office" I hold, yielding——hundreds net;
The tax upon which I will not trouble you with.
Since that is a matter you've nothing to do with.

My only "possessions" worth mentioning be Out of England (to wit) in the Island of Sky;
Though of these I have right little cause to be proud,
Since my "rent" is in nubibus—"under a cloud."
I've a "castle," I own, in the county of Air,
But, 'tis "empty," alas! so I get nothing there.

The rest of my "property" needs not insertion,
It being composed of estates in reversion;
Which, not being subject, as yet, to the tax,
I must crave to withhold from all government hacks;
Though, even now, I assure you, I find it to be A most burdensome annual tax upon me.

In order my schedule, then, duly to fill,
I, against every item, must write the word "nil;"
The which having done, sir, as well I can,
I protest to its truth, on the word of a man.

N.B. The assessor of taxes in Highbury-place
Will be pleased to accept, with all possible grace,
The foregoing "return," under schedule marked "D,"
For the year that will end Lady-day, '43. T. M.

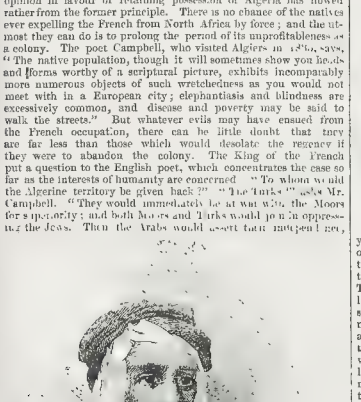
that the commandant of the camp of Oued Lalleg, which is within sight of a garrison of 2500 men, was obliged to have a telescope constantly at his eye to watch the incursions of marauders on the plains, in order to send his patrols to drive them off; and it is scarcely safe in any part of Algeria to venture out of the towns without an escort.

And this system of warfare, although crushed for the moment, will yet for many years harass the French, and retard their efforts after colonization. We now give a view of Constantina, the interesting scene of many a siege and slaughter, and the great rallying point of the departed Duke of Orleans's soldierly fame.

COSTANTINA.

Constantina (pronounced Constantineh by the Arabs, and frequently printed Constantine in the English newspapers) ranks next in importance to Algiers, the capital. Under the name of Cirta, it was once the capital of Numidia, and the ruins of its ancient aqueducts are still in existence. Constantina occupies a bold and commanding situation on a steep rocky hill, with the river Rhumel flowing on three sides of its base. The country around is a high terrace between the chains of the maritime and central Atlas. It is forty-eight miles distant from the sea, one hundred from Bona, and two hundred from Algiers; but the communication with each of these places is rendered difficult by mountain-passes. The 'Iron Gates' is a pass cut through perpendicular rocks on the road to Algiers; and six miles east of Constantineh is another pass called the 'Ascent,' which is carried along a narrow ledge with precipices on each side. Gelma is a strong position half-way between Constantineh and Bona, commanding the entrance of the plain of Constantina. In November 1836, an expedition was undertaken against Constantina by Marshal Clausel at the head of 8000 men. They marched from Bona by the left bank of the Seybous, and experienced great difficulties in crossing the swollen torrents and in conveying their cannon over the lesser Atlas. At length, when they arrived on the high terrace of Constantina, a heavy fall of snow, which lasted several days, and the severe cold, killed or disabled a great part of the army; and will render any plan deserving of consideration which promises to lessen this enormous cost. The struggle between pride and frugality cannot but be a painful one; and it is to be lamented that hitherto the colony has proved so unproductive, that the opinion in favour of retaining possession of Algeria has flowed rather from the former principle. There is no chance of the natives ever expelling the French from North Africa by force; and the utmost they can do is to prolong the period of its unprofitableness as a colony. The poet Campbell, who visited Algiers in 1816, says, "The native population, though it will sometimes show you heads and forms worthy of a scriptural picture, exhibits incomparably more numerous objects of such wretchedness as you would not meet with in a European city; elephantiasis and blindness are excessively common, and disease and poverty may be said to walk the streets." But whatever evils may have ensued from the French occupation, there can be little doubt that they are far less than those which would desolate the regency if they were to abandon the colony. The King of the French put a question to the English poet, which concentrates the case so far as the interests of humanity are concerned — "To whom would the Algerine territory be given back?" "The Turks," said Mr. Campbell. "They would immediately be at war with the Moors for superiority; and both Moors and Turks would join in oppressing the Jews. Then the Arabs would assert their independence, and there would be a universal civil war. Nay, it is doubtful with me," he adds, "whether, in the event of the French relinquishing Algiers, and even blowing up their forts and arsenals, the Algerines would not again rebuild their private vessels and exact their cruelties on Christian captives."

We could use no better portrait of the condition of Algeria with—to serve as both head and tail-piece—a spirited portrait of Abdel el Kader, the son of Achmet Bey, and recently the man of most rank and power among the warrior tribes of the country.—See last col.



ABDEL EL KADER.

THE FASHIONS.

Mon cher Monsieur,—You will perceive by the sketch I send you of the above elegant costume, that, as the season advances our Parisian belles, with that fitness which is the mark of true taste, have made their costumes as light and airy as possible; thereby rendering them the better adapted for the summer heat. The walking costume, you will see, is a robe of simple white muslin gathered in at the waist, with a girdle or small scarf of pink silk. Though fitting well on to the vest and waist, this dress, it must be noticed, gives a notion of coolness, by its looseness and apparent ease of its multiplicity of plaits. The flounces are deep, though their breadth diminishes from the bottom of the dress; while the vandyking, or in some instances edging with narrow lace, imparts an additional lightness. The bonnet presents rather more of a horse-shoe than an oval appearance in front, and is trimmed with ribbon and feathers of a pinker colour, while flowers of the same delightful hue are worn downwards along the cheek. The whole costume, with the delicate parasol of a mild tint or bluish grey, is one in which a bride might step forth from her conderi, on the morning after marriage to enjoy the first walk down the slopes of her chateau garden with the loving object of her young affection. The scarf worn by the sitting figure, your readers will acknowledge with me to be both novel and elegant. It combines the mantle and the scarf, and is composed of black satin and black lace in alternate strata, to use a geological phrase.

Lace and embroidered borders continue to be the favourite trimmings for dress. The former, indeed, is in high vogue,—lace parasols, lace fans, lace shawls, and lace mantles, being every where the rage. Some of our economists have moveable flounces of lace, white and black, of a depth varying from two to three fingers; and these they can adapt to either morning or evening costume, or change from one dress to another as caprice, colour, or fashion may dictate. I send, of course, such costumes as will suit your English patronesses; for, in truth, here we have the sombre hue of mourning; though greys, and various tints approaching thereunto, as well as white, in crape and muslins, are already peeping forth. Black, indeed, is a colour much too oppressive for summer heats, though I leave it to your philosophers to find out the reason of this apparent sympathy between excess of light and darkness.

JULIE.

FALMOUTH, AUG. 7.—The Bishop of Exeter, who is at present engaged in visiting the western districts of his diocese, yesterday proceeded in the Astræa yacht from the Green Bank in Falmouth harbour, to St. Just, on the opposite shore; and after confirming a large number of young persons, in getting into the boat, fell down, and grazed his left leg below the knee considerably, against one of the seats. On inquiring this morning, we found that although the wound was so painful as to preclude his preaching to day, as his lordship intended, yet that the inconvenience was likely to be only of a temporary character. Captain Elliot, R.N., attended his lordship to St. Just.

John Edgar, M.A., of Jesus College, Cambridge, incumbent of Kirton and Falkenham, in the same county. The Lord Bishop of Ely has announced his intention of holding a general Ordination on Sunday, November 2.

OBITUARY.—The Rev. Henry Maddrell, M.A., fifty years vicar of Kirk Christ, Lagavre, Isle of Man, aged 77. The Rev. John Henry Gregg, M.A., formerly of Uphill, Somerset, aged 58. At Farnham, the Rev. W. Lushington.

The Right Honourable the Speaker gave an entertainment on Saturday evening at his residence in Eaton-square, to the following officers of the House of Commons:—Mr. Ley, Mr. W. Ley, Mr. H. Ley, Sir W. Gossett, K.C.H., Mr. Clementson, Mr. R. A. Gossett, Mr. Booth, Mr. Hardon, Mr. J. M'c, Mr. Lefroy, Mr. Andrews, Mr. Chalmers, Mr. Whitting, Mr. Dyson, Mr. Gibbons, Mr. J. Rose, Mr. Pole, Mr. Frere, Mr. C. Gunnell, Mr. Dorrington, Mr. Jones, Mr. G. Lee, Mr. Gudge, Mr. Rowland, Mr. Postlethwaite, Mr. Gray, Mr. Gunnell, Mr. G. Gunnell, and Mr. Hawes. The business of the session has been so oppressive that no one, however, envious his disposition, can grudge those officials a little relaxation.

MINISTERIAL DINNER AT THE CROWN AND SCEPTRE TAVERN, GREENWICH.—On Saturday the Annual Old Fish Dinner of the Ministry took place at the Crown and Sceptre. The Greenwich Steam-packet Company's steamer Prince of Wales was hired specially to convey the distinguished party from Hungerford-market Pier to Greenwich, leaving at six o'clock precisely, with Sir R. Peel, Bart.; Dukes of Buckingham and Buccleuch; Earls of Haddington, Bathurst, Ripon, Liverpool, and Shaftesbury; Lords Stanley, Wharncliffe, Jermyn, E. Bruce, G. Somerset, Lowther, Lincoln, Eliot, Sidney, Redesdale, Sandon, Abinger; Sirs Thomas Fremantle, Admiral George Cockburn, James Graham, G. Murray, F. Trench, E. Knatchbull, W. Follett, A. Grant, G. Clerk; Honourables, H. Goulburne, Herries, H. Baring, Dawson, Sutton, Col. Peel, &c. The Duke of Wellington and the Lord Chancellor, it is stated, did not feel sufficiently well to join the party; but it is worthy of observation that on the same evening an entertainment was given by his grace to another distinguished party at Apsley-house. The Prince of Wales arrived at Greenwich at twenty minutes before seven o'clock, and the party landed at the Crown and Sceptre stairs.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Downing."—Our correspondent is correct. The problem can be solved in two moves. We are obliged by his communication, and shall be glad to hear from him again.

"A Disciple of Izaac Walton."—The letter on roach and dace fishing is unavoidably postponed until next week

"A Servant discharged in consequence of the Income-tax."—Our correspondent's case is certainly one of very great hardship, and we fear there are many thousands such. A few months more, and we expect Sir R. Peel will find that he had little reason to plume himself on the adoption of this odious, inquisitorial, and manifestly unjust impost. We are literally overwhelmed with correspondence on this painful subject.

"H. W. B.'s" sketch shall appear.

"T. J. M. F."—The grand stand at Goodwood is on the outside of the race-course, having a slope from the stand to the course, from which it is separated by an iron railing only.

"J. B." is thanked for his proposal, but we cannot make it available for the present.

"A. B. C."—There is some ingenuity in this lady's application of her historical comparisons of fate to a circumstance fresh in the public mind; but they are more suited for a purely literary or miscellaneous journal, than to one obliged to find room for the pressing news of the week. The contribution is left under cover at our office.

The communication of Signor Filippo Pistrucci, shall receive our attention upon philanthropic grounds, as soon as we can examine into the facts.

"M. M. J."—Accepted.

"C. S. F."—Not bad; but we have really no room for half the good things that are sent us.

"W. J. Bruce." One of those clerical errors, against which it is difficult in a multitude of avocations always to guard. It will be however the exception, and not the rule.

"T."—The footman of this writer takes him in from the assessor the unenclosed income-tax papers to be filled up, and asks whether, after that ordeal is complied with, he is entitled to enclose the papers to the Commissioners "without placing all his affairs under the inspection of not only the assessor (a neighbouring farmer) and his family, but, through him, of the whole parish?" The assessor of the income is of course the person who must receive its return, otherwise how assess? The ordeal is provoking; but the assessor, as a public officer, is bound to maintain the confidence implied by his vocation, though many of the class will doubtless be tempted from the proper and honourable secrecy. But a man, allowing either his family or the parish to partake of an exerted knowledge of individual circumstances, would be dismissed if the charge were brought home by any government to whom it was proved. The whole affair, however, is fraught with grievance, and full of tyranny and perplexity.

"J. Howell," Nailsea.—The letter is referred to our publisher, who will forward a reply.

"Carus Amicus," from Stockport.—Declined, with thanks.

"Buffer."—We will see what can be done; but all sorts of class interests are proposing similar claims upon our space.

"Solomon Short."—1st question. To the nation.—2nd. Say "spoonful," it is the accepted plural, although bad enough. "Spoonfuls" is, however, worse; for, although it is not intended that you should take two spoons and fill them, yet you can take two "fulls" of nothing, as "full" is not a noun; but of two "wrongs" take that which society admits, as they once did light sovereigns, as current. "A spoon twice full," is a right way of coming at the English; but the apothecaries would swear if they were obliged to write it so; and the public shout "pedantry," if they were obliged to read it so.

"A Cantab." is enthusiastic, and enthusiasm is generally to be respected, because it bespeaks heart. It should sometimes be guarded against too.

"F. L."—The lines are written in a pious, kindly spirit, and are well meant; but they will not save suit our columns. We wish our fair correspondent a speedy recovery from her illness; and although we do not usually return rejected communications of this class (we receive so many of them), yet we shall, out of courtesy to an invalid, make this instance an exception to our rule. The MS. is left, as requested, at our office.

"L. L. L."—They would be very acceptable, always provided that we have the opportunity of seeing, from specimens, of their probable merit. Short notices, or a reference to date, should accompany them.

"Clegn."—Of too purely religious a cast for the columns of a newspaper not exclusively devoted. Our correspondents must not expect replies from us upon occasions when their poetical communications are rejected.

"A Tyro." —We will attend to this correspondent's letter on chess.

"Exetonian."—To the last question, Yes. The first, we have received the letter too late to answer it in the last number.

"J. C. N." Wisbeach, shall be communicated with. The remark was intended to apply to the entire execution after drawing; and this might have been of a character to have obliterated all traces of the original design. At all events, let "J. C. N." select his subject, and send us the specimen offered, and he may be sure of receiving justice at our hands.

"A. B." must return on both sums.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 13, 1842.

In another column of our paper is recorded the disastrous occurrence of a turn-out of manufacturing labourers in and about Manchester, which, whether it be the "beginning of many troubles," or only a partial and experimental outburst, must still be regarded with regret and sorrow by wise and thoughtful men. It would appear that the sudden and turbulent display of congregated thousands, leaving their daily employment—marching upon mills, forcing willing and unwilling alike to join them, and, in a moment, paralysing the whole activity of the natural enterprise of their neighbourhood—has arisen, in the first instance, from a reduction of wages in one quarter, given almost without notice, and taken by the men as the omen of a general intention on the part of the masters everywhere else. To this conclusion they leaped, perhaps with some reason to believe their conviction true; and at once, with a desperate determination of purpose, they gather in half-starved thousands, resolve to abjure work unless they can have "a fair day's pay for a fair day's labour," and partly with riot, partly with invective, partly with threat, plunge the sober population into fear, and create anxieties, natural to these troublous times, from one end to the other of the land.

Sober men soon see that there is nothing very critical in the mere outbreak. Commercial feeling is little shaken, the strength of the authorities is relied on, and a belief is soon engendered that, if the wretched labourers are in the right, the will be both relieved and redressed. It is in the nature of English feeling and the character of the community to work out this result; but, in the present crisis of affairs, there is another aspect in which this sad outbreak is regarded. Here it is. Have the master manufacturers, or any of them, purposely reduced wages in their impoverished districts, to try the patience of suffering human nature almost beyond endurance, and so seek to verify in riot the predictions of the Anti-Corn-Law League? And, moreover, have they selected the tempting crisis of the session's close to awaken terrors for the recess, and frighten ministers and legislators and the country into the dread that this first tumult is only the beginning of many that may end in blood? If this be the case, then, indeed, we abhor the creatures who could shadow such a guilt upon the world; and then, also, are we sure that its detection would assuredly avert its consequences from all but themselves—from their deluded victims as well as from the country, which, for the basest triumph of a party spirit, they would set in flames.

But if, on the other hand, these outbreaks are the result of the saddest poverty of the people quickened by more pinching depressions of decaying trade, then, indeed, although we deprecate their open turbulence, and know that the law will put them down, do we pity them with heartfelt commiseration, and urge the whole stream of Christian sympathy in their behalf. Then would we unite charity with justice to offer them relief and redress.

We refer our readers to the paper entitled "Close of the Session," on our first page, for the purpose, not of correcting any error which it contains (for it was written when its statements were correct, but rather to add to its present intelligence what has since transpired to alter one of its important features. The technicality of our printing arrangements will only admit of our doing this here; and we are glad that the casualty is of a nature upon which we may congratulate both ourselves and the country. The subject we allude to is the "Insolvent Debtors' Bill," about which there was a general impression that it was hurked by influence in the Commons, and that it would not see its way into a law. The Minister, however, has behaved honestly with respect to it: it has been committed; the Lords, who were all along sincere, waited for it—received and accepted it with its amendments—and, with her Majesty's sanction, it is the law of the land. This is a happy result of legislation, and well compensates for any regret which we had reason to feel and express with regard to it on our first page.

A Bribery Bill and a Slave-trade Suppression Bill have also passed into law, though neither are such extensive measures as we have been prompt to advocate.

There are two cases that have attracted public notice during the week, and connected with the administration of domestic justice, which have provoked our unqualified disgust. The first is that of a man of fortune who, probably thinking that wealth crowned libertinism with impunity, attempted a felonious assault upon an unoffending servant-girl. The particulars are too many for detail; but it would seem that the girl's virtue and courage were triumphant; and then the result of a very properly-instituted and fairly-conducted prosecution was the conviction of the rich offender, and his sentence to a three months' imprisonment—little enough for his enormity, but sufficient to put him out of society nevertheless. His brother makes interest for him, however, and the Home-office commutes his sentence to a fine of thirty pounds, which he pays, and is exempt. He continues to reside in his old apartments, which the injured servant is obliged in consequence (notwithstanding the willingness of her master and mistress to retain) to leave; and, what with her law expenses, and her loss of place, is a greater sufferer than if she had never had the honourable courage to seek for justice at all. The plea for letting off the rich gentleman appears, upon investigation, to rest upon the opinion of Mr. Sergeant Adams, who tried him, that he might not have intended the act of felony, but only have been guilty of the brutal assault of beating and ill-treating a young female. In either case he deserved his three months; but the whole affair is monstrous, because it is clear that his riches get him off. Had he been a poor brute instead of a wealthy one he would certainly have trod the mill, even though Mr. Sergeant Adams, in the course of prison inspection, should have caught him in the act. Fie, fie, fie!

And fie again for case the second, which involves the sagacious justice of Mr. Combe, of Clerkenwell. Mr. Rawlinson last week, Mr. Combe this. Three young "sparks of night"—medicals by profession, knocker-hunters at their more easy leisure, and disorderly disturbers of "those who would fain rest"—play some disreputable pranks up and down, get into the station-house—are brought before Mr. Combe to further disgrace themselves by assuming an alias, and pretending to the calling of drapers' apprentices—a class whom poverty generally keeps more respectable than the conduct of these knights of the lancet proclaimed them to be. But Mr. Combe soon discovered that the young impostors were pulse-feelers, and not yard-measurers, and then he began to feel the pulse of the case. He censured them on the disgrace of their proceedings told them they ought to be severely dealt with—added that he believed they had wealthy friends outside—and his consequent conviction that a fine of five pounds (the highest he could inflict) would not be felt by them at all

The common ergo of all this is, that he should have "given them fourteen days;" but Mr. Combe took the view of a more ministerial logician. He repeated his belief that a fine would not punish them—confirmed his suspicions through the policemen, that they had respectable friends outside—and then, BECAUSE five pounds would not be felt by them at all, he sentenced them to be muleted in the penalty of only three!

Was ever such justice, was ever such reasoning, as this? And yet, Heaven help the poor man who shall kick up midnight disturbances and steal knockers!

BEERSELLERS' PROTECTION SOCIETY.

On Thursday the Beersellers of the metropolis celebrated their seventh anniversary of the formation of their society, at the Highbury Barn Tavern, when nearly a thousand persons sat down to dinner, Mr. Robinson, one of the trustees, was, in the absence of Mr. Warburton, who had promised to attend, called to the chair. An excellent musical band was in attendance, and Messrs. Pyne, Edney, and Fry, the celebrated vocalists, contributed much to the entertainment of the evening. After the usual loyal toasts, Mr. Peary proposed the health of Lord Monteagle, the patron of the society and friend of the trade, which was warmly received. Mr. Bishop, the secretary, then rose to propose prosperity to the institution, and in doing so, gave a history of the progress of the institution since its first establishment, showing that the most disheartening obstacles had been overcome by unanimity and perseverance. This gentleman, who is highly esteemed by the trade for his efficient and business-like services, exhibited several trophies, in the shape of silver plate of most chaste and elegant workmanship, which had been presented to him by the Beersellers of the metropolis and other parts of the kingdom, at various intervals of his public life, as a testimony of their esteem and gratitude. The ladies, the press, and several other toasts were then given and responded to, after which the company broke up to indulge in the various pastimes which the extensive grounds attached to the tavern afford. At dusk the votaries of Terpsichore presented themselves in the ball-room, where the exhilarating dance was persevered in until an early hour in the morning. The wines were well iced, but we regret to say that this was their only redeeming quality. Our reporter was requested by the toast-master to state that his name is Wheeler. He did his business very creditably, although the company were sometimes disinclined to attend his bawl.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, SUNDAY.—This morning her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, attended divine service in Cumberland Lodge Chapel. The Rev. H. Cooper officiated. There were also present Lady Jocelyn, Colonel Wylde, and Colonel Buckley. The royal party, after lunching at Cumberland Lodge, returned to the Castle at half-past two o'clock. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, with the usual attendants, honoured the grand promenade on the terrace in the afternoon. Both military bands were in attendance. The company was highly fashionable.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, took their usual morning walk.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Saxe Coburg, and attended by Colonel Wylde, Baron Brandenstein, and Mr. G. E. Anson, went to Virginia Water rabbit shooting.

In the afternoon her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, drove to Cliefden in a carriage and four.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady C. Dundas, Le Marquise d'Harcourt, and Mr. and Mrs. Harcourt, and Sir G. Couper, joined the royal dinner party in the evening, when the band of the 15th Foot was in attendance.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, with his brother, Prince Ernest of Saxe Coburg, and Mr. G. L. Anson, have bathed in the river Thames during the past week. A most delightful and picturesque spot, and perfectly private, near the Weir, and a short distance below Windsor Bridge, has been appropriated for the exclusive use of the Prince and his Royal Highness's illustrious friends. A small marquee has been erected upon the beautifully arranged enclosure, which has been tastefully planted with shrubs and evergreens, from which the water is very deep, and generally clear, with an excellent bottom.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—On Saturday last the nuptials of Lord Walsingham and Miss Augusta Louisa Russell, eldest daughter of Sir Robert Frankland Russell, Bart., were solemnized at St. George's Church, Hanover square, in the presence of a select circle of the friends of both families. The Hon. and Rev. F. Grey officiated at the ceremony. The marriage of Mr. Evelyn P. Shirely, M.P. for Monaghan, and Miss Lechmere, daughter of Mr. H. Lechmere, and granddaughter of Sir Anthony Lechmere, Bart., was celebrated last week, at Hanley Church, Worcestershire. On Monday the Hon. Charles Howard, M.P., son of the Earl of Carlisle, was united in wedlock to Miss Parke, daughter of Baron Parke, of the Court of Exchequer. The marriage was strictly private. After the ceremony the bride and bridegroom set off for the Duke of Sutherland's villa, Roehampton, where they intend spending the honeymoon. It has this week been promulgated that Lord Prudhoe, the only brother of his Grace the Duke of Northumberland, is about to be married to the eldest daughter of Earl Grosvenor, and granddaughter of the Marquis of Westminster. The bride elect is 22 years of age, and his lordship was born in 1792. The nuptials are expected to take place in the course of a fortnight.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF KENT.—Although it it has been generally rumoured that it is the intention of the Duchess of Kent to proceed to the Continent, and to remain there during the whole of the autumn, it is expected that the projected journey of the Duchess will be postponed, or that at all events her royal highness will not proceed further than Brussels, there to remain upon a short visit to the King and Queen of the Belgians. It is stated that her royal highness has come to this determination at the especial desire of her Majesty, who is anxious that her illustrious parent should not be absent from England for so lengthened a period as had originally been contemplated. Her Majesty is also desirous that the Duchess of Kent should be in England upon the anniversary of the birth of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, which is to be celebrated at Windsor Castle with great splendour. A grand banquet will be given upon the auspicious occasion, to which a very illustrious and distinguished party have been invited. His royal highness will enter the 24th year of his age on Friday, the 26th instant.

A Madrid journal states that the Queen of Spain has sent four beautiful horses as a present to the Queen of England.

TUESDAY.—Her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, attended by Lady Jocelyn, Colonel Buckley, and Colonel Wylde, left the Castle shortly before one o'clock and proceeded to Kew, where they arrived at ten minutes past two o'clock. His royal highness the Duke of Cambridge received her Majesty and the illustrious party at the entrance to his royal highness's residence. A royal salute was immediately fired from Kew-green, and the royal standard was hoisted on the church. A déjeûné was served to the royal visitors in the dining-room, after which the whole of the party walked into the Botanic Garden. Her Majesty and suite returned to the Castle at six o'clock. Her royal highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady C. Dundas, and Major-General and Lady Isabella Wemyss, joined the royal dinner party in the evening.

On Monday last, his royal highness Prince Albert, and his brother, Prince Ernest, shot over the royal preserves in the Great Park, near the Norfolk Farm, and killed no less than one hundred and forty rabbits in two hours. Prince Albert, having the best position, killed the greater number; but his brother, who is a first-rate shot, killed one of his rabbits, which proved, on stepping over the ground, to be upwards of eighty yards distance.

WILL OF THE LATE MARQUIS OF HERTFORD.—It was our intention to have laid before our readers a copy of the various codicils executed at different times by the late Marquis of Hertford; but the terms made use of by the defunct, in speaking of certain individuals, will not allow us even to lay an abstract before our readers. In one case, for instance, the marquis, speaking of two persons, says—"Aware of the infamy of the character of one of them, he wishes the other to be as little in the power of that person as possible, and regulates certain payments, in order that the one person may have no occasion to shorten the life of the other." In the will his lordship gives a bust and writing-box of King Charles, among other things, to his wife; and a picture by Vandyke, of himself, as pairs to George the Fourth. £5000 to each of his executors, to purchase something in remembrance of him. They are, for the most part, munificently remembered by him in codicils.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—The Queen Dowager, who arrived on a visit to Earl Howe, at Gopsall Hall, on Saturday, from Bushy Park, took her departure, with several members of her court, for Burghley Hall, near Stamford, on Monday, to honour the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter by a visit. The royal route was by Desford, Leicester, and Uffington, where relays of horses were provided to convey her Majesty and suite to Stamford. Stamford, throughout the day, displayed no ordinary scene of bustle and gaiety, extensive preparations having been completed to receive her Majesty with all the respect and honour to which that charitable and truly virtuous ornament of royalty is so justly entitled; and, considering the shortness of the notice, the loyal and worthy inhabitants of that populous borough achieved more than could reasonably be expected. It may be interesting to observe, that Stamford has on many occasions been honoured by the visits of royalty, the "royal progresses of Henry VIII., Elizabeth, and James I., being recorded with considerable minuteness by chroniclers of their respective reigns. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager and her suite reached the hall shortly before five o'clock, and alighted at the principal entrance, the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter being in waiting to receive their illustrious guest. The Earl and Countess of Brownlow, Earl of Beverley, Lord Thomas and Lady Sophia Cecil, Sir Horace Seymour, and Dowager Lady Clinton, Hon. Captain and Mrs. Spencer, Lord Clinton, &c., were likewise in attendance to meet her Majesty. The royal standard was instantly hoisted. The dinner was served up in the spacious and magnificent banqueting-hall. It has a noble arched roof of oak, springing from brackets, similar to those at Westminster Hall and the Parliament House at Edinburgh. It has been supposed to be more ancient than the other parts of the mansion, but there is nothing in the style to warrant the supposition. At the south end the hall is lighted by a beautiful Gothic painted window, with the family arms emblazoned. Within the last few years this refectory has been entirely repaired and beautified by the present noble marquis. Covers were laid for thirty-two. The christening of the infant son of the Marquis and Marchioness was appointed to take place on Wednesday.

WINDSOR, WEDNESDAY.—This morning her Majesty, his royal highness Prince Albert, and the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, took their usual walking exercise. In the afternoon the Prince drove the Queen out in a pony phaeton, attended as usual. Her royal highness the Duchess of Kent and Lady C. Dundas joined the royal dinner party in the evening. The band of the 15th Foot was in attendance at the Castle. A Cabinet Council was held on Wednesday afternoon at the Foreign-office. It was attended by Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Ripon, Lord Fitzgerald, Sir Henry Hardinge, and Sir Edward Knatchbull. The council sat two hours.

PROVINCIAL.

A correspondent of the Times says that a Conservative festival will be held in the grounds of Nottingham Castle, on Thursday the 25th inst., to celebrate the triumphant election of Mr. Walter.

SOUTHAMPTON ELECTION.—The Conservative candidates, Messrs. Mildmay and Hope, have been returned for this borough, the number, at the final close of the poll, on Monday, being—

Mildmay	685
Hope	682
Nugent	535
Thompson	532
Majority for Mildmay	—150
Hope	—147

Lord Nugent and Mr. Thompson addressed the electors from the window of their committee-room after the poll had closed, and thanked them for the support they had received in that contest. Mr. Thompson said it was intended to institute a most rigid inquiry into the conduct of that election on the part of their opponents. Messrs. Mildmay and Hope also addressed their supporters from the balcony of the Dolphin.

At the nomination which took place on the previous Saturday, the most opprobrious epithets were applied to Lord Nugent by several of the Conservative candidates' friends, and the following correspondence will show the result to which this kind of conduct was likely to lead. Immediately on the close of the poll the following letter was delivered by Sir John Easthope to Mr. Le Feuvre:—

"Southampton, August 8, 1842.

"Sir—The election being now concluded, I recur to certain offensive words used by you, on Saturday last, in the hall, on the occasion of the nomination of the candidates. Nothing remains to me but to require an immediate retractation of those words as applied to me. This will be delivered to you by Sir John Easthope, who has been good enough to undertake to receive your answer.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, NUGENT.—To W. J. Le Feuvre, Esq."

After the receipt of the foregoing letter, Mr. Le Feuvre deputed Mr. Coxwell to meet Sir John Easthope, and the following declaration was the result —

"Southampton, August 8, 1842.

"Mr. Le Feuvre retracts all and every the offensive words which he admits to have used with reference to Lord Nugent, and expresses his regret for having applied those words to him.

"JOHN EASTHOPE.

"EDWARD COXWELL."

After this admission and retractation, Sir John Easthope, on behalf of Lord Nugent, states that he (Lord Nugent) did not charge Mr. Le Feuvre with having committed bribery. He read from the record of Parliament the words which therein state that Mr. Le Feuvre retained £200, and further added that "he hoped Mr. Le Feuvre was not using it now," by which expression he intended nothing personally offensive to Mr. Le Feuvre.

"JOHN EASTHOPE.

"EDWARD COXWELL."

"Lord Nugent to be at liberty to use the contents of this paper.

"J. E.

"E. C."

We observe that our morning contemporaries style this "an affair of honour!"

The statue which is to be erected in St. Mary's, Shrewsbury, to the memory of Dr. Butler, the late Bishop of Lichfield, was left untouched at the death of Sir Francis Chantrey, to whom the commission for its execution had originally been given. It has now been assigned to Mr. Baily; the committee having wisely trusted to their taste, without allowing their decision to be founded on the farce of public competition.

Van Amburgh had one of his fingers bitten off on Tuesday last, at Falmouth, by the lion. He could not perform the following day. Let him beware of his head. This extraordinary man has experienced the greatest success throughout Cornwall, in Penzance alone upwards of £400 were taken at two performances. His progress in the west has literally been a march of triumph.—North Devon Journal.

SOUTHAMPTON, Aug. 8.—This morning 75 heifers, of from two to four years old, were landed at our quay from Morlaix, in France. They are very small, and much inferior to the Guernsey, Jersey, and Alderney cattle so largely imported her. They come in under the new duty. The owner was with them, and although the price was asked he did not sell a head this day, wishing to dispose of the whole in one lot.

SUSPECTED MURDER AND PARRICIDE.—A most revolting and atrocious case of parricide or homicide took place late on Saturday night, within three miles of this city. It appears that a family of three individuals, namely, James Paterson, carter at Hailes Quarry, Robert Paterson, his son, and Janet Paterson, the wife of James and mother of Robert, left Edinburgh for their home about 11 o'clock, and that they were, particularly the female, considerably intoxicated. When near Slateford toll the female, it appears, had been either unable to proceed, or some quarrel had ensued among them; but it is stated by one or more persons who came up to them, that Robert Paterson the son, dragged his mother for some distance along the road, kicking her repeatedly with his feet, and using language in reference to her which we should be afraid to repeat. The father, it appears, was a passive spectator of this brutal and unnatural conduct. Two men, who had come up to the party, found the woman lying dead, and assisted to convey her to the toll-house. They afterwards returned to Edinburgh and gave information to the police, when some officers were despatched, who took the two male Patersons into custody at their house, both seemingly unconscious of, or indifferent about, the dreadful event. Mr. Tait, surgeon of police, went out to Hailes about 4 o'clock yesterday morning, examined the body of the deceased, and gave a summary report. The case is now undergoing judicial investigation.—Caledonian Mercury.

SINGULAR OCCURRENCE.—An incident of an extraordinary nature took place lately in the parish of Golspie, in Sutherlandshire. The wife of a shoemaker had been, for a considerable time, lying ill of a fever, but was gradually recovering. She, however, suddenly relapsed, and as her husband and friends supposed, she died on the second day after her relapse, about two o'clock in the afternoon. The usual formalities of stretching and laying out the body were adopted, and her husband procured money from his employers, and ordered mourning for his family. Next day, about 12 o'clock, as the joiner was taking measure of her coffin, she gave a sneeze, and otherwise made a stir with her body. On taking off the grave-clothes she looked up in a wild manner, and made a motion with her hand, as if she wanted something to eat. A few cordials were administered to her. She was then put to bed, and enjoyed a good sound sleep. She has since gradually recovered, and is now quite out of danger.—Inverness Courier.

FROM OUR LATE EDITION OF LAST WEEK.

The Queen, with that delicacy of feeling which has ever distinguished her Majesty, has had no musical performances at the Castle, since the death of the Duke of Orleans, until Thursday evening (the funeral ceremony having then taken place), when the band of the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards performed during dinner, and her Majesty's private band was in attendance.

The Queen Dowager has presented £100 to the St. Pancras Churches Building Fund.

The Queen Dowager takes her departure to-day (Saturday), for Gopsall, the seat of Earl Howe, in Leicestershire. On Monday her Majesty leaves Gopsall for Burghley House, near Stamford, in Northamptonshire, to honour the noble owner with a visit. The Countess of Jersey and Lady Clementina Villiers, and a highly distinguished circle, are invited to meet the illustrious visitor. It is her Majesty's intention to remain at Burghley until Thursday, and will then return to Earl Howe's.

Captain Lewis, of the Peninsular steam-packet, Montrose, and Lieut. Fraser, Admiralty Agent, arrived by special train from Southampton, at 10 minutes past two, p.m., this day (Saturday), with important despatches from Lisbon to the Foreign Office.

The Right Hon. Lord Walsingham was married, this morning, to Augusta Louisa, eldest daughter of Sir Robert Frankland Russell, Bart., of Thirkleby Park, Yorkshire.

PORTSMOUTH, Friday.—There is now no doubt that it is the intention of her Majesty to proceed to sea before the summer is over. Orders have come down to put the royal barges in readiness, and to expedite the necessary fitting up of the Royal George yacht, so that it may be in readiness to receive her Majesty at the shortest notice.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—Thursday, at Norwood Church, the Earl of Cornwallis was married to Miss Julia Bacon, daughter of Mr. T. Bacon, of Redlands, near Reading, Berkshire.—On Wednesday, at St. George's, Hanover-square, Lord Templemore was united to the hymeneal altar Miss Paget, niece of the Marquis of Anglesey.

LONDON BRIDGE.—In consequence of the partial repairs which the carriage road of this bridge is about to undergo, the following notice was yesterday issued by the Lord Mayor:—"Notice is hereby given, that on and after Monday, the 15th day of August instant, no carriage, cart, waggon, or other vehicle, will be allowed to pass over London-bridge into the City.—By order of the Lord Mayor."

THE FIRST DAY OF OYSTERS.—The sale of oysters for the season commenced on Thursday, according to annual custom. The supply was abundant, the quality remarkably good, and the demand for this much prized luxury unprecedented. There were 50 sail of vessels at Billingsgate in the morning, 30 of which arrived during the previous night. At 6 o'clock, and not 12, as was at first determined, the hatches were opened, and a tremendous rush took place, and there was much competition among the vendors to obtain the first supply. No less than 15,000 persons attended the market during the day, and the amount expended in the purchase of oysters the first day was not less than £7000. The supply at Hungerford Market, as compared with Billingsgate, was inconsiderable, but the oysters there realized about the same prices.

The match with the gentlemen of England against the gentlemen of Kent began shortly after the above match had terminated; and when the game ceased for the day, Kent, which first took the bat, had effected a score of 161 at the price of 8 wickets. Messrs. Fagge, Jenner, and Baldock, have yet their wickets to go down.

EXTRAORDINARY ESCAPE.—About six o'clock on Thursday evening, as an elderly female was crossing the end of Lisle-street, Leicester-square, she was knocked down by a cab, and a wheel of the vehicle passed over her neck. Several persons instantly ran to her assistance, and conveyed her to the shop of a surgeon, when, strange to say, on examination, her neck, with the exception of some slight bruises, was found to have escaped injury, and she was shortly afterwards enabled to return home.

DISTURBANCE NEAR GLASGOW.—We are sorry to learn that the colliers in the neighbourhood of Glasgow have nearly all turned out for higher wages. They are holding large public meetings, to which they generally go armed with sticks. Their proceedings created much alarm in Glasgow and the vicinity on Tuesday and Wednesday.

DARING HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—Mr. Lovegrove, the proprietor of the Crown and Sceptre Tavern, Greenwich, and of the York Hotel, Bridge-street, Blackfriars, left his home to accompany a relative over the heath, at about nine o'clock on Thursday evening. He had passed along the upper wall of Greenwich-park, from the top of Maize-hill, and there parted with his friend. When he reached the cross-roads near Vanburgh-fields, it had become so dark that he did not perceive two men who had been following him. They carefully watched an opportunity, and springing from behind, threw him on his back with a violent blow on the head. He cried out "Murder," which one of the men in a glazed hat partly stifled by griping his throat. The other villain ripped up his clothes from top to bottom, dragged a valuable gold watch and guard from his neck (breaking the latter), taking his cravat and whatever else they could find. By this time he had become so insensible that the thieves, having secured their booty, were content to escape. Mr. Lovegrove's recollection only serves to describe the robbers' dress as something like that worn by sailors. The police, under Mr. Mallalieu, are taking the most active measures to discover the retreat of the criminals.

Friday night a fire broke out on the premises belonging to Mr. R. H. North, coal and coke merchant, No. 36, Silver-street, Golden-square. The fire was extinguished in about two hours, but not before considerable damage was sustained.

ELECTION OF M. SAUZET.—PARIS, Aug. 5.—M. Sauzet has been elected President of the Chamber. Before the first scrutiny the numbers were:—Sauzet, 210; Odillon Barrot, 131: Dufaure, 39; Dupin, 16; Berryer, 3. No candidate having the "absolute majority" required, a second scrutiny was proceeded with, when the ministerial candidate was elected by a majority of 25. This first defeat of the opposition is regarded in Paris as of considerable importance.

Several cases of furious driving of omnibuses were brought before the magistrates, at Clerkenwell, on Thursday, and fines inflicted. The dangers arising from the practice are, however, now becoming so common, that the magistrate stated he should in future commit to the House of Correction, with hard labour, as the Act empowered him to do.

Friday Morning.

HER MAJESTY'S DEPARTURE FROM WINDSOR, AND ARRIVAL IN TOWN BY THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—WINDSOR, Thursday.—Her Majesty left the Castle this afternoon a few minutes before 1 o'clock, in an open carriage and four, escorted by a detachment of the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards, for the Great Western Railway Station at Slough. In the carriage with the Queen were his royal highness Prince Albert and their serene highnesses the hereditary Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha.

At the Slough station extensive preparations were made for the Queen's accommodation and reception, by Mr. Howell. That portion of the platform leading from the elegantly furnished apartment (appropriated exclusively to the use of the Royal family) to the state-carriage, was covered with crimson carpet, on each side of which was tastefully arranged a beautiful collection of plants and flowering shrubs.

The Queen, upon her arrival, was handed into the centre compartment of the state-carriage by his royal highness Prince Albert.

The Royal train left the station at 7 minutes past 1 o'clock, and arrived at Paddington at 35 minutes past, performing the distance in 28 minutes. The engine, the Proserpine, which was decorated with flags, was conducted by Mr. Brunel, the engineer in chief to the company, with whom was Mr. Gooch, the chief superintendent of the carriage department.

The Queen and Prince Albert, and the hereditary Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha, arrived in Buckingham Palace in an open carriage and four, escorted by a party of Hussars, at 10 minutes before 2 o'clock.

The Queen held a Privy Council at half-past 3 o'clock. It was attended by his royal highness Prince Albert, the Lord President, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Privy Seal, the First Lord of the Treasury, the Duke of Wellington, the Secretaries of State for the Home and Foreign Departments, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the President of the Board of Trade, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the President of the Board of Control, the Secretary at War, the Paymaster of the Forces, the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, and the Master of the Horse.

The Queen's speech on closing the session of Parliament this day was arranged and agreed upon.

HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.—PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"The state of public business enables me to release you from further attendance in Parliament.

"I cannot take leave of you without expressing my grateful sense of the assiduity and zeal with which you have applied yourselves to the discharge of your public duties during the whole course of a long and most laborious session.

"You have had under your consideration measures of the greatest importance connected with the financial and commercial interests of the country, calculated to maintain the public credit, to improve the national resources, and, by extending trade, and stimulating the demand for labour, to promote the general and permanent welfare of all classes of my subjects.

"Although measures of this description have necessarily occupied much of your attention, you have at the same time effected great improvements in several branches of jurisprudence, and in laws connected with the administration of domestic affairs.

"I return you my especial acknowledgments for the renewed proof which you afforded me of your loyalty and affectionate attachment by your ready and unanimous concurrence in an act for the increased security and protection of my person.

"I continue to receive from all Foreign Powers assurances of their friendly disposition towards this country.

"Although I have deeply to lament the reverses which have befallen a division of the army to the westward of the Indus, yet I have the satisfaction of reflecting that the gallant defence of the city of Jellalabad, crowned by a decisive victory in the field, has eminently proved the courage and discipline of the European and native troops, and the skill and fortitude of their distinguished commander.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

"The liberality with which you have granted the Supplies to meet the exigencies of the public service demands my warm acknowledgments.

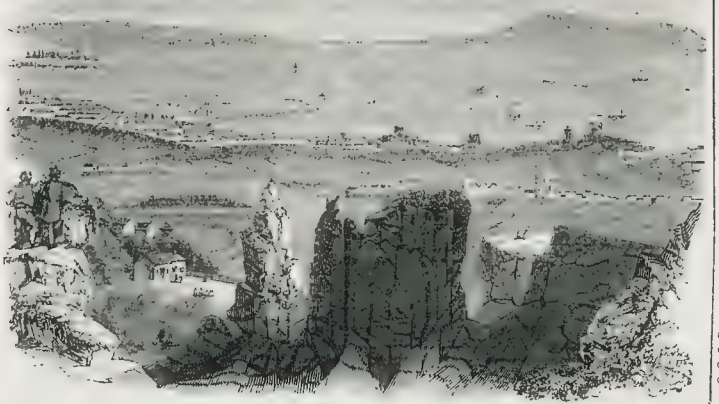
"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"You will concur with me in the expression of humble gratitude to Almighty God for the favourable season which His bounty has vouchsafed to us, and for the prospects of a harvest more abundant than those of recent years.

"There are, I trust, indications of gradual recovery from that depression which has affected many branches of manufacturing industry, and has exposed large classes of my people to privations and sufferings, which have caused me the deepest concern.

"You will, I am confident, be actuated on your return to your several counties by the same enlightened zeal for the public interest which you have manifested during the discharge of your parliamentary duties, and will do your utmost to encourage, by your example and active exertions, that spirit of order and submission to the law, which is essential to the public happiness, and without which there can be no enjoyment of the fruits of peaceful industry, and no advance in the career of social improvement."

On a sweltering day like that on which we write, we know no scene more refreshing to contemplate, than that the faithful representation of which is lying before us. The Bay of Dublin, in richness and variety of scenery, can compare with any other in the known world; indeed, with the exception of the Bay of Naples and that of Trincomalee, it is said to be the finest in the world. We are not competent to pursue a comparison between the bays; but we can freely and with all our heart admit, that we never desire to see any combination of land and water presenting more attractive features than Dublin Bay. Let us stretch ourselves upon the grass, under the shade of one of those bold granite rocks (Killiney) that form the foreground of our picture. These rocks overlook Dalkey, where you see that row of houses immediately beneath. The ruins of a castle form the nucleus of a small village, and many beautiful villas stud the ground, which stretches away from Dalkey to the left as far as Kingstown. Indeed, a more delightful bit of suburban scenery it would be impossible to find, than that which the eye wanders over from Donnybrook to Dalkey. From the elevated position we occupy on Killiney-hill, we look down upon this scene; from yonder wall, which intersects the inner and shallow portion of the bay, can this beautiful scenery be seen to most advantage. At the entrance of the bay the promontory of Howth lies at your right-hand, and Killiney to the left. From these points, lying at a distance of nearly seven miles from each other, the bay sweeps inward in a half-elliptical shape, to the extent of about six miles. The shore at the head of the bay, where the Liffey, Tolka, and Doddor rivers discharge themselves, is low; toward Blackrock it becomes more elevated; and beyond Kingstown, which is seen at the extreme left of our picture, it assumes a bold and lofty aspect. As a harbour, Dublin Bay has but few pretensions: were it not for artificial means, provided at an immense expense, the embouchure of the Liffey would be effectually choked up. The sand-banks on each side are called the North and South Bulls respectively. To protect the Liffey from the sands of the South Bull, a mound of gravel, thrown up between double stone walls, was commenced about a century ago; it terminated, after being carried to an extent of about 8000 feet, in a packet-station, called the Pigeon-house, now used as a depôt for military stores. The wall has since been prolonged to a considerable extent, and a lighthouse crowns its extremity. The insecurity and insufficiency of Dublin Bay as a harbour are amply compensated for, by the noble harbour of refuge at Kingstown. In this harbour we saw the Inconstant, a 36-gun frigate, and a great beauty she is, riding; and here also we saw, first and last, the ill-fated President. In less than four-and-twenty hours, and for less than £4, the Londoner may visit the metropolis of Ireland. The lover of nature will gladly linger amongst, and unwillingly leave, the exquisite localities in the vicinity of that city. Dear Dublin Bay! we shall not soon forget you, or the blue-eyed and bright-haired boy who was our companion when wandering through the green fields that border the village of Dalkey. May Heavenfguard him on whatever hill-side his light steps are wandering!



DUBLIN BAY.

THE LITTLE HORSE FROM JAVA,

We here present to our readers a portrait of the litle horse presented to her Majesty from Java, and the arrival of which was described in a short paragraph in the last number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. As the young Princess Royal has already commenced taking her pony airings, we may presume that this rare little Lilliputian of a palfrey will soon become one of the "pets of the palace."

TRIP TO FRANCE.—Mr. Green is now with us, and making all the necessary arrangements for his aërial flight. Should the wind be in the north direction, Mr. Green will be fully prepared to visit the coast of France. Report is rife that he will be accompanied by several persons, and a lady is spoken of as forming one of the number.—Somerset County Gazette.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—On Monday the sale at the Centenary Hall was resumed, when the tables were covered with a fresh supply of useful and ornamental articles, together with most interesting additions to the specimens of natural history, and of the manufactures and skill of the barbarian or half-savage nations, amongst which the widely-spread influence of this Society prevails. The chased rings and necklaces from Coomassie, the capital of Ashantee, which through the Society was first opened to British enterprise, were particularly striking, from the state to which that formidable race has brought the art of working in gold.

CROSBY HALL, BISHOPSGATE-STREET.—On Friday evening last the Rev. Charles Mackenzie, A.M., the vicar of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, delivered a most eloquent and excellent lecture "on the history and antiquities of the hall," in the spacious and beautifully fitted-up lecture and concert-room in the above ancient building, which has been taken possession of by the committee of management of the Metropolitan Literary and Scientific Institution.

We understand a separation has taken place between a wealthy knight at the West-end and his lady, who is some 30 years younger than himself. She is the youngest daughter of a highly-respectable clergyman in the south of Ireland, lately deceased, and the niece of a well-known public character in that country. Our reason for noticing this is to prevent any rumours detrimental to the lady's character, as the step is taken with the concurrence of mutual friends, unattended with misconduct on either side.—Morning Paper.

THE POTTERIES.—ATTACK BY THE COLLIERS.—TUNSTALL, Sunday evening.—We have had rather a formidable and unexpected attack here last night. Some colliers were taken up for begging, and the colliers at Longton having been apprised of their arrest, came into the town of Burslem late at night, and there being no soldiers in the place, they commenced a furious attack upon the lock-up, and took out the men who were in confinement. They then attacked several respectable private houses, and demolished the windows; after which they proceeded to the Town-hall, and played the deuce with that building, smashing all the windows, and destroying a most valuable public clock. They also attacked the house of the sergeant of police, and riddled his premises, not leaving a pane of glass or a whole shutter. The soldiers did not arrive until three o'clock in the morning, from Newcastle, by which time the rioters had decamped, and have not yet been arrested. I have not been able to ascertain the names of the parties who own the houses which have been attacked, but I believe [illegible]. The proprietor of the George Inn, I understand, has suffered very considerably by the damage done to the house and furniture; it is said £100 will not replace it. The magistrates are, no doubt, actively engaged looking after the offenders, and troops will be placed immediately at the discretion of the magistrates. The turn-out in South Staffordshire is yet unsettled, and numbers have been added to the discontented. A great number of meetings are to be held to-morrow in various parts of the district. I am told that the masters have, in many places, drawn up their horses out of the pits, and are resolved to stand out against the repeated demands. The men are begging in large parties in various places.

STRIKE OF SHIP CARPENTERS ON THE TYNE.—Last week nearly 200 men employed in the ship-building yards on the Tyne left their work in consequence of an attempt made by the master builders to reduce their wages. Up to the present time they have been paid at the rate of 24s. per week; they are now offered at the rate of 21s. The men are willing to engage for the latter sum with full work, but state that their time has been so short; that with four shillings per day they are only able to earn a bare maintenance. The employers have advertised for 150 men at the stipulated wages, and as there are not less than 700 shipwrights out of employ in Shields (South and North) and Sunderland—the business in the latter town being almost entirely stopped—there can be no doubt the requisite number of hands will soon be obtained. Up to Saturday not the least disturbance had taken place, although, of course, considerable excitement prevailed in that district on the subject.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. VI.

THE NEW CHURCH OF ST. THOMAS, CHARTERHOUSE

This is one out of the number of those places of worship which have lately sprung up under the auspices of the Metropolis Churches Fund. It is built on the site of a spacious piece of ground which was lately given, as a special benefaction, by the governors of the Charterhouse to that fund, and is capable of containing from 1200 to 1500 persons. The structure is of a chaste and elegant description, built in the old Norman style, from the designs of Mr. Edward Blore, the architect. The total cost incurred in its erection is £5560, and the person appointed to officiate is the Rev. Mr. James. It takes in the neighbouring parishes of St. Botolph and St. Luke, Middlesex, and portions of other districts, which contain upwards of 6000 people. It is intended to set apart a particular pew, or section of pews, for the use of the Charterhouse body, who are expected to be present at the ceremony of consecration, which will be performed by his Grace the Bishop of London, on Saturday (this day), the birthday of her Majesty the Queen Dowager. In addition to the church of St. Thomas, Charterhouse, there have also been erected twent-eight other churches in various parts of the metropolis. Active arrangements, we understand, are likewise in progress for the erection and endowment of thirty-seven more, and considerable assistance has been offered for the immediate commencement of ten others. Some of these belong exclusively to the Bethnal-green district, but the majority of them are scattered indiscriminately over various parts of the metropolis.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE HEMLOCK STONE,

BRAMCOTE HILLS.

Here is a prominent object in the landscape, which attracts the eye of the tourist between the Bramcote hills. It has an eccentric form, rude, rocky, and picturesque; and affording evidence of one of the pleasant freaks of nature or of time, and thrusting itself upon our notice much as does a man with giantude of height and limb, when he worms along before us in the streets. There is nothing about him very beautiful or interesting, but you look at him in spite of yourself. So with this Hemlock-stone, which is a mass of rock rising upward from the soil to an eminence of thirty feet (as tall as any three giants, to say the most of them), and growing at the summit, its one solitary sprig of foliage, the single friend of its bleak and bare bosom, and, as it would appear, not over green in its affections. The cold weather-beating of a few more winters will, doubtless, wear away and alter the features both of rock and shrub. The material of the Hemlock-stone is of the same material as that of the adjoining hills, and Doctor Stukeley's opinion is, that it is the remnant of a quarry, the stone of which has been dug or cut from around it. If the doctor is right, our previous interesting conception about time or nature is very handsomely overturned; but it is still not the less a feature of remark in the landscape, in which it preserves its singularity.

THE SUN FIRE OFFICE, CITY.

In presenting this noble edifice to the admiration of our readers we do not enter upon the purpose of the institution to which it belongs, but confine ourselves to such a description of the exterior as will serve to illustrate our beautiful engraving. The area of the plan is so irregular, as hardly to admit of a right angle in any part; and the utmost skill of the architect is demanded, to conceal a defect of such architectural consequence to accuracy in every feature of the arrangement.

The importance of the situation is equalled in extent by that of the frontage, which presents in the whole range upwards of 160 feet, by 58 feet in altitude; 40 openings (doors and windows) were demanded by the arrangement, a number and extent not easily accommodated to grace and variety. These are, however, sufficiently displayed in the disposition of the fronts, and the eye is gratified with variety, while the judgment is persuaded of the solidity which reigns throughout.

The building describes its purpose: the ground and first floors are obviously the official portions of the institution; the second and third floors display the accommodation handsomely provided for the resident manservants, both included within the columnar division of the elevation; which completing the always happy division of three, which the four ranges of windows (otherwise disposed) rendered difficult if not impossible.

The style reminds us of the Italian palaces frequently seen in Venice, Florence, and other capital cities of the favourite empire of the arts. In the rustic and the manly character of its architecture we trace the energetic San Michele; and in the order, and especially the bold entablature, the elegant Vignola. The roof displays itself according to the original types, relieved by the chimney-shafts, which here become ornamental.

The sculptured decorations are well calculated to aid the picture: in them we discover the character and purpose of the building. Sol cannot be mistaken, invested in his Grecian garb of the medals of Rhodes and other cities protected by the god of day. Flowers and fruits indicate the abundance of his produce, and the prosperous nature of an assurance establishment; intermixed are the helmet of the fire-brigade, and their implements of security from the devouring element. We do not disapprove these obvious readings, the legitimate ornaments of public institutions.

The contract for the building is taken by the enterprising builders, Messrs. Webb, and is to cost £18,500. It comprises the Fire and Life offices, in separate buildings, and the residences of the managing directors.

THE MODEL PRISON AT PENTONVILLE.

We have here an object which has attracted a good deal of the attention of the public, and which has been erected near what is called the Chalk-road, upon novel principles of prison architecture. It seems, moreover, to have met the spirit of the "Act for the better ordering" of this style of edifice, and also the countenance of the public authorities, inasmuch as a bill has been brought in by Sir James Graham and Mr. Manners Sutton, in which the following preamble is set forth:—that—

"Whereas it will be of great public advantage that a new prison be provided in which criminal offenders may be imprisoned and corrected, and may receive such instruction, and may be subjected to such discipline, as shall appear most conducive to their reformation and to the repression of crime, and that provision be made for the future disposal of such offenders:

"And whereas a building has been erected at Pentonville, in the county of Middlesex, which may be conveniently used for such purpose, and the same is now completed for the reception of convicts;

"Be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the said building shall be called 'the Pentonville Prison,' and shall be used as a prison for such offenders is hereinafter specified."

We believe the whole principle of the erection resolves itself into a greater uniformity of plan and purpose than has yet been exhibited in prison architecture. A more decided facility for the perfect classification of prisoners, and a total impossibility of any means of escape from the fact of a perpetual surveillance having been contrived to operate along the walls from every angle of the building. The exterior is less repulsive than that of many edifices of the kind; but what we have principally to hope, for the benefit of society, is, that the interior may be little and as seldom tenanted, so that it may be set up less as a symbol of punishment, than as a sign of the diminution of crime.

HINTS TO ELECTORS.—August 20 is the last day for leaving with the overseers objections to county voters. August 25 is the last day for the service of objections on electors in counties, or their tenants, and for the service on overseers of objections to borough electors; also the last day for the reception of claims as borough electors. August 28, overseers of parishes and townships to send lists of electors and lists of objections to the high constable of their respective hundreds. August 31, all taxes and rates payable on the 1st March must be paid on or before this day by all persons claiming to be enrolled as burgesses under the new Municipal Corporations Act.

THE LATE DUKE OF ORLEANS.

On Thursday the 4th inst., the mortal remains of the Duke of Orleans were committed to the sepulchral vault of his family at Dreux. This vault was built by the Duchess Dowager of Orleans, daughter and heiress of the Duke of Penthievre, in an old chateau of her ancestors, Counts of Dreux. It is covered by a chapel, of which the spires alone rise above the grove around it. All along the road from Paris to Dreux, by Versailles, Pont Chartrain, and Houclars, the National Guard, population, and authorities, received the funeral procession with honours and mourning.

Before we proceed to lay before our readers the details of the interment, we may be allowed to call their attention to the performance of the funeral ceremonies which took place at Notre Dame, and which, says Galignani, must rest without parallel for magnificence and solemn pomp. The crowds which visited Notre Dame during the three last days, were struck with the rich solemnity of the scene; but the vague ideas communicated from the casual view obtained in a hasty visit, sink into insignificance compared with the deep impression left on the minds of the spectators, by the splendour and deep religious feeling which pervaded the whole ceremony of Wednesday.

At nine o'clock the doors of the cathedral were opened, and the public admitted. All the steps and sides of the various staircases leading to the tribunes were covered with black. The light of day had been so carefully excluded from every part of the interior of the church, that the eye of the spectator could not at first distinguish more than the leading features of the funeral decorations. By degrees, as the gloom became more familiar, the details gradually unfolded themselves, and it was universally acknowledged, that the effect was in the highest degree magnificent and solemn. When the public were admitted, the workmen had not altogether completed their arrangements, and it was not until eleven o'clock that the last of the tapers and chandeliers were lighted; not less than two hours and a half having been taken up in the operation.

All the galleries and seats throughout the cathedral were covered with black cloth, and the interior of the former was hung with the same material, thickly studded with silver stars. The immense body of the nave, from the vaulted ceiling to the ground, was entirely covered with black, decorated above with a frieze of Byzantine ornaments, in rich silver embroidery. The pillars were closely enveloped with black as far as the capitals, the ogives, however, being left bare, and standing out in admirable relief from the black hangings. Between the pillars banners of black and blue silk, embroidered with silver, were suspended, bearing the words: Orus, Coleah, Blidah, Bouffarick, Douera, Mihah, and Bibans, where the Prince fought at the head of the army in Africa. Huge banners of black and blue silk, richly embroidered, bearing the cipher F. P. O., were also suspended from the vaulted roof; immense silver poles through the upper part of them, with large silver ornaments at the sides, and with immense silver tassels falling from the lower corners. Two ranges of sepulchral silver lamps, of exquisite form and workmanship, were suspended from the roof at each side of the centre aisle, and a third row went down the middle. These were of great beauty, and each contained thirty-six burners. The side aisles were lighted up in a similar manner. A range of silver candelabra of antique form, with urns at the top to contain incense or other inflammable matter, said to be designed by Isabey, ran down each side of the church. Between the pillars galleries were constructed for the public, and under the organ similar structures were erected. Under the galleries ran a rich frieze of silver embroidery, and high up on the side aisles, below the groins of the roof, a similar line of ornament was placed. Silver lace of the richest description ran down the black hangings along the pillars, and the black round the gothic arches was edged with the same material. Silver stars were sprinkled in profusion on the hangings of the side aisles, and on the upper part of the centre aisle. Eight ranges of seats were erected at each side, down the whole length of the centre aisle, rising one over the other, and covered with black, the lowest row on the ground, and the highest rising to mid-distance between the plinth and capital of the pillars. These extensive amphitheatres were destined for the deputations of the National Guards and of the troops of the line. The transepts were entirely covered with structures of seats, rising one above the other to a considerable height, where the Peers and Deputies took their places. The upper part of the choir was decorated like the nave, and the galleries of this part were ornamented with stars, Greek crosses, and cyphers. A mosaic dazzling with embroidery, a frieze of the same description, and ninety silver lamps ornamented the high altar in front of the cross.

In the centre of the church, at the cross, rose the catafalque, which was one of the most splendid constructions of the kind ever beheld. A large pedestal, 58 feet on every side, served as a platform for 14 cariatides of silver, supporting, with their colossal dimensions, the raised platform on which was placed the coffin. An immense canopy, 106 feet high, of embroidered velvet, lined with ermine, descended from the top of the vaulted ceiling on the sides of the catafalque. The curtains were tied up to the pillars of the cross by tri-coloured flags. A flight of 25 steps, decorated with candelabras, similar to those in the aisle, and urns for incense, ascending to a level with the platform. All round the body tapers were placed, amounting in number to 500. In the upper part of the canopy a vast number of lights were burning, thickened so as to form circles, and placed in the centre in the form of a crown. In the aisle beyond the catafalque, rows of lights were also placed in silver lamps, thus lighting up brilliantly all parts of the building.

In entering by the grand portal, when all this vast number of lights were burning, the first appearance of the church was absolutely dazzling. All the fires, darting forth their rays along the long black vault on so much silver chasing and embroidery, produced on the eye, for a moment, the painful sensation of a hasty glance at the sun. When the first surprise was past, and that the eye could steadily view the decorations, the character of mourning, though on a very magnificent scale, was so clearly marked out in the general arrangements of the cathedral, that the heart grew cold, as it thought of the sad occasion of all this pomp. The grand object amidst the whole was at once perceived to be the catafalque; and the architect's object was evidently to make every other decoration in the church subsidiary to the effect which that construction should produce. The brilliant mass of light with which it was surrounded—the profusion of silver embroidery which decorated it, and which went on increasing in splendour from the lowest step of the pedestal to the top—the ducal crown by which the whole was surmounted, all contributed to make it the dominant object in the church.

At half-past ten o'clock the various great bodies of the state and the schools began to arrive, and the seats below began to fill. The heat at this period was excessive, from the vast number of lights, and the female part of the congregation suffered severely. The crowd increased by degrees, as the different deputations arrived, and at a quarter to eleven the whole aisle was one moving mass of uniforms, embroidery, and costumes of various bodies, as generals and staff-officers, ambassadors, the members of the council and of the chambers, moved on to take their seats. The hum of voices and the sound of feet, necessarily consequent on the entrance and arrangements of so many thousand persons, gradually increased until within five minutes before eleven, when it reached its height. At that moment a slight "hush" was heard, and instantly the voices became silent, and the order and solemnity suitable to the occasion were restored. The huge bell of Notre Dame, which had from time to time throughout the morning sent forth a melancholy toll, now sounded continuously, and amidst its mournful peal the clergy moved forward in grand procession towards the grand portal to receive the princes.

The different bodies then immediately took their seats. Beyond and near the catafalque, on the right, between the transepts, were placed the chief employés of the different ministers, the members of the diplomatic body, the Council of State, the Court of Cassation, headed by M. Portalis, the first president; the Institute, conducted by M. Victor Hugo; the municipality of Paris, the staff of the National Guard, and the deputations from the several legions, extending to the end of the nave.

On the left, near the catafalque, were the marshals, admirals, the Court of Accounts, with M. Barthe at their head, the Cour Royale, led by M. Séguier, and other courts of law, and the governor, directors, and other officers of the Bank of France, the deputations from the staffs of the army and navy, and the military schools.

In the middle of the aisle, near the catafalque, cross seats were placed, which were filled by the aides-du-camps, orderly officers, equerries, and other officers of the royal household. The Chamber of Peers took their places in the right transept, with the Chancellor and Grand Referdary at their head, and at their right were placed the Ambassadors and their several employés. Amongst them was seen Lord Cianricarde, formerly ambassador at the Court of Russia, who had come from London to attend this ceremony, the Duke of Orleans having honoured him with his friendship. At the left of the Chamber of Peers was the Council of State, with M. Girod (de l'Ain) at their head. The Chamber of Deputies sat opposite to the Peers, in the other transept. In the part of the church reserved to the choir, the Archbishop of Paris took his place, surrounded by the suffragan bishops of his diocese, the chapter of Notre Dame, the curés of all the parishes of Paris, the curé of Neuilly, and the chaplains of the civil and military establishments, amounting in all to nearly 300 clergymen. The Bishop of the Holy Land and the Chevalier Bandini dei Pitti, in his dress as belonging to the Order of Jerusalem, were present.

The upper galleries near the choir were occupied by the ladies of honour of the Queen and of the Princesses, the ladies of the ambassadors, the wives and relations of the ministers and other persons of high rank.

Precisely at eleven a salvo of twenty-one guns, fired from behind the cathedral, announced the arrival of the Duke de Nemours, the Prince de Joinville, the Duke d'Aumale, and the Duke de Montpensier. The Princes, who were attended by the officers of the King's household, as well as their own, were met at the porch by the Archbishop and his clergy. They wore long mourning cloaks over their uniforms, and took their seats on the chairs placed for them at the foot of the catafalque. Their countenances were exceedingly sad, and their whole bearing was very much cast down. The Duke de Nemours and the Prince de Joinville sat in the centre, the Duke d'Aumale on the right, and the Duke de Montpensier on the left. On the right of the Princes, a little behind, sat the Ministers, and on the left Marshals, in full uniform. As soon as the Princes had taken their places the funeral service immediately commenced. The "De profundis" was chanted in the choir behind the catafalque, low at first, but when the choristers joined in, gradually swelling into a rich and mournful harmony. The great organ of the cathedral was not used, but a small one was fixed below near the catafalque, and its grave notes added much to the effect of the service. The mass for the dead was given in full choir, in which the whole of the clergy joined, their voices rolling through the whole space, and rising to the vault, at once solemn and affecting. The moment of the elevation of the host was announced to those outside the cathedral by the firing of a cannon, and to the troops by the rolling of the drums.

The service lasted two hours and twenty minutes. It was indeed a sight well worth speaking of, to see the great portal of Notre Dame pour forth the long tide of the most remarkable men in France. An immense crowd was also collected during the day outside, in the neighbourhood of Notre Dame. The utmost order prevailed, and from every side might be heard homely, yet heartfelt, expressions of deep regret for the melancholy cause of the service in the cathedral, and the deepest sympathy for the Royal Family. If the Royal Family can receive any consolation in their great affliction, it must be from the universal feeling of sympathy and devotedness expressed for them by every class in the nation.

THE FUNERAL.

At half-past one o'clock the procession entered the town of Dreux, amidst an immense assemblage of people, and numerous National Guards. Those from Vendome had come 35 leagues to be present at this doleful ceremony. Three hundred priests were collected in the parish, under the Bishop of Chartres. At half-past two the head of the procession enter the Chateau. The King was at the royal chapel waiting for the Princes, when they entered at half-past three. The last offices were performed amidst the sobs of those attending, and an indiscribable emotion. The King sustained himself with admirable courage, in spite of his deep grief. Never was he surrounded with more universal and respectful testimonies of sympathy and devotedness. The ceremonies concluded at four o'clock. The King retired into his apartment with the Princes his sons. At half-past five his Majesty and their royal highnesses set out on their return to Neuilly, accompanied by prolonged cries of 'Vive le roi."

The following account of the ceremony is given in Galignani's Messenger:—"At the entrance of the town, from the Paris road, two obelisk columns were erected, one on each side, in imitation of black and white marble, each surmounted by a star, from which hung suspended large wreaths of laurel, intermingled with cypress On the front of the columns were medallions, containing the initials of his Royal Highness, and the names of the different places at which the Prince had been in action. Across the road, from the top of these funeral pillars, was suspended a deep black drapery, thickly studded with silver stars, festooned up in the centre by a large escutcheon, bearing the initials of the deceased, and surrounded by military trophies veiled with crape. From this point the whole length of the street, through which the cortège passed to the church of St. Pierre, and thence to the royal chapel, was hung on both sides with a drapery of black cloth, ornamented with stars, medallions, and wreaths of laurel, presenting a coup-d'œil of the most striking, but, at the same time, melancholy character. Every shop throughout the town, whether in the line of march of the procession or not, was closed; and from the general aspect of sadness, and the almost universal adoption of mourning, a stranger arriving in the town would have imagined that every family had been bereaved of some loved member."

Previous to reaching the church of St. Pierre the Princes descended from their carriage, and fell into the line of the procession, following the car on foot as chief mourners. The cortège was headed by a squadron of hussars, and followed in succession by detachments of gendarmerie, artillery, infantry, Orleans' chasseurs, and national guards—the latter force having marched in large numbers from every part of the department. The clergy, among whom were the Bishops of Chartres, Evreux, Meaux, and Versailles, came next in succession, all attired in their high canonicals, and headed by the officers of the church bearing different religious emblems, the choristers chaunting the "De profundis." Immediately after the clergy came the Urn, containing the heart of the deceased Prince. It was borne on a mourning bier carried by four of the royal household in deep mourning, and covered with a pall of black velvet richly studded, the corners of which were held by Generals Marbot and Baudrand. The funeral car, which was the same as that used in the transport of the body from Neuilly to Notre Dame, next followed in the procession, and immediately behind it were three orderly officers of the late Duke's staff, bearing on cushions a coronet and the insignia of his different orders. The corners of the pall were held by two marshals and two general officers. Then followed their royal highnesses the Princes. They were dressed in the uniforms of their respective services, and wearing black mourning cloaks. Immediately after them followed a brilliant staff of general officers, and all the high civil and military authorities of the department, the members of the bar, and a large number of the principal inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood, all clad in deep mourning. The rear of the procession was brought up by detachments of military, corresponding to those in advance, the whole closed by a brigade of artillery.

On arriving at the church of St. Pierre, the body was removed from the car and placed on the catafalque, while the service was performed. During this period their royal highnesses, who were placed opposite the body, appeared absorbed in grief, but evidently struggled to subdue their feelings. At the conclusion of this service, which lasted little more than half an hour, the cortège again formed in the same order as that above described, and proceeded towards the Chateau, where the chapel is situated.

The filing-up of the royal chapel was at once chaste and solemnly grand. On arriving at the outer gate, the military filed off on each side, allowing the clergy to form the head of the procession, and, when the car had entered, his Majesty, who had arrived during the night, joined the procession, placing himself before the royal dukes. His Majesty, who assumed all the firmness he could command, looked sadly worn and pale from intense mental suffering. On reaching the chapel, the body was removed, and placed on the catafalque, his Majesty and the royal dukes taking their seats in front of it. All seemed overwhelmed with affliction, and the fortitude of the King, though for some time nobly sustained, at length yielded to his emotions—the aged monarch mingled his tears with those of his children, and the uncontrollable agony of the royal sufferer found its way to every heart. The sorrow of the Princes was also most affecting to witness; and altogether a scene more painfully afflicting it is impossible to describe or to imagine. The ceremony of high mass was performed by the Archbishop of Paris amid the tears of all who were admitted to the chapel, which number was chiefly confined to the royal suite and chief authorities, by reason of its smallness. After the body had been removed to the vault, the King and the Princes were left with it almost alone, and here the affliction of the family is described as of the most heart-rending and agonizing description. They sobbed aloud, and it was some time before they could tear themselves away from the spot. As the clock struck four, a salute of artillery announced that the mortal remains of the lamented prince had been deposited in their last long home, by the side of a sister—only less beloved—the Princess Marie, Duchess of Wurtemberg.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

University College, London.—The Council of University College have filled up the vacancy in the Professorship of Latin, by appointing to that chair Mr. G. Long, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, the gentleman who was Professor of Greek in the University of London at its opening, and for several subsequent years. Mr. Key, the late Professor of Latin, will for the future confine himself to the management of the junior school, of which he has been appointed sole head master. Mr. Malden will continue to give lessons in Greek to the senior class in the junior school; but, with this exception, he will employ all his energies in the discharge of the duties of the Greek Professorship in the College.

St. Paul's Cathedral.—This splendid national edifice, one of the finest productions of Sir Christopher Wren, a miniature of the celebrated St. Peter's, at Rome, is now undergoing a thorough cleansing in the interior, and repair on the dome or cupola. For the last half century the interior has not had the least improvement in its embellishment, and some of the finest specimens of ancient architecture of our immortal Wren have been nearly lost to the public in consequence of the accumulation of dust and the influence of the carbonic atmosphere that prevails throughout the greatest and most commercial city in Europe. A number of mechanics are daily at work in painting, scrubbing, and restoring the interior to its former grandeur. The choir, one of the finest specimens of old English oak, will be completely renovated. The dome is also undergoing many repairs, and men are suspended in baskets to fill up the apertures that have been made by the work of time. It is expected that divine service will be suspended at least for the next two months, during which period the public are excluded from examining the beautiful specimens of sculpture of the feats of our bravest heroes, both naval and military, who have fallen in their country's cause in foreign lands. Great complaints are made at the charge of 2d. that is exacted from every individual who wishes to enter the cathedral, although undergoing repair. On Sunday last no less than 500 to 800 persons were disappointed, expecting that the usual service would be performed.

The Thames Tunnel.—There were rather more than 20,000 visitors to the Thames Tunnel last week, being more than double the average number that has heretofore inspected this extraordinary work within the same period of time. The grand staircase, just opened on the Middlesex side, excites general admiration.

On Saturday night a barge, the property of Mr. Joyce, a lighterman, and laden with provisions, was sunk off Rotherhithe by the swell of a steamer going down the river, the name of which has not yet been made known. The whole of the provisions were turned out of the craft into the river. Several casks of beef and pork have been since recovered, but many still remain under water. The loss is estimated at £200.

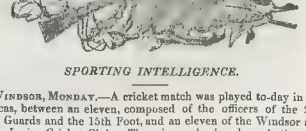
The Weather.—Thunder Storm.—The weather for the last three or four days has been exceedingly hot, particularly on Wednesday, when the thermometer at noon reached 90 degrees. In the morning the wind was south, and soon after day-break clouds appeared gathering from the south-west, notwithstanding which, however, the sun continued to shine brilliantly until the afternoon, and towards 4 o'clock the gathering clouds betokened an approaching storm. Shortly before 5 o'clock a gentle shower of rain commenced, and the wind suddenly shifted and blew up fresh from the west, and soon afterwards the metropolis and for miles around, particularly the south and western suburbs, were visited by a storm of thunder and lightning; but not of so terrific a character as that which occasioned so much damage a few days since. The storm lasted about half an hour, during which it rained heavily, but about 6 o'clock the rain abated. Towards 7 o'clock the heavens again became overcast, and more rain fell, accompanied by distant thunder, and at dusk the appearance of the sky indicated a return of the storm, which occurred about midnight, and continued with great violence for above two hours.

Alarming Fires.—On Monday morning, about a quarter after one o'clock, a fire, which for some time threatened the most serious consequences, broke out in the premises tenanted by Mr. Robinson, brush-maker, &c., No. 23, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, situate on the north side, immediately opposite the Freemasons' Hall. At the period mentioned, some persons in passing the premises perceived a peculiar light in the lower part, underneath the front shop, and upon the policemen of the neighbourhood being called to the spot, it was ascertained that a fire was on the eve of breaking out. Soon after, the alarm being given, the inmates appeared at the first floor front windows, in their night apparel. They had endeavoured to escape by the street-door, which opens into a narrow court alongside of the premises; but on account of the smoke, which was pouring up in dense volumes, they returned to the first floor, from which they effected a safe escape, by walking along the leads to the houses adjoining, though greatly frightened. On the arrival of the first engines from the brigade station in High Holborn, no time was lost in getting them in full operation, and the fire was gradually subdued.—On Sunday night, soon after nine o'clock, a fire broke out in the dwelling-house occupied by Mrs. Hart, No. 16, Goulston-street, Whitechapel. Although several engines were quickly on the spot, it was not extinguished until the back room on the first floor was burnt out. The origin is unknown.

Accident.—On Monday afternoon the following accident, which had nigh been attended with most serious consequences, occurred on the high road at Kensington. About five o'clock, the carriage of his Grace the Duke of Beaufort was proceeding from the noble duke's residence in Arlington-street, Piccadilly, to Hampton Court Palace, drawn by four horses with postilions, when just after it had passed through the High-street, Kensington, it came in contact with a brougham drawn by two horses, which was proceeding in the same direction, by which the latter was completely overturned, and the splinter bar of his grace's carriage was broken and the wheel horses thrown down. In the carriage were the noble duke, Lady Augusta Somerset, with a female attendant, and a gentleman named Smith, who immediately alighted, having sustained no injury; and in the brougham was a gentleman named Burnand, residing at No. 8, Bolton-street, Piccadilly, who also escaped serious injury. Both the coachman of the brougham and the wheel postilion of the carriage were precipitated from their seats, the latter falling under the pole, but fortunately escaped with a few bruises. Both of the wheelers, which were horses of great value, were much injured on the knees, &c., and were sent off as soon as possible to the stables. One of the horses of the brougham was also injured. The Duke of Beaufort's coach was immediately taken to the factory of Messrs. Wiseman and Cole, coachmakers, a few doors off, and the damage was repaired sufficiently for the noble party (who in the interim waited at the house of a gentleman named Smith, next door,) to proceed, which they did in half an hour with the remaining pair of horses. The accident was occasioned by the brougham stopping suddenly as the carriage was passing it.

Extensive Robbery by a Servant.—On Wednesday a young man named Charles Frederick Hibbott, about 24 years of age, of respectable appearance, underwent examination before the Rev. D. Walmesley and Mr. G. Baillie, magistrates at Hanwell, Middlesex, on the charge of having stolen a cash-box, containing upwards of £100 in notes and gold, the property of his master, Mr. Mark Hayes, cheesemonger, in the township of New Brentford. The prisoner was traced by Policeman Hanley to the neighbourhood of Blackwall, where it was ascertained he had been making large purchases of clothes, &c., with a view of embarking for New Zealand, and taken into custody. The case being conclusive against the prisoner, he was fully committed to Newgate for trial at the Central Criminal Court.

Accident at Sir John Yarde Buller's.—An accident of a very dreadful character has happened at the stables of Sir John Yarde Buller, M.P. for South Devonshire, whose town residence is in Whitehall-place, and the stables at the back, in Scotland-yard, near the chief station-house. It appears, by inquiry at the spot, that Sherborne, the coachman, had gone to bed about ten o'clock, when he was alarmed by hearing a crash in front of the window. It should be stated that a bar is usually placed across the door of the loft over the stable, where Mrs. Sherborne and her family lived. His daughter, at the time she heard the noise, exclaimed, "Why, mother has thrown the pail out of the window;" to which he replied, believing it was so, "She must go and fetch it up again." From something that afterwards occurred he was induced to go down stairs, and then saw his wife lying on the stone pavement below, and bleeding dreadfully from injuries on her head and face. She was quite insensible, and conveyed on a stretcher to Charing-cross Hospital, where she lies in a very dangerous state. It seems that she must have been throwing some water from the pail, and the bar being away, she fell out and pitched upon her head.



SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

Windsor, Monday.—A cricket match was played to-day in the Brocas, between an eleven, composed of the officers of the 2nd Life Guards and the 15th Foot, and an eleven of the Windsor and Eton Junior Cricket Club. The science displayed on both sides was of the first order, and it is seldom we have witnessed a match which excited so much interest, or was so spiritedly contested. The ground throughout the day was crowded with spectators, and shortly the game terminated in favour of the garrison with nine wickets to go down.

Rifle Shooting by the Hon. C. A. Murray.—The Hon. C. A. Murray, the master of her Majesty's household, having wagered with another member of the royal establishment that he would kill 40 rabbits with a single-barrelled rifle in 12 hours upon one of the royal preserves in the neighbourhood of the Great Park, at Windsor, the affair, which created considerable interest, came off on Monday morning at Norfolk-farm. The Hon. Mr. Murray commenced at the early hour of six o'clock; and such was the excellent character of the shooting, that within four hours 43 rabbits were bagged, only five discharges failing in their effect.

Partridges.—Never by the oldest sportsman has it been remembered that partridges have proved so abundant as they do this year in the neighbourhood of Andover. On the large farms adjoining the downs the coveys run so strong that, in some instances, no less than 18 young birds have been noticed in one company. The same favourable account of the broods of this season is received from Wallop, Tedworth, Shipton, Munston, and the districts around. The birds are very forward, and unusually strong on the wing, and several sporting parties are expected from London at Andover in the course of another few days, preparatory to their taking the field on the 1st proximo.

CRICKET.—KENT v. ENGLAND.—The match with Kent and England terminated on Thursday shortly before two o'clock, by Barker fetching 29 and Feaner 19 runs, which gave, with 9 byes and 1 wide ball, a score of 58. Thus giving the palm to England, with 9 wickets to go down. Good had been in the previous evening, but was bowled by Hillyer without scoring.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

PORTSMOUTH, August 6.—The Imaum was commissioned on Sunday, by Lieutenant F. A. P. Stewart, as the guard-ship at Jamaica, in lieu of the Magnificent. The George IV., having taken in a quantity of the bread intended for the use of the naval and military forces in China, the St. Helena Regiment embarked on board on Thursday afternoon. The troops were conveyed from the Isle of Wight to Spithead by the Echo steamer. The George IV. will sail at daylight to-morrow morning. The Columbia, steam-vessel, Lieutenant-Commander Kortright, left Woolwich yesterday for Plymouth, where she will be paid in advance, and then sail for North America, to commence a survey of the Bay of Fundy, under the direction of Capt. Owen. The Wolf, 18, Commander Hayes, is ordered to the East Indies, and was to sail to-day from Plymouth. The Moffatt, convict ship, sailed on Saturday evening, partly loaded with convicts for Hobart Town; she calls at Plymouth to complete her cargo, taking from this port the man Bolton, Admiral Bouverie's late servant, transported for attempting to kill the housekeeper. The ships Agincourt and Plantagenet, both for Calcutta, sailed on Monday. The ship Thomas Sparkes, for New Zealand, sailed on Tuesday. She has on board two racing horses of first-rate celebrity, and will embark twenty mares at the Cape of Good Hope. The Royal West India Mail steam-ship Isis, commanded by J. F. Loney, Esq., late of her Majesty's steamer Lizard, sailed from Southampton on the 1st instant, taking out thirty-two passengers and a large quantity of quicksilver. The Frolic, 16, building by Captain Hendry, will be launched at this yard in the course of this month, and commissioned immediately afterwards. The Rhadamanthus steam vessel, Master-Commander T. Laen, is under orders to hold herself in readiness to receive on board Lord Stuart de Rothesay, for a passage to St. Petersburg. His lordship is expected to leave England for the court of Russia about the latter end of the present or early in the ensuing month. The Imaum of Muscat's corvette has been towed down to Woolwich to be docked and refitted there. The Monkey, steamer, came into harbour this evening from Woolwich. The Lightning arrived at Pembroke Dock, on the 27th ult. with Captain Wilson, Lieutenant Ramsey, and a detachment of Royal Marines, from Chatham, to relieve those who had been there for the last two years, who left in the Lightning, on the 28th, for Woolwich; and on the same day Captain Watson proceeded to Pembroke to relieve Captain Smith, stationed there on the recruiting service. The Lightning returned yesterday, and sailed to-day for Chatham, with a number of invalids from the Guards and other regiments serving at Canada, brought home in the Resistance troop-ship.

It is said that government is about to re commission twelve of the 10 gun-packet brigs to convey as before the West India mails. This much is certain, an inquiry has been made by the Admiralty as to the time it will take to give the following a refit for immediate temporary service:—Alert, Star, Pandora, Delight, Hope, Lapwing, Lyra, Magnet, Pigeon, Sheldrake, Tyrian, and Seagull. These brigs were recently paid off at Plymouth, as the royal mail steamers have superseded them. If these brigs are intended to convey the mails across the Atlantic, they ought to be dispatched from the harbour of Valentia, near Cahir, the extreme S. W. of Ireland; they would then always make a passage; and if they come here with easterly winds, they should land their mails from Spithead.

The Montrose steamer arrived at Southampton this afternoon (Saturday), and brings the extraordinary intelligence that Spain has declared war against Portugal. The Spanish troops are already assembling in large numbers on the frontier, and particularly in the vicinity of Braganza, at which point, we presume, hostilities will commence between the two countries. -Hampshire Telegraph.

VISIT OF THE LORDS OF THE ADMIRALTY TO WOOLWICH DOCKYARD. The Right Hon. the Earl of Haddington, Vice-Admiral Sir William Hall Gage, G.C.H.; Rear-Admiral Sir George Francis Seymour, Knt., C.B. and G.C.H.; Lords Commissioners, the Hon. Sidney Herbert, M.P., First Secretary to the Admiralty, and Captain H. R. Brandreth, R.E. and F.R.S., Director of Architectural and Engineering works, arrived on Saturday, shortly before twelve o'clock, in the Queen steam-vessel, at Woolwich, and were received by Captain Sir Francis A. Collier, Knt., C.B., and K.C.H., Superintendent of the Royal Dockyard. Their lordships, on landing, proceeded to the smithery, to witness the work in progress at that extensive department, and examined the whole of the powerful machinery in operation for forging anchors, welding iron, and making bolts for the use of the navy. Their lordships afterwards visited all the working departments in the yard, and witnessed the testing of a large anchor, by Brunnah's powerful machine. An examination of the works at the new basin and the new dock occupied a portion of their lordship's time, and they appeared greatly pleased with the manner in which the whole were executed. The time occupied by their lordships in examining the dockyard on this occasion was upwards of five hours, and was so taken up with the works, that they were unable to visit any of the offices. Amongst the inventions submitted, was a plan by which the approach of icebergs could be detected. The invention is by a Monsieur Clement, and is said to consist in the application of a clock, or kind of dial-plate, with moveable indicators, connected with the compass of the vessel. Their lordships have placed the Black Eagle steam-vessel at the disposal of Monsieur Clement, for a period not exceeding fifteen days, to test the working of his invention and its application to actual service.

GENERAL ELPHINSTONE.—The United Service Gazette says, the remains of the gallant and ill-used General Elphinstone have been interred with military honours within the walls of Jellalabad. His exculpatory memoir is, it says, to be kept secret, because it reveals facts calculated to excite the deepest indignation against Lord Auckland's government, whose feelings and those of his colleagues are not to be lacerated by its publication! The publication in question expresses a hope, that the friends of General Elphinstone in this country will be no parties to a compact made at the expense of the fair fame of their distinguished relative. It is their duty, no less to his memory than to the service to which he belonged, to place General Elphinstone's memoir at once before the public.

We have been informed from good authority that the present system of forming a few regiments into two battalions of six companies each is merely a temporary arrangement, and that when the pressure on the army shall be relieved, by the close of the war in China and in India, the two extra companies shall be reduced, by drafting the men into the remaining ten companies, and placing the officers on temporary half-pay. This reduction, however, cannot take place for a considerable period; and, contrary to the opinion of many, we maintain that the military force cannot be reduced, even though the China war and the outbreaks in India were ended. Without doubt we must hereafter retain a protecting force in China, and in our Eastern empire a much larger proportion of Europeans will be employed than heretofore. We have heard that officers have hesitated to accept promotion in the corps augmented to twelve companies, but we think they have needless fears of reduction to half-pay. We even venture to predict that a still further augmentation of regiments to the establishment of twelve companies will take place before another year, if we may take the present aspect of Eastern and Western affairs as our guide. We regret to say that our army has in no degree been placed on the same effective scale of numbers as the navy has been during the last two years.—Naval and Military Gazette.

HULL, August 7.—The Betsey, of Whitby, was wrecked near Mablethorpe on the 29th ult., crew saved. The Jealous, of Whitby (coal laden), is ashore near Marsh Chapel, and expected to become a wreck.

YARMOUTH, August 6.—The Margaret (schooner), of and for London, came into the roads last night with trifling damage, having been in contact off the Cockle; the John and Ann, of Belfast, came into harbour last night with the loss of bowsprit, &c.

BARTON, August 6.—The Eleanor, from Barbadoes, at this port, fell in with, on the 13th July, in lat. 39 25 N., long. 48 W., an iceberg 100 feet in length, and above 20 feet in height, and on the 19th passed a wreck keel up, and at times part of the hull, in lat. 45 22, long. 26 40, about 90 feet long, and covered with barnacles.

WISBEACH, August 6.—The Marianne, from Stettin to London, passed Elsinore on the 21st June, and has not been since heard of.

ARBROATH, August 3.—The Louisa (sloop), of this port, in entering the harbour got on the rocks, and is expected to become a wreck.

NEW YORK, July 16.—The Margaret Hogg, from Monte Video to Havannah, which put into Nassau on the 20th ult., in distress, struck the gungerbread ground of the Great Bahama Banks, but got off after throwing part of her cargo overboard, with seven feet water in her hold, and considerable damage. The voyage has been abandoned.

DUBLIN, August 3.—The Robert Johnstone, from Barletta, has been got off without apparent damage, and is now dischargng.

The Woodlands arrived at St. John's, New Brunswick, from Philadelphia, got ashore on Grand Mehan the 4th inst., and sustained considerable damage. A headboard, nine feet long, with "Souther" carved and gilded on it, was picked up near Quoddy Lighthouse on the 6th inst.; two heavy cabin chairs were picked up near the same place.

GIBRALTAR, July 28.—The Little Nile, bound to Alexandria, was spoke on the 16th inst., going into Sardinia to repair very trifling damage received during a gale on the 15th, by the Cynosure, arrived here.

The Leland, arrived in the Downs, spoke the John M'Adam (steamer), bound to Newfoundland (out 60 days), under sail, having only three days' fuel on board, on the 25th ult., in lat. 46, long. 34.

PORTSMOUTH, August 6.—Arrived, her Majesty's steamer Hydra. Sailed, George IV., for St. Helena, &c. The Carsbalton Park arrived here from Jamaica; on the 11th ult., in lat. 42, long. 50, fell in with eight icebergs, the largest one being 400 feet high, with a reef running to the eastward four or five miles long; next day fell in with her Majesty's ship Crocodile, running free; warned her, and she hauled her wind to the southward.

We have no direct information respecting the intention of Government with regard to resuming the conveyance of the mails to and from the West Indies by sailing-vessels; but we have reason to believe that such a mode of transit will shortly be adopted, the Royal Mail Steam Company having altogether failed to accomplish a speedier and better conveyance of the mails and passengers. It is calculated that this company, on winding up, will be losers of nearly half a million sterling.—Falmouth Packet.

WOOLWICH, August 10.—The Black Eagle steam-vessel left Woolwich yesterday evening for Ostend, to convey his serene highness the reigning Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha to England, on a visit to her Majesty and her royal consort Prince Albert, son of his serene highness, who is expected to be present at the prorogation of Parliament, and will remain at the court of England until after the anniversary of the birthday of Prince Albert, the 36th inst.

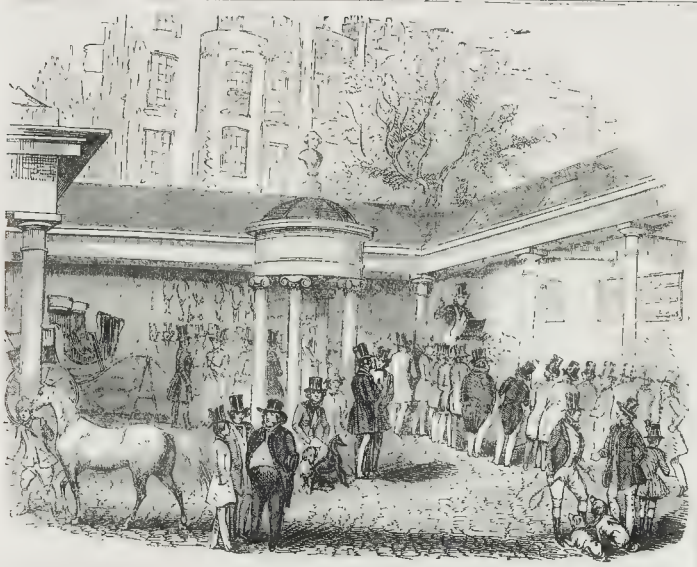
Two very fine, although small, steam-vessels, both named Queen, have been built for Government; one is intended as a present from her Majesty to the Imaum of Muskat; and the native seamen of that country, who arrived here in the Arab, ten-gun barque, presented by the Imaum to her Majesty, with many other presents, will return in the steam-vessel to their original places of abode. The Arab is at present in dock at Woolwich, and the native seamen are accommodated on board the hulk of the Sulphur brig, lately paid off, where they will remain until the Queen steam-vessel is ready for their reception. The other steam-vessel named the Queen is intended for the use of the Lords of the Admiralty when visiting her Majesty's dockyards in their official capacity; the Black Eagle, hitherto employed by their lordships, although well adapted for voyages down the river, being too large to permit of proceeding to Somerset-house, where their lordships will probably embark on future occasions in the Queen. It is intended to convert the hulk of the Sulphur barque into a receiving-ship for sick or diseased sailors, and she will be attached to the Dreadnought Hospital, stationed at Greenwich.

AN UNGAZETTED TRAIT AT GHUZNEE.—While the Affghans were disputing our entrance into the citadel, an incident occurred which, for a moment, diverted the attention of the combatants, and turned their fury into pity. Amongst the foremost of the party who signalised themselves by their desperate gallantry was an aged chieftain, the richness of whose costume excited general attention, his turban and weapon being resplendent with jewels. The hope of plunder immediately marked him out as an object of attack, and numbers at once assailed him. He defended himself like a man who knew there was no chance of life, but was resolved to sell it as dearly as he could. He had killed several of the Queen's Royals, and also severely wounded Captain Robinson, when a grenadier of the company to which the latter belonged, seeing his officer in danger, rushed to his assistance, and with a thrust of his bayonet, brought the gallant old chieftain to the ground. The grenadier was about to dispatch him, when a beautiful girl, about 17, threw herself into the melee, and plunged a dagger in his breast. She then cast herself on the body of the chieftain, for the purpose of protecting it; and the Affghans, forming a sort of rampart before them, maintained their ground until the heroic girl succeeded in getting it conveyed into the interior of the citadel. Shortly after the place was taken, she was found weeping over the remains of the brave old man; who, on inquiry, we learned was her father. She was treated with the utmost respect and tenderness by our men; who neither obtruded themselves on her grief nor offered any interruption to the preparations which she made for his interment.—Serjeant-Major Taylor's Scenes in Affghanistan.

EASY FAMILIARITY OF GREAT MEN IN GERMANY.—All royal gardens, too, are open, and the people walk in them, and stream round the palaces, passing, in many instances, through their very courts and gateways, just as if they were their own. Nay, the royal and ducal owners walk about amongst the people with as little ceremony as any of the rest. The Emperor of Austria, or the King of Prussia, does the very same. You may meet them anywhere; and little more ceremony is used towards them than is used towards any other individual, simply that of lifting your hat in passing, which is done to all your acquaintance, and is returned as a mark of ordinary salutation. You will see princes sitting in public places with their friends, with a cup of coffee, as unassumingly and as little stared at as any respectable citizen. You may sometimes see a Grand Duke come into a country inn, call for his glass of ale, drink it, pay for it, and go away as unceremoniously as yourself. The consequence of this easy familiarity is, that princes are everywhere popular, and the daily occurrence of their presence amongst the people prevents that absurd crush and stare at them which prevails in more luxurious and exclusive countries.—Howitt's Rural and Domestic Life of Germany.

TEA AND SUPPER IN GERMANY.—Of puddings they have a variety, and very tolerable. After dinner a cup of coffee is generally taken. Tea is by no means a general afternoon beverage. Of late years it has been more and more introduced; but in the greater number of families is not drank except when they have visitors, and then one or two cups is all that they can master. They complain that tea makes them drunk, makes their heads ache, heats them, gives them red noses, and, in fact, has all the effects of spirituous liquors on them. The mode in which the Englisb drink off their three, four, or five cups occasionally, is to them amazing, but more so the strength of it. You have to water your tea for your German visitors till it is really not tea, but milk and water; and if you allowed the waitors at inns to make tea for you, it would require a good microscope to find the tea-leaves in the pot. Such is the effect of custom. German families, in general, therefore, have their Abends-essen, or supper, about seven o'clock. This consists very much of cold sliced meat, sausages, potato-salad, and such like. The eating of meat suppers and drinking of no tea probably produces the common effect, that they require in the morning to supply themselves with that fluid which we take at tea-time. The first thing, therefore, that you see a German do at breakfast, is to toss off a large glass of cold water. Numbers, if they did not get their dose of cold water, could not eat a bit of breakfast.—Ibid.

INSPIRING PROPERTIES OF TEA.—From the various writers who have treated on this subject, and from experience, we ascertain that tea is a stomachic, favours digestion, raises the spirits, and an excellent dilutant; on the whole, it is as wholesome as it is a grateful and pleasant beverage, and the general use of it for two centuries, by all ranks of people, is sufficient evidence of its innocent qualities. "The studious," says a great writer, "find a relief in it by repelling drowsiness, dulness, and cloud from the brain and intellectual faculties; it ingratiates itself into men of sprightly genius, who continue their lively and distinct ideas, and is a great inspirer to poets."



SALE OF HORSES AT TATTERSALL'S.

This scene is so very familiar to a certain part of the public, and can also be identified at any period, that it scarcely requires a comment: but to a great portion of society in the metropolis, who are quite aloof from sporting transactions, a short account of this most celebrated repository may prove not altogether unacceptable. Tattersall's gives a tone to the sporting world, in the same way that the transactions on the Royal Exchange influence the mercantile part of society. It has likewise its settling days after the great races at Newmarket, Doncaster, Epsom, Ascot, &c. We do not know about the bulls and bears, but if it has no lame ducks to waddle out, it has sometimes levanters that will not show for a time, and others that will brush off altogether. But this does not happen very often; and Tattersall's has its good men as well as the 'Change, and whose word will be taken for any amount. It has also its subscription-room, which is extremely convenient for gentlemen and other persons, who feel any inclination to become acquainted with the events of the sporting world, at the moderate charge of one guinea a year. Indeed, there is an air of sporting about this place altogether; elegance, cleanliness, and style, being its prominent features. The company is a mixture of persons of nearly all ranks in life; but, nevertheless, it is that sort of mixture which is pleasingly interesting: there is no intimacy or association about it. A man may be well known here; he may also in his turn know almost everybody that visits Tattersall's, and yet be quite a stranger to their habits and connexions with society. It is no matter who sells or who purchases at this repository. A bet stands as good with a leg, and is thought as much of, as with a peer—money being the touchstone of the circumstance. The best judge respecting sporting events is acknowledged the best man here, every person being on the look out to see how he lays his blunt. The duke and he parliamentary orator, if they do not know the properties of a horse, are little more than ciphers; it is true they may be stared at if pointed out as great characters, but nothing more. The nod from a stable-keeper is quite as important, if not more so, to the auctioneer, as the wink of a right honourable. Numbers of persons who visit Tattersall's are, or wish to appear, knowing; from which "self" importance they are often most egregiously duped. In short, if you are not as familiar with the odds upon all events as Chitty in quoting precedents—show as intimate an acquaintance with the pedigree and speed of race-horses as a Gully—and also display as correct a knowledge of the various capabilities of the prize pugilists as a Jackson—if gain is your immediate object, you are "of no use" at Tattersall's. It is an excellent mart for the disposal of carriages, horses, dogs, &c., and many a fine fellow's stud has been floored by the hammer of Tattersall. There is a capacious tap attached to the premises, for the convenience of the servants of gentlemen in attendance upon their masters, or for any person who stands in need of refreshment. Tattersall's, for the purposes intended, is the most complete place in the metropolis; and if you have any desire to witness real life, to observe character, and to view the favourite hobbies of mankind, it is the resort of the pinks of the swells,—the tulips of the goes,—the dashing heroes of the military,—the fox-hunting clericals,—sprigs of nobility,—stylish coachmen,—smart guards,—saucy butchers,—natty grooms,—tidy helpers,—knowing horse-dealers,—betting publicans,—neat jockeys,—sporting men of all descriptions,—and the picture is finished by numbers of real gentlemen. It is the tip-top sporting feature in London. The name of Tattersall is not only high, but of long standing in the sporting world; and everything connected with his splendid establishment is conducted in the most gentlemanly manner. The founder of these premises was, during his time, viewed as one of the best judges of horse-flesh in the kingdom; and, as a proof of it, he made his fortune by a horse called Highflyer.

A CHINESE CAGE.

Our readers will not have forgotten the circumstances of the wreck of the Kite, East Indiaman, on the Chinese coast; and the fate of the crew, and the revolting cruelty practised by the natives on Mrs. Noble, the wife of the captain of the Kite, who was confined in a cage and carried about for six weeks. Among the numerous curiosities brought home by the Wellesley, and landed at our dock-yard, is one which has excited no little interest on account of its being the identical cage in which Mrs. Noble was imprisoned. To give some idea of the state of torture to which the English are subjected by the august relatives of the Sun and the Moon, we give the description of this instrument. It is made of rough fir slabs; and measures only two feet eight inches in length, one foot six inches in breadth, and two feet four inches in depth, with a hole on the top for the unfortunate lady's head to come through; so that when the head protruded the inmate could neither sit nor stand upright. It is to be sent to the British Museum.

TOWNSHEND PEERAGE.—An Act of Parliament, entitled "An Act for perpetuating Testimony in certain Cases," has lately received the royal assent. This measure was introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Cottenham, with the sanction of the committee of the law lords, to whom the petition of Lord Charles Townshend, presented by Viscount Sydney, was referred. Under this act the Townshend family will be enabled, in the lifetime of the Marquis Townshend, to perpetuate the testimony on which the petition of Lord Charles Townshend (alleging the illegitimacy of the member for Bodmin, who styles himself the Earl of Leicester), was founded; and we understand that proceedings under the act for the purpose will be forthwith instituted in the Court of Chancery.

PLENTY OF ROOM.

"Plenty of room, Marm! plenty of room!" Such is the not very veracious exclamation of the omnibus cad, while he applies the vis a tergo, as in the foregoing "too true tale," to an obese lady who is journeying Bankward. There she goes, after being subjected to a two-inch power of compression, shot right ahead into the laps of the half dozen people on each side. "All right!" sings out the cad, and before this feminine Quinbus Flistrin has had time to discover the superabundance of room, of the existence of which she has been so decidedly assured, she has gone down into the basket of fruit which some one is carrying to some friend in the city. "Where am I to sit?" Ay, that is just what we want to know. The vehicle is licensed to carry twice as many "insides" as the "Derby dilly," and one over and above. There are six at each side, and they are as "tight as twopence," and where is the fat lady to sit? "Oh, there is plenty of room, Marm, at either side." Rather a cool assertion that this warm weather. "It is high time this sort of humbug was put a stop to," says the sixteen stone gentleman in the blue coat. No one ventures to contravene such a statement. But then the poor lady is still (though there is "plenty of room" according to Act of Parliament), swaying about like a seventy-four in a spring-tide.

CHESS.

The following game (originally published in the 1st vol. of the "Chess Players' Chronicle,") was played between the celebrated Automaton Chess Player, and one of the most skilful Amateurs of the time. The moves of the Automaton were directed by Mr. Lewis.

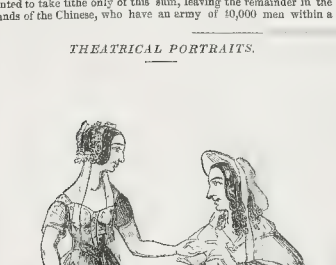
VIEW OF MACAO.

The following extract of a letter from Macao, from an officer belonging to the China expedition, will be found to contain particulars which have not transpired in any other quarter:—the expedition is at a stand for want of reinforcements, which we now begin to despair of getting from India, owing to the late bad news from that quarter. The troops and fleet are all in good health. When Ningpo was captured, the Chinese had collected about one million dollars worth of copper coin for the payment of troops, casting of cannon, building fortifications at Ching-hai and Chusan, payment of labourers, &c. &c. It is reported that the General has been contented to take tithe only of this sum, leaving the remainder in the hands of the Chinese, who have an army of 10,000 men within a day's march of him. We suspect this report is incorrect, believing the General to have too great a regard for those under him, to thus deprive them of their hard-earned prize-money. Hong-Kong is most rapidly increasing; stores, shops, and dwelling-houses springing up as if by magic, and there is already a population of about 15,000. Our Chinese possessions are Hong-Kong, Amoy Chusan, Ching-hai, Ningpo, where the military force is distributed. The remains of the 37th Native Infantry have returned to India. 300 out of 1100 men. None of the reinforcements, ships or men, have arrived. Should they come as intended, we shall go direct to Pekin, where every preparation has been made by the Chinese. The fortifications are most extensive.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.



MRS. KEELEY AND THE FORTUNE-TELLER.

Here is Mrs. Keeley appealing to the fates by the interpretation of a little fortune-teller of the Strand Theatre, and with that sweet slang of cockneyism, which she mouths or minces with such an angel grace of innocence, she asks for her fortune as though her wish were to be father to the thoughts of her gypsy sybil; and is in the act of saying, "Now give us a good 'un while you are about it." And this little episode is all properly enacted in the burlesque of Wax and Wonders; and Mrs. K. does get just such a "good un," in the way of fortune as the acclamations of her audience can bestow, and as we would wish her, on or off the stage, to the end of time. The Jack Sheppard, of Ainsworth; the Poor Nelly, of Boz, the arch spirit of a thousand bursts of merriment, "or gentle whisperer to the heart in love," she is simple and effective alike; and the true genius of popularity follows her faithfully wherever she goes. This is as it should be. She well earns her meed of fame, and she deserves, happily to enjoy it.

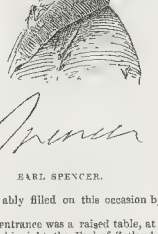
BUYING A HORSE FOR A CLERGYMAN.

At Melksham fair, on Wednesday, a countryman was looking at some horses which were exhibiting for sale, when a gentleman in clerical attire, and representing himself to be such, applied to him to purchase a particular animal, which he pointed out, saying that as a clergyman he did not like to be seen in such engagements, at the same time telling him he would give him a sovereign for his trouble. The trick took—the young man, "nothing green," paid £13 10*s.* for a horse not worth £5; which being done the clergyman was not to be found, and the purchaser had to take his bargain to himself, with "all faults."—Sherborne Journal.

YORKSHIRE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The great annual meeting of this extensive and flourishing Society was held at York, on Thursday last, when one of the most magnificent exhibitions of cattle that has ever taken place in this country was presented to thousands of gratified spectators.

At three o'clock in the afternoon upwards of 700 gentlemen and farmers sat down to the banquet, which was prepared in first-rate style, and set out in the riding-school adjoining the barracks. In the absence of Lord Wharncliffe, Earl Spencer presided over the festivities; and, as his lordship happens to be not only the most distinguished patron of agriculture, but one of the first founders of those institutions which were established to promote the prosperity of this brauch of industry, by the application of science to its development, we beg to present our readers with a portrait of the noble chairman.



EARL SPENCER.

The vice-chair was ably filled on this occasion by Lord Feversham.

To the right of the entrance was a raised table, at which sat the chairman, who had on his right the Earl of Zetland, the Hon. Sir E. Vavasour, Sir J. V. B. Johnstone, Bart., W. B. C. Stansfield, Esq., M.P., and R. Dennison, Esq.; and on his left Lord Wenlock, Lord Hawke, the Hon. B. R. Lawley, R. M. Milnes, Esq., M.P., and Archdeacon Wilberforce.

The usual loyal toasts having been proposed and enthusiastically responded to,

The Earl of Zetland, after an eloquent preface, proposed, "Success and prosperity to the Yorkshire Agricultural Society," which was received with the warmest demonstrations of attachment to the cause of agriculture.

Lord Feversham then rose to propose the next toast. He said, My lords and gentlemen, the duty devolves upon me of proposing to you the next toast. It is one upon which it is unnecessary for me to dilate, inasmuch as it is the health of the noble earl who has been accustomed for a long time to preside over societies of this description, and with whose character and merits you are well acquainted, and who, as a practical agriculturist, you know how to appreciate. (Loud cheers.) It is, gentlemen, the health of Earl Spencer (loud cheers for some time), who, in the unavoidable absence of Lord Wharncliffe, has officiated as the president of this meeting. And I am sure you will join with me in offering our congratulations to the noble earl on the manner in which the meeting has passed off. We have, in the first place, been favoured by the beneficence of Providence with most beautiful and favourable weather. We have also had an excellent and splendid show of stock; and I believe that the observation which was made with respect to the Bristol meeting might be applied to this one, namely, that there have been a greater number of practical agriculturists and farmers assembled here to-day than at any former meeting of this society—of practical men, not assembled merely for the purpose of witnessing the exhibition of stock and of implements, however gratifying and interesting they undoubtedly are, but who have come here for the purpose of obtaining information from their brother agriculturists and brother farmers, of the experiments which others may have made, with a view of carrying home those experiments, and of adopting them according to their circumstances, the capacities of their farms, and the quality of their land to their own advantage. (Cheers.) I sincerely join and concur in the hope expressed by the noble earl who last addressed you, that great good and many advantages may result from societies of this description, not only in the improvement of the breed of cattle, but the fruitfulness of its soil, and the augmentation of its fertility and of its produce; and I am persuaded that the agricultural interest is not the only interest that will benefit by those improvements. I am persuaded that every class in the community will reap a share of benefit, and that the manufacturing classes of the community will derive benefit from them; and not the least important, also that class to whose labour we are now in a great degree indebted for the success of our experiments, viz., to the working classes of the community. (Cheers.) It is, I think, perfectly true, and it is the principle upon which the very basis of all our cultivation must be founded, that all the great interests of this country are bound up and identified one with the other; and it is impossible to estimate too highly the importance of every branch of our national industry; but I think it is not too much to say that agriculture is the foundation of our permanent power as a nation, of our strength, and of our prosperity; and that those individuals may well deserve to be ranked amongst the benefactors of this country, who devote their time, their study, and their industry to the improvement of the land, with a view to increase its fertility and its powers of production. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, it is with these views, and also wishing to act upon those principles, that I am desirous of proposing to you the toast which has been entrusted to me, and that is the health of the noble earl who officiates as president at this board. (Loud cheers.)

"The President of this meeting—Earl Spencer." Three times three.

The Chairman was received with loud applause. His lordship said—I should ill express my feelings if I merely said that I rise to return my thanks for the honour you have done me. (Cheers.) But the manner in which you have received the proposition of Lord Feversham, undoubtedly has given me the greatest satisfaction, because it is most gratifying to me to feel that you should so estimate any service that I can possibly have rendered you. It is always my desire to do all that I can to promote the improvement of agriculture in this county, the improvement in the cultivation of the soil, and in the production of animals suitable for the food of man, because I am perfectly satisfied that the more we can increase the productions of our soil, and the more good we can produce by raising animals calculated at an early period of their lives to give food to man, the greater must be the benefit to the landed proprietors, and occupiers of land, and of every class of the community. Having this feeling strongly impressed upon me, I must admit that farming is a pursuit which gives me the greatest pleasure and satisfaction. (Loud cheers.) I certainly have always been most ready to do what I could to promote such meetings as the present. (Hear.) Having said so much with regard to my own feelings, I think you will excuse me in saying a little more as respects the meeting of this day. Lord Zetland has told you most truly that this is the best show you have ever had. I think in almost every class there has been an improvement. In former times one class would be very great indeed, whilst others failed; but on the present occasion all our classes have been very good, and all (with the exception of horses) very much improved. This leads me to hope that the farmers and persons interested in the cultivation of the soil in Yorkshire are feeling the advantages which this society is calculated to give this county, and are exerting themselves to bring forward the best animals they can produce. It is by such an exhibition as this that we can collect together the different classes of this county, and it is by such a connexion that the interest of agriculture is improved by the communication with one another which these meetings enable us to hold, and the improvements thereby effected. On the present occasion the meeting has been productive of the greatest gratification, and we hope that by the support of the owners and occupiers of land in this county it will continue to succeed. But remember, that it requires considerable funds to enable it to succeed. Therefore, my earnest hope is, and my advice to you is, believing that its operations will be beneficial to all, that you will increase by every means in your power the subscribers to this Society, and do the best you can to spread an interest in its favour throughout all your neighbourhoods. (Hear.) Without this assistance we cannot expect to go on improving. With this assistance I think that the experience we have had, and the present improving show, will effect that which will be a benefit to this country and to us all. (Loud cheering.) I shall conclude by begging you to accept my best thanks for your kindness in drinking my health. (Loud and repeated cheering.)

A number of other toasts were given and responded to; after which the noble chairman read the awards of the prizes, which he afterwards distributed amongst the fortunate competitors. The next annual meeting is appointed to be held at Doncaster.

The advices from the Worcester hop districts speak generally of improvement in the plantations; and it was supposed another week or two of warm weather would secure about an average crop. Duty backed at £13,000, the highest yet quoted. The advices from other districts concur with these.

WORKING OF THE INCOME-TAX.—Recent inquiries and information which has reached us have convinced us that the Income tax will create indirectly as great a loss to the revenue as the profit which it directly brings into the Exchequer. There is, in fact, so strong a disposition to save the tax by giving up other taxed articles, that scarcely an individual in the community will wholly neglect so obvious an expedient of lawful evasion. We will describe one case, that of a professional friend residing in a large manufacturing town in this county. Last year he kept a four-wheeled chaise, one horse, but compounded for one or more horses, a man-servant, and a couple of dogs. All these he put down previous to the month of April, with the express design of saving as much of the Income-tax out of other contributions to the state as he possibly could. By this means his saving will be £12. What his income is we are not aware; but assuming it to be £500 a year, the Income-tax will be £14 11*s.* 8*d.*; so that his contribution to the revenue, instead of being an addition of the latter amount over and above his former contribution, will only be an addition of £2 11*s.* 8*d.*, or less than one-fifth of what Sir Robert Peel calculated upon. This amount is so small, that were our friend, and others who adopt a similar expedient, disposed, he might easily save it in other ways, by reducing his consumption of exciseable articles, for instance, or by blocking up an unimportant window in his house. This last expedient we know has been resorted to by many, and a tax-gatherer in the same town to which we have above alluded, reports, that there is scarcely a single inhabitant from whom he has been in the habit of collecting taxes, who has not adopted, or who is not preparing to adopt some mode of saving the Income-tax, or a portion of the Income-tax, out of the other taxes. If this practice be generally resorted to, the Income-tax will not be nearly so productive as Sir Robert Peel anticipates. Taxation has now gone as far as it can go. The squeezing-process has been carried to an extreme; and the time has at length arrived, as with a milch cow, when, milk as they will, the Government cannot draw another drop.—Leeds Times.

DISTURBED STATE OF THE COTTON DISTRICTS OF LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday.—At a very early hour this morning, Manchester and its neighbourhood was thrown into a state of very great excitement by a report that a large number of the turn-out cotton-spinners from the neighbourhood of Ashton, Hyde, and Staleybridge were on their way here. The report further stated that a great number of these people had yesterday moved down upon Oldham, where they had forcibly turned out all the hands, and that their object in Manchester was to pursue a similar course. On inquiry at the Town-hall, and other places where authentic information was likely to be obtained, it was found that these reports were well founded. About ten o'clock a body of 8000 or 10,000 workmen from Ashton and its neighbourhood entered the town, and succeeded in stopping several large factories; and large bodies of police and soldiery were ordered out, and were under arms.

The following is a brief history of the causes which have led to this irruption. The recent glut of the markets in every direction had led some of the masters in the neighbourhood of Ashton to propose a lower scale of wages to their workmen, as the only means of avoiding a more dreaded alternative—that of closing their mills. The workmen, in most instances, accepted the offer; but an intimation from some of the other mill-owners that they would all be compelled to follow the same course, led to a re-consideration of the question, and the result was that every mill in Ashton, Hyde, and Staleybridge, was stopped by the hands voluntarily turning out, and declaring their intention to stop all the factories in the whole district until the masters consented to return to the prices of 1840.

Many of these mills employed more than 1300 hands, and the workmen who turned out from them may be estimated at more than 20,000. But in addition to the cotton-spinners, power-loom-weavers, &c., who turned out, some 3000 or 4000 of other trades must be added, for at Ashton and Staleybridge the joiners, sawyers, shoemakers, in fact, the trades generally, have laid aside their tools.

The turn-outs entered at the Ancoats end of Manchester, where they were met by a troop of Dragoon Guards and a portion of the Rifle Corps quartered here. Before the police or military had reached Ancoats, the procession from Ashton had presented themselves before the two mills of Mr. Guest, the mill of Messrs. G. Clarke and Co., and Messrs. Kennedy's mill, the hands of which at once relinquished work. Their progress to the other mills was doubtless stayed by the arrival of the police and soldiery. The number of policemen present was about 250, well armed. The main body of the turn-outs, being disappointed of a place of meeting in Stevenson-square, moved on to Granby-row-fields, where they took up the ground, and a few of their leaders addressed them from a waggon. The speeches of the leaders of the turn-outs had relation chiefly to the rate of wages, and they all recommended peace.

The meeting broke up about two o'clock, when the vast assemblage formed in order of procession; Mr. Maude and Mr. G. Clarke (both magistrates) followed in the rear of the procession till it was fairly out of the town, and left it on the road to Ashton at three o'clock.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

Shortly after the meeting of the operatives, a crowd of persons, chiefly lads, went along Newton-lane in a tumultuous manner, demanding bread at the various provision shops. Some of the shopkeepers, aware of their coming, had closed their shops; but thought it most prudent, in some cases, to throw a loaf or two out to the clamorous crowd. About the same time a crowd assembled in front of two shops at the head of Travis-street, Great Ancoats, the occupiers of which were also compelled to distribute bread gratuitously. Intelligence of these depredations having been conveyed to Colonel Wemyss, he proceeded to the spot with a troop of horse, a company of rifles, and a detachment of police; but, although the whole of the Ancoats districts presented a very disturbed appearance, from the number of factory hands who were walking about in all directions, no further attacks on property took place. Throughout the greater part of yesterday afternoon, most of the shops in Oldham-street, Great Ancoats-street, and Oldham-road were closed, through fear of the disorderly crowds which were perambulating the town.

At half-past two o'clock in the afternoon, a mob, consisting chiefly of women, attacked the mill of Messrs. Preston and Son, Arwick-island, broke all the windows, and damaged property to the amount of £40. At a quarter to three o'clock, the same party attacked the dye-works in Ancoats-vale, belonging to Messrs. Barlow and Sons. The damages will not exceed £10. Mr. Kennedy's mill was also attacked by a mob, 300 squares of glass broken, and Mr. Kennedy, jun., assaulted.

FURTHER OUTRAGES.—A GIRL KILLED.

Between three and four o'clock a large mob proceeded along Oxford-road, for the purpose of stopping Messrs. Birley's mill and that of the Oxford-road Twist Company. On arriving at the latter they demanded that the hands should be turned out. Mr. Henry Cooke, one of the partners, complied with their request, and immediately ordered the engines to be stopped. Not content with this, they demanded leave to enter the mill, in order that they might be sure of no one remaining inside. On his refusal to let them do so, they instantly commenced the work of destruction by smashing to pieces the windows of the porter's lodge, at the north-east corner, and entered the mill-yard. Fortunately the military arrived at this juncture, and the only damage committed was the flinging a pitfull of bobbins into the street. Mr. D. Maude and Inspector Irwin arrived at the same time, and succeeded, with the assistance of the police and military, in apprehending 14 of the rioters. While the military were escorting the prisoners to the Town-hall, the mob proceeded to Messrs. Birley's mill, the windows of which they immediately commenced breaking. The inmates set to work a force-pump, worked by the engine, to throw water on the crowd; but, this not proving an effectual defence, they resorted to more formidable weapons. Several of them ascended to the roof, and flung down stones, pieces of iron, and other missiles, with such fatal effect that several persons were hurt, and a young girl, it is said, was killed on the spot. The ammunition of the mob having been exhausted before they had broken all the windows, they seized a cart loaded with coals, which was on its way to the factory, tilted it up, and employed the contents in finishing the work of destruction. On the soldiers and police making their appearance, the mob dispersed, and Inspectors Irwin, M'Mullen, and Maybury, apprehended eight men in the act of breaking windows.

FURTHER PARTICULARS

(From a Second Edition of the Manchester Guardian of Wednesday.)

MANCHESTER.—At six this morning about 2000 people assembled in Granby-row Fields, Mr. Crossley in the chair. Having formed in procession, they proceeded along Granby-row. In passing near the Manchester and Sheffield Railway, they forced the labourers, who were at work on the line, to throw down their tools and go along with them. "No one," they said, "should work until they had got their rights." The next resting-place of the crowd, which had now swelled to nearly 10,000 persons, was in Ancoats-street, in the neighbourhood of Messrs. Kennedy's mill, which was protected by Superintendent Cochrane and the C division of police.

By nine o'clock nearly all the factories and public works in the neighbourhood of Oxford-road, London-road, and Ancoats, had turned out their hands.

The mill of Messrs. Stirling and Beckton, Lower Mosley-street, which suffered so severely on the previous evening, was visited by several parties during the morning, who called on the hands to come out and join the procession. Finding that there was no disposition to comply with the request, the mob began to throw stones at the windows of the mill, and also at the doors and window-shutters of the dwelling-house of Mr. Beckton, the latter of which soon became a total wreck.

The cavalry having arrived, they endeavoured to disperse the rioters, who now became audacious, and, therefore, seemed disposed to resist for a while; but on the soldiers drawing their swords and dashing into the midst of them, they fled in all directions.

About a quarter past twelve, a body of between 300 and 400 people, including many boys and young men, came suddenly into Princess-street, and a number of them, in passing, entered the shop of Mr. John Howarth, fruiterer and provision dealer, and demanded some bread. Mr. Howarth thought it prudent to comply with their demand, and gave them five four-pound loaves, with which they appeared to be satisfied. Meanwhile some one had hastened to the police-office with the information, and Inspector Irwin arrived there with a body of the police, before the men had quitted the premises and succeeded in capturing seven of them, who were promptly conveyed to the New Bailey, and safely lodged there. On this, as on former occasions, threats were heard on the part of the mobs in more than one street, that at night (Wednesday night) they would have the prisoners out of the New Bailey. We may add here that the number of prisoners conveyed there previous to nine o'clock this morning was 27; there were 15 conveyed there in the forenoon from Messrs. Stirling and Beckton's, Lower Mosley-street, and probably a dozen or more from other quarters, so that there are between 50 and 60 persons lodged there at the time we are writing this (two o'clock).

Information having reached the police-office that it was intended to demolish the lock-up at Newtown, a strong body of police was promptly despatched thither; but before they could reach the place, a distance of considerably more than a mile from the police-office, the work of destruction had been completed. They then tore down doors, window-frames, the beams of the roof, and we are assured by an eye-witness, that in ten minutes the place was almost literally levelled with the ground.

Shortly afterwards a report reached the police-office that the same body of men intended to attack the Manchester gas-works, at Newtown; and about half-past twelve a strong body of police was despatched thither. From an eye-witness who was on the spot shortly afterwards, we learn that about half-past 1 there could not be fewer than 8000 or 10,000 people in the neighbourhood; the dragoons were galloping about with drawn sabres, driving the people back; strong bodies of the police and the 60th Rifles were keeping the ends of the streets in various directions, so as to prevent the mob passing; and this was the state of things in the streets for about half a mile round the gas-works in all directions.

Another report brought to the police-office about the same time was, that the rioters intended to visit the Liverpool and Manchester Railway (and probably others), with the object of tearing up the rails, and thus, as they hoped, preventing any reinforcements of military reaching the town. At the time we are writing (two o'clock), we have not heard of any attack on the railway station.

At three o'clock 300 special constables were sworn in, and gentlemen were thronging to the Town Hall for the purpose. Each special constable is distinguished by a white riband tied round the arm, above the elbow.

A strong force of the 60th Rifles, together with a number of the police, have been drawn up the greater part of the day near the mill of Messrs. Murray, Great Ancoats-street. The other troops here are the 1st Dragoons. They are kept constantly in readiness, and two or three troops of them, as will be seen above, have already been actively employed in driving back the riotous assemblages from their work of destruction and plunder.

MANCHESTER, Thursday Evening.—The town remains in a dreadful state of excitement, and the news received from all the neighbouring districts, render matters much more gloomy. Last night General Wade arrived to take command of the troops in the district, and it is understood that despatches have been sent off for two more regiments. Two companies of the Rifles, with 80 police and 200 special constables, along with two pieces of artillery, were sent off to take possession of the open space in Ancoats. Some thousands of persons had assembled, and the Riot Act was read, but without any effect in causing them to disperse.

Soon after three o'clock this morning the inhabitants of Salford were alarmed by one of the most terrific outbreaks of fire that has occurred for many years. It was found to have taken place at a steam saw-mill, and damage was done to the extent of £600, the whole of which is covered by the insurance.

A large meeting was held at six o'clock in the fields at Granby-row, when the Riot Act was read, and the assembly was dispersed by the military, consisting of cavalry and two pieces of artillery.

At two o'clock news came into town that all the workmen in the employ of Lord F. Egerton, M.P., as carpenters, curriers, &c., at Worsley, had turned out, and that colliers were also expected to follow. If so, upwards of 2000 persons more will be out of employment. It was also ascertained that all the mills are closed at Staley-bridge, Glossop, Mottram, &c., where there is no military force, nor even adequate police protection.

Two proclamations were issued at five o'clock, calling on the well disposed to maintain the peace.

GREAT MEETING OF COLLIERS AT WEDNESBURY.—BIRMINGHAM, Six o'Clock, Thursday.—Another meeting of the colliers has been held to-day, at which no fewer than 10,000 to 12,000 were present. As far as I have yet been able to learn, there has been no exhibition of outrage, and it is generally expected that the affair will pass off like the former display. Groups of turn-out colliers are perambulating the district, asking for charity, and many hundreds have found their way to Birmingham on a similar errand. A meeting of the masters has also been held to day at Dudley, and though their deliberations were strictly private, it is understood that they have resolved unanimously that the demands of the workmen are most excessive, and cannot be consented to.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY, AUG 9.

The house met for the purpose of delivering judgments in several appeal cases.

REV. JOHN FERGUSON AND SEVEN OTHER MINISTERS, AND ANDREW MORRISON AND TWO OTHERS, ELDERS, FORMING THE PRESBYTERY OF AUCHTERARDER, v. THE EARL OF KINNOUL AND REV. M. YOUNG.

This was an appeal against a decree of the Court of Session, with the circumstances of which the public are already tolerably familiar. The case was argued some time since, and the house had taken time to consider the judgment.—The Lord Chancellor now delivered his opinion, affirming the decision of the court below, which was agreed in by Lords Brougham, Cottenham, and Campbell.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—LIVERPOOL, AUG. 8.

(Before Lord Denman.)

Francis Bradley was indicted for the wilful murder of his wife, Alice Bradley, by the administration of arsenic.—Mr. Wilkins and Mr. Monk conducted the prosecution; Dr. Brown was assigned as counsel for the prisoner.

A number of witnesses having been examined in support of the prosecution, Dr. Brown addressed the jury for the prisoner, pointing out every circumstance in the evidence which could throw a doubt on the fact of his guilt.—His lordship summed up the case with great minuteness; and the jury, having retired for a few minutes, brought in a verdict of guilty.—His lordship, without putting on the black cap, passed sentence of death on the prisoner, in a brief and very solemn address, holding out to him no hope of mercy.—The prisoner heard the sentence quite unmoved.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 9.

Crown Side.—Before Lord Denman.

MISS CRELLIN'S CASE.

John Orr M'Gill, Richard Jones, Thomas Margaret, his wife, Jane Clayton, John Osborne Quick, and Thomas Wormald Rogerson, were indicted for feloniously taking away one Ann Crellin, from motives of lucre, being a person possessed of both real and personal property, with intent to marry and defile her against her will. Mr. Baines, assisted by Mr. Crompton, Mr. Wilkins, Mr. Atherton, and Mr. Fitzgerald, conducted the prosecution; Mr. Armstrong appeared for M'Gill; Mr. Sergeant Murphy for Mrs. Clayton and Mr Quick; Dr. Brown for Mr. and Mrs Jones; and Mr. Brandt for Rogerson.—Mr. Baines, in opening the case to the jury, said: The inquiry was one of an extraordinary nature in itself, and committed under circumstances of extraordinary fraud and cruelty. The prosecutrix was a lady of between 40 and 50 years of age, possessed of property to the amount of £4000 or £5000, partly in personalty and partly in real estate. She is a person of weak judgment, credulous, and one upon whom designing persons would be likely to practise. The learned counsel then proceeded to detail the facts of the case, which are now too fresh in the recollection of the public to render their recapitulation here unnecessary. It will be remembered that the prosecutrix was conveyed to Gretna Green by stratagem, and there she was united in the fashion of that celebrated place to M'Gill, the prisoner. The indictment was framed upon the statute of 9th George IV., commonly called Lord Lansdowne's Act, providing for the punishment of persons taking away any woman from motives of lucre to defile her.—Miss Ann Crellin was then called to the witness-box.—Mr. Armstrong objected, that it had been opened by the counsel for the prosecution, that she was married to one of the prisoners, and she therefore could not be a witness against him. She was then sworn on the voire dire, and said, I was married, they say, at Gretna Green. I was kept a prisoner at Rogerson's afterwards. I lived with him against my will. She was then sworn in chief, and deposed to the facts stated by the learned counsel; and on her cross-examination developed scenes of the grossest profligacy, in which she was herself a prominent actress. Several other witnesses were examined, but the counsel for the prosecution declined to put Mr. Linton, who performed the marriage ceremony at Gretna, into the box.—Mr. Armstrong, Mr. Sergeant Murphy, Dr. Brown, and Mr. Brandt, then successively addressed the jury for their respective clients; after which his lordship summed up the evidence, and the jury, at a late hour, returned a verdict of Guilty against M'Gill, Jones (the male), Clayton, and Quick; and acquitted Mrs. Jones and Rogerson. The jury expressing their opinion that Miss Crellin's conduct was highly culpable. Sentence deferred. The court and all the avenues to it were crowded during the whole of the day, the interest which the public took in the event of this remarkable case not having in any degree abated.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.—TUESDAY, AUG. 9.

(Before Mr. Sergeant Adams and a Bench of Magistrates.)

DESPERATE ASSAULT.—Thomas Martin, a shoemaker, was indicted for the following savage assault upon John M'Culloch, on the 6th of August, in the parish of St. Pancras.—The complainant stated that he resided at No. 169, Tottenham-court-road, and the prisoner lodged in the same house, and had for a fortnight been disturbing our very late of a night, and leaving the street-door open upon his return home. The complainant remonstrated with him on the impropriety of his conduct, and some words passed between them. The prisoner then went down stairs, and presented an iron bar, with which he inflicted a grievous injury upon the complainant's head. (The appearance of the complainant fully bore out this statement.) He ran into his room, but was followed by the prisoner, who had also armed himself with a large hammer, sharply pointed at one end, and with this deadly instrument he made a blow at complainant, which struck his thumb, and nearly severed it from his hand. (The complainant's hand was bandaged up and in a sling.) The landlord of the house interfered, and prevented the prisoner from doing any further mischief, and he was given in charge to the police. The prisoner, during a long rambling defence about some previous quarrel, was found guilty.—The chairman told him that he might consider himself fortunate that he had not been committed to the Central Criminal Court for trial; and after passing the indignant sentence the court felt at his brutal conduct, sentenced him to four months' imprisonment in the House of Correction, and ordered him at the expiration of that period to find bail.

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET. The final examination of Richard Handley, Sarah Ann Hunt, and Richard Gifford, charged with being concerned, either as agents or receivers, in the possession of a vast number of robberies, involving property to an enormous amount, took place on Monday before Mr. Maltby. Police-sergeants Whall and Gray brought forward evidence in a new case, and Mr. Bodkin and the prisoners Gifford and Hunt only. The magistrate was informed that twelve complete cases out of twenty-one were now fully taken against the prisoners, upon all of which they stood committed.—Handley begged that he might have some money allowed him in order to prepare for his defence.—Mr. Maltby said he could take no order in respect of the money. Handley said he had given all the information he could to the police, and hoped the case would take his appearance into consideration. If he was refused money, might he have his watch?—Mr. Maltby having ascertained that the watch had been really bought by the prisoner as he stated, directed the police to give it up to him.—The prisoners were then removed.—Such has been the alarm occasioned by the recent disclosures, that nine "fences," as they are termed, have fled the country, or are out of the way. The fears of these persons are excited by the apparent Handley, who, it was reported, would most likely be admitted as Queen's evidence, and in that event, he would have been enabled to inculpate almost every "fence" in London. From some idea of the ingenuity displayed in effecting robberies, it may be noticed, that in Handley's box a common porter's dress was found. This dress the prisoner was accustomed to assume, and the character of porter, would carry off any property entrusted to him. The disguise also enabled him to enter, at an early hour in the morning, a warehouse that he had previously ascertained was left unguarded, and to carry the plunder without much fear of exciting suspicion.

UNION HALL, MONDAY.—THE CRAWFORD PEERAGE.—Robert Lindsey Crawford, claimant of the Crawford peerage, was brought up for final examination. The prisoner, who has now been in custody about a month on the alleged charge of returning from transportation; and although he has been remanded from time to time, yet no evidence has been brought forward to establish the charge against him, although it was stated on the first examination that such testimony would be forthcoming from Ireland as would prove that he was tried and convicted of horse-stealing in that country in 1837, and sentenced to transportation for life, from which, however, he received a pardon about the direction of government. Mr. Cottingham now inquired of the porter on who "got up" the case, whether he was prepared with the necessary evidence to the alleged offence against the accused?—The police-man, Hall, said, that he had no further evidence than that already brought forward—that he had communicated with the Home office on the subject, but that he had received no instructions in the business. Mr. Cottingham said that the prisoner had now been in custody for a month; that every opportunity had been given to the police to prove the charge if they were in a condition to do so, but they had failed in doing so; and there was not a tittle of evidence adduced to show that the accused was a returned transport, and he should, therefore, be discharged. The magistrate then ordered the whole of the prisoner's documents which were taken from him by the police to be delivered up to him, as he said that they would be of importance in urging his title as claimant to the Crawford peerage.—The accused was then discharged.

On Tuesday, Lemon, the man examined at this court a few days ago, on the alleged charge of the murder of his wife, in Bexley-street, Camberwell, was brought before Mr. Cottingham for final examination.—Inspector Campbell stated that the inquest on the body of the deceased woman took place on the preceding day, and that the verdict of the jury exonerated the prisoner from being the cause of her death. The inspector added that he had no further evidence to bring forward than that which has already been entered into. The magistrate said, that he should discharge the prisoner, but at the same time warned him in future to restrain his passion; for it was certain that if the quarrel had not been between him and his unfortunate wife, she would then have been in existence. He was then liberated from custody.

MARYLEBONE.—On Tuesday last, two organ-players (Italians), who gave their names Francis Lebardi, and Lorenzo Mossi, applied to the sitting magistrate, Mr. Rawlinson, to whom they set forth some particulars connected with an attack made upon their persons by Lord Frankfort, of 12, Southwick-crescent, Hyde-park-square. It was also alleged by them that his lordship had, in addition thereto, done considerable damage to a valuable organ of which they had the charge.—It appeared, from the evidence of Lebardi, one of the complainants, that on Friday night last he was playing with his organ, when a servant came up to him and desired him to play in front of his master's house, in Upper Hyde-park-street. He had not been playing long when a little boy ran up and told him to desist, and on his refusing to do so, a gentleman, whom the complainant proved to have been Lord Frankfort, came up and struck him on the head with his fist. He also struck the lantern of the organ, and other wise damaged the instrument very much Complainant valued the organ at £160, and stated that it had been damaged to the amount of £12. Lorenzo Moore, the other complainant, deposed to the same effect.—The Hon. Captain Boyle, 7, Upper Hyde-park-street, said, About 10 o'clock on Friday night I desired my courier to call the Italian boy to play under my window for the amusement of the family. After playing a little while the music suddenly ceased, and on my going out to see what was the matter I found a person holding the boy's collar. I begged of him to let the lad go, as I had ordered him to play, but he said he was going to give him in charge of a policeman. Another gentleman quickly came to the spot, and recognised the person who had hold of the organ-player as being Lord Frankfort. A crowd of persons had assembled, and I said I should send for a policeman. Mr. Woolfer: Did Lord Frankfort say he had sent for a policeman? Witness: He did not. Mr. Woolfer: In point of fact, did any policeman come?—Witness: Yes, just as the disturbance was over, and he then called no attention. Mr. Woolfer: How far from Lord Frankfort's house is yours?—Witness: More than seventy or eighty yards. Mr. Oliveira, of 8, Upper Hyde-park-street, gave evidence to the same effect.—Mr. Woolfer (the whole of the evidence having been gone into) addressed the magistrate to the effect that Lord Frankfort had on many similar occasions been subject to the greatest annoyance from the performance of these street musicians, and that in the present instance on finding that the organ-player paid no attention to the message delivered to him by his (Lord Frankfort's) footboy, the latter was immediately sent for a policeman; but returning without one, his lordship himself went down, and directed the player and his companion to go away; they refused to do so, and the only object he had in view was to keep them at the spot until the arrival of a constable, when he intended to give them both into custody. There was a scuffle amongst them, but no blows. They had no business to continue there after being ordered to move on, and a person was not to be indulged in his leisure for street music, if the performance was productive of annoyance to others. Mr. Woolfer called Lord Frankfort's footboy, who proved having deemed complaints to desist from playing. Mr. Rawlinson read the clause in the Police Act relative to street musicians. It appeared therefrom that the said class of persons are liable to a penalty if they refuse to depart when called upon by any inhabitant to do so; but it also sets forth that unless any other reasonable cause," shall be at the same time assigned, which was not the case with respect to the matter under investigation. Mr. Rawlinson, who told Mr. Woolfer prior to judgment being given that he should recommend that some compensation be made to complainants, but which suggestion was not acceded to by Mr. Woolfer, said, he considered that Lord Frankfort had conducted himself with an indiscretion quite unbecoming, and fined him £2 10s. for each assault. The penalties were immediately paid by Mr. Woolfer. One of the complainants asked Mr. Rawlinson how he was to act with respect to recovering the amount of the damage which the organ had sustained; and he was told to apply to an attorney, the said amount being beyond his (the magistrate's) reach THAMES POLICE.—On Tuesday George Lorimer, a man about 50 years of age, late chief mate of the brig British Queen, now lying in the St. Katherine's dock, was brought before Mr. Broderip, charged with the wilful murder of Robert Micklejohn, the captain of the same vessel, on the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England. Mr. Pelham, the solicitor, attended for the prosecution and Mr. Pelham for the prosecution. The investigation, which lasted three hours, created much interest in a very crowded court.—Joseph Smith, a seaman, was the first witness. He stated, that on the 18th of April last the ship was at Aghway, on the coast of Africa, and lying at anchor. There was plenty of grog on board the ship, it was the last night for taking in corn, and he and the mate worked very cheerfully together. The mate sang a little, but appeared deranged in one sense, either with the horrors or something else, and said he imagined, as he went ashore, that he could hear the African crews of the canoes singing "The old man of Glasgow," and asked him to put his ears to the rail of the ship and hear it. He did so to satisfy the mate, but could hear nothing There was nothing else remarkable in the mate's behaviour all that day. At night, when the captain came on board, he was asked by a man to give all hands a glass of grog for blocking up the hatchways with corn, and he did so. After supper the mate sang out for the crew to come on deck and pump ship, as she was very leaky. The men at began to grumble at this order, and asked the mate why he did not give the order before; and the mate said he had been witness to do it, when he had not done. At two o'clock the same night it was his watch on deck, and he had not been there more than five minutes when the mate came running forward, and exclaimed, "Joe, the captain's overboard." He thought the mate was deranged, and said so to him, "You had better go and lie down, Mr. Lorimer." Soon after that he was sitting down on the windlass with his face aft, and had been talking to the deck, who had just left him, when he heard the captain say, "Don't, Geordie, don't." At that time there was no one on the quarter-deck but the captain and mate, and it was very dark at the time. Directly after he heard the captain hear a plunge in the water, and the mate at the same moment called out, "Forward, there, forward!" and the cook said, "Why don't you look out?" Witness observed, "What is the use of answering that?" The mate called down to the men to come aft at the same time. When he first heard the plunge in the water he had not the least suspicion any man was overboard, and thought a demijohn of rum had fallen into the water. The cook was further aft than he was, and appeared alarmed, and said, "What is that!" and they both ran towards the after part of the ship, and they had to go over the captain's bed, which was made upon deck to windward, and right in the neck of the water. The mate first missed the captain, said to the mate, "Yes, have hove the captain overboard," and the mate made use of some expression, and said he gan him a share. He looked over the ship's side, and saw the water disturbed and "sparkling," and a person overboard struggling, who immediately afterwards disappeared. The captain was never seen afterwards. The starboard quarter boat could be lowered, for the falls and the gripes of the quarter were fast round it, while the oars were in the fore part of the ship barricaded up with spars. The crew all came aft together, but no signs of the captain were perceived. The ship was about two and a half miles distant from the shore when all this happened. All the people on board, except the cook and himself, were forward. In answer to questions by Mr. Hodgson, the witness said, the captain's body was never found, and he had no doubt the sharks got it, for there were plenty of them round the ship. few days before a man, who died of the fever, was buried, and they had scarcely gone into the boats when the sharks got him and dragged him down. John Lucas, an African black, deposed to the strange conduct of the prisoner towards the captain previous to the said event. On the night in question he had poured out the coffee for the captain and mate, who partook of it on deck; and while they were doing so the mate said to the captain very seriously, "Mickle, that's the last cup of coffee you will ever take, or that we shall have together." "Why?" asked the captain. The mate replied, "You will see by and by; you will drink no more coffee." He then went on to say, that after the captain had retired to rest, the mate began handling the capstan, and sang out three times, "Lower no more!" Witness, who sang out the man upon the watch, and observed, that the mate was always troubling the captain when he was sleeping, and was constantly teasing him. After that everything was quiet, and he thought the mate could hear nothing at all for some time, nor did he hear any one speak; when the silence was broken all at once by a heavy splash in the water. As soon as he heard the splash he jumped up, ran aft, and met the mate coming down on the larboard side of the ship, in the act of turning round, and upon looking over the ship's side, close to where the mate was, he saw the captain in the water, lifting up his hands and looking up. The mate stood firm, and the prisoner, who conversed very cheerfully with his friends, and at their own request was supplied with some porter, was sent to Newgate. The deceased Captain Micklejohn was only 25 years of age when he met with his untimely end. He was a very promising young man, a native of Scotland, and the prisoner, we understand, was a fellow townsman.

CLERKENWELL.—On Tuesday James Rogers, aged 17 years, was placed at the bar before Mr. Combe, charged by Mrs Rogers, his own mother, residing at No. 5, Clark's-place, Bagnigge-wells-road, St. Pancras, with cutting, and wounding her with a knife Mrs. Rogers (the mother), who was in court with a handkerchief to her face, was called forward, when she exhibited a dreadfully mutilated face, and the blood gushed profusely from the wounds, and she was unable to speak. Mr. Combe said she was evidently in an unfit state to be examined, and she ought to be taken instantly to the hospital. She was then removed from the court for that purpose.—Mr. Combe asked the prisoner whether he wished to say anything to the charge? -Prisoner: My father abused me.—Mr. Combe: I can only tell you that your mother seems to be seriously wounded. She may be dangerously so, and if she should happen to die you will be tried for your life, and may be hanged. So I caution you that you are not bound to say anything unless you like. If you do say anything it will be taken down in writing, and read for or against you at your trial.—Prisoner: I wish to speak. He then stated as follows:—My father sent out to the yard for a long rope to beat me with, after he had abused me very much. My father had been telling me before that he would give me a good hiding. He was sitting by the side of the table. He said he would bring me before a magistrate. He made a rush at me. I jumped over a chair to get out of the kitchen, when my mother and sister got hold of me by the hair of my head I sprung round, and tumbled down. My mother called up my two brothers to catch hold of my hair. My brother next to me, a year and five months younger, is my father's pet, and causes a great many words between us, which I dislike. He came up and seized my hair with his two hands. Before I tried to escape from my father I had a knife in my hand eating my breakfast. I had it in my right hand, and my mother was on the left. I made a blow at my brother with the back part of my hand, when my brother lifted up his arm, and the knife went into my mother's face and wounded it My sister called out that I had cut my mother. I then struggled to get away from them, and I tumbled down with the whole of them a top of me. They sent for Mr. Churchyard, the policeman, and when he came in I threw the knife down, and he brought me to the station-house. None of it was done intentionally towards my mother. I could not throw the knife away because they were so close upon me. When it was done my mother was not present. I told her I was very sorry for it.—Mr. Combe inquired what the prisoner worked at?—The father replied he had worked at a paper-stainer's; and said that this was the second time the prisoner had stabbed his mother The prisoner was remanded for a week. He did not appear at all affected, and left the bar with indifference

TWO fashionably-attired young men, who gave their names and occupations as Charles Roberts and William Chambers, linendrapers, but who turned out to be a brace of medical students, were charged with violently assaulting police-constable Baker, with treating several knockers of doors, and with disturbing the public peace.—From the evidence of the complainant, it appeared that that morning, at ten minutes to two o'clock, he was on duty in Caroline-street, Bedford-square, when the prisoners passed by. They went up to almost every door, and gave the knockers a twist. They then went into Russell-street. Chambers went to the door of Mr. Alexander, foreign bookseller, and wrenched the knocker off. Roberts did the same at the next door. The constable went over and took Roberts into custody; whereupon the latter seized him by the collar, struck him on the chest, kicked him violently, and at length foiled him to the ground, where he gave him several severe blows on the head, from which the constable deposed he was suffering great pain. Police-constable Baker then came up and was assaulted by Chambers. He sprung his rattle. When the prisoners found they would be overpowered, Chambers offered the policeman £10 to set them at liberty, and tendered his watch and chain as a pledge. The bribe was rejected, and they were taken to the station-house. On searching them there were several bell-handles found on them, and in the cell where they had been, three knockers of doors.—Mr. Alexander identified the knocker as his property, and said his family had been greatly alarmed by the noise made in twisting it off. Mr. Richard Spell, 25, New Ormond-street, identified another of the knockers. Mr. Combe: What are you, prisoner?—Roberts: I am an assistant in the house of my uncle, a linendraper, named Ford, Holborn. —Chambers: I am a clerk, out of employment. Mr. Combe: I do not believe a word of it. Is there anybody here that knows you?—They answered, "No."—Mr. Combe said he would fine the prisoners 40s. each, or in default would enable them to pay the utmost fine he could impose, £5, without inconvenience. If that were the case he thought he would not be doing his duty towards the public if he did not inflict a heavier punishment, namely, to send them to prison and hard labour for a fortnight. Prisoners. Oh! your worship, we shall be ruined if you do so. Fine us.—Mr. Combe Who are you, then?—The prisoners were silent. They were then remanded. Their real profession was subsequently discovered, and they were fined £5 each, and the expense of new knockers, &c.—They were then packed up, when Chambers paid his fine, &c., and the friends of Roberts shortly after drove up in a carriage, paid his fine, &c., and drove off with him.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

THE ALLEGED MURDER AT PECKHAM.—On Monday an inquest was held at the Swan Inn, Peckham New Town, before Mr. Carter, coroner for Surrey, and a highly respectable jury, on view of the body of Mrs. Norah Lenney, aged forty, whose death, it was alleged, had been caused by her having been kicked by her husband William Lenney, a beer-shop keeper and greengrocer, residing in Bexley-street, Camberwell, on Thursday afternoon last, whilst in a state of intoxication, and quarrelling with her husband. The unfortunate deceased was far advanced in pregnancy, and expected her confinement daily. Lenney had been apprehended, and on Friday under went an examination at Union Hall; and the prisoner was remanded for the production of evidence as to the origin of the quarrel which led to the fatal results. From the evidence adduced before the coroner, it appeared that on the afternoon of Thursday the deceased and her husband were sitting in the back parlour. The deceased was much in liquor, when she threw an earthen mug at her husband, and ultimately seized him by the hair of his head, and pulling him off a chair, they both fell upon the ground, the deceased underneath. When the husband got up, he gave her a kick on the abdomen over her person; but it was not a violent one. Almost immediately after a violent hemorrhage ensued, and a midwife was sent for: but the deceased expired in about three quarters of an hour. The deceased was addicted to the habits of intemperance, and they frequently quarrelled. The evidence of Mr. Lodge, a surgeon, who had made a post mortem examination of the body, went to show that the deceased had died from exhaustion, caused by excessive hemorrhage; but could not undertake to say that the injury was the positive result of violence. After a long consultation, the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death, caused by an internal injury by her husband falling upon her accidentally, and not with any intention of violence." The inquiry lasted upwards of six hours.

On Monday forenoon Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest at the Angel and Trumpet, King-street, Holborn, on the body of Mr. Joseph Crane, aged 59, a wine-merchant, late of No. 11, in the above street. Mr. John Crane, son of deceased, said, that on Friday morning last, a little before seven o'clock, having come down stairs, he perceived the cellar door ajar, which was unusual. He tried to enter, but found the door obstructed by something behind. At length he forced it open, and found his father hanging behind it, being suspended by the neck from the service-pipe leading to the cistern, by means of a bell-rope. Not having a knife about him, witness called for assistance, which was speedily at hand, and deceased was cut down. The body, though warm, was dead. At bed-time the previous night witness saw deceased alive. During the last three weeks, in particular, his spirits were much depressed, and he shunned the society of his friends. He had made no great complaint. Verdict to the coroner: Had he no medical advice for that pain? -Witness: No; though pressed by my mother to consult a physician, he declined doing so, alleging that it was of no use.—The coroner: In such cases, the sufferers' friends should of themselves call in medical aid. It is astonishing how far the best, the strongest of us, molecules, whilst but only some little member of the body is injured, a finger, or even a nail, the surgeon is sent for. People suffering pain in the head are not proper judges of what ought to be done, and their relations should advise and act for them. The doing so would often prevent fatal mischief. The witness said, that in 1838 his father had consulted Dr. Monroe, who stated that he could do nothing for him, and pronounced him insane, and desired that he should be watched vigilantly. He was so watched, and a former attempt at suicide frustrated: but, until latterly, deceased appeared of sane mind. He laboured under a delusion that he was unable to pay certain small debts, whereas he had placed in the hands of a friend in trust a large sum of money to be prepared for any contingency. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

SUICIDE FROM DESPONDENCY.—On Tuesday an inquest was held before Mr. Baker, at the Black Horse, Kingsland-road, on the body of William Hall, aged 21, the son of John Hall, hatter, of 12, Castle-street, Finsbury. John Hall said that the deceased was his son. He left home on Wednesday last to pay a bill, and since then witness had not seen him alive, and did not know what had become of him, until he received information that on Saturday morning a man, named Thomas Ibbs, found his body floating in the Regent's Canal. Deceased had no occasion whatever to go near the canal. Witness had no doubt that the deceased committed suicide in consequence of the great difficulty he found in getting work. He had had none for some time past, and he often complained of his distress. Verdict, "Found drowned."

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE RIVER AT BRENTFORD.—Late on Monday night, whilst Mr. Baker was holding an inquest at the Salutation, Old Brentford, information was brought into the inquest-room that a little boy, named Andrew Swan, 11 years of age, had met his death by drowning. The body having been recovered, the usual means to restore animation were resorted to, but failed. The [illegible] then forthwith impannelled the jury, and having viewed the body, which was warm, the evidence relative to his death was gone into, from which it appeared that he was amusing himself by playing on a coal-wharf, from which he jumped on to a plank floating on the river. He began dancing on it for some time, when, his foot slipping, he fell into the water and was drowned. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

SUICIDE OF AN HOTEL KEEPER.—On Tuesday an inquest was held before Mr. Baker, in the Coffee-room of the White Hart Tavern, High-street, Shoreditch, on the body of Mr. Edward Osborne Pickman, aged 49, a wine-merchant, and proprietor of the above establishment, who destroyed himself. Henry Falger said he was a waiter in the employ of the deceased, who had for the last 30 years conducted the business of the Bull Inn, Aldgate and thereby amassed a very large fortune. About three months since, he laid out several hundred pounds in the purchase of the above house, which being in close proximity to the Eastern Counties Railway, he laid out still further sums in rebuilding and decorating in such a manner as to answer all the purposes of a first-rate hotel, but the slow progress of the works appeared to give him great uneasiness. The house was opened, for the first time, on Monday week, on which occasion 30 gentlemen, of the county of Essex, dined there. The deceased appeared then in the best of health and spirits, and remained so until Thursday morning, when he appeared very unwell and low. He retired to rest with Mrs. Pickman; and about half-past eight o'clock on Friday morning she came down stairs, leaving deceased in his bed-room, about to dress. In about a quarter of an hour after he was sent up to inform his master that breakfast was waiting. The door was locked, and, on knocking, deceased answered that he would come down directly. They waited for deceased half an hour, and, as he did not make his appearance, witness, accompanied by deceased's nephew, went up to the room, and, receiving no answer to their calls, burst open the door, and found deceased lying on the floor in a pool of blood, and a razor lying a short distance from him, with which he had inflicted some dreadful wounds on his throat. He was alive, and Mr. Hancorne, the surgeon, was sent for, and bound up the wounds; but deceased died the same evening. Mr. Charles Pickman, the deceased's nephew, said the only complaint deceased made was of a pain in the chest. He was in most flourishing circumstances, and they could not account for his commission of the act.—Mr. Hancorne, the surgeon, said deceased had inflicted seven wounds in his throat altogether, three of which were very deep. It was his impression that he had been induced to commit the act under the influence of over-anxiety, which would produce a sort of melancholy insanity. The jury ultimately returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

FEMALE HERRING-GUTTERS AT WICK.—After breakfast we went ashore to Wick. And there witnessed one of the most extraordinary sights we have seen for many a day. All along the inner harbour, and in every street and quay, as well as within many large enclosed yards and covered buildings, there are numerous square wooden boxes, as big as ordinary sized rooms, the containing sides, however, being only two or three feet high. Into these huge troughs the herrings are carried in panniers from the boats the instant they arrive. There they are all tumbled in helter-skelter, pannier after pannier, in a long-continued stream of fish, until the boats are emptied or the troughs are filled. Then come troops of sturdy females, each armed with knife in hand, and range themselves around the trough. Before beginning to work they take off their caps and bonnets, and either cover over or exchange their outer garment for a worser, making their toilet with innocent unreserve sub Jove, and so commence their bloody occupation. Towards evening they carefully wash their faces, arms, and legs, and slip on again their better garments. Then the troops appear, prepared for getting home, or otherwise than rather than army. Indeed many of the most magnificently fine females, whom we saw standing at respectable doors, or looking out of decent windows, or going sedately about their evening occupations from shop to shop, had been assiduously engaged in gutting all day long. The cure of herrings is indeed an object of such paramount importance to the town and neighbourhood, that when an unusual take occurs, and delicate female hands are wanting for the work, a kind of requisition is sent through the town, even to the most respectable inhabitants, to allow their domestics to attend as gutters for a day or two; and in hiring servants it is by no means unusual for the latter to stipulate for leave to gut during a certain number of days, as a perquisite beyond their usual termly wages. To prevent indolence or illness, all these gutters are paid by piece-work, that is, so much a cran or barrel after the fish are packed. At the rate of 4d. per barrel, each gutter, according to her skill and activity, may make from four to seven shillings a-day; and in former times, when so high as a shilling a barrel was sometimes allowed during a press of work and scarcity of hands, their gains were actually enormous. An expert and practised company of three can make up among them sixty-three barrels in a day, or twenty-one barrels each; so that, in the glorious times alluded to, a gutter might have kept her gig, and driven on the scene of action daily.—Wilson's Voyage Round Scotland and the Isles.

IMMORAL AGENCY.—INNS.—When in passing the door of an inn I hear or see a company of intoxicated men in the "excess of riot," I cannot persuade myself that he who supplies the wine, and profits by the viciousness, is a moral man. In the private house of a person of respectability such a scene would be regarded as a scandal. It would lower his neighbour's estimate of the excellence of his character. But does it then constitute a sufficient justification of allowing vice in our houses, that we get by it? Does morality grant to a man an exemption from his obligations at the same time as he procures his license? Drunkenness is immoral. If, therefore, when a person is on the eve of intoxication, the innkeeper supplies his demand for another bottle, he is accessory to the immorality. A man was lately found drowned in a stream. He had just left a public-house where he had been intoxicated during sixty hours; and within this time the publican had supplied him (besides some spirits) with forty quarts of ale. Does any reader need to be convinced that this publican had acted criminally? His crime, however, was neither the greater nor the less, because it had been the means of loss of life: no such accident might have happened; but his guilt would have been the same. Probity is not the only virtue which it is good policy to practise. The innkeeper, of whom it was known that he would not supply the means of excess, would probably gain by the report of those who approved his integrity more than he would lose by the absence of those whose excesses that integrity kept away. An inn has been conducted upon such maxims. He who is disposed to make proof of the result, might fix upon an established quantity of the different liquors, which he would not exceed. If that quantity were determinately fixed, the lover of excess would have no ground of complaint when he had been supplied to its amount. Such honourable and manly conduct might have an extensive effect, until it influenced the practice even of the lower resorts of intemperance. A sort of ill-fame might attach to the house in which a man could become drunk; and the maxim might be established by experience, that it was necessary to the respectability, and therefore, generally to the success, of a public-house, that none should be seen to reel out of its doors.—Dymond's Essays.

JANUARY.—January is derived from Janus, a god who presided over gates, January being the gate of the year, inasmuch as it opens it; though this, says Casaubon, is rather a porter's office than a gate's. Whereon Brunckius observes, that December is as much a porter as January, since it closes the year. Snooksius wants to know how it is, if a house is closed with its gate, and January is the gate of the year, that the year is not over on the 31st of January, when the mouth closes. It is also objected that, as the Roman year began in March, January did not open the year. The god Janus was represented with two faces, which were termed by the Roman jokers "chops for two." The sign of January is Aquarius, or the Waterman, blowing his nails on the cab-stand.—Punch's Comic Almanack.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. IX.

MR. ROEBUCK, M.P.

As the "bribery Parliament" closes its first session, we introduce our readers to that gentleman among its members who has been most loud in his outcry against the system of corruption, and who has made a sort of Quixotic crusade against the "election compromise gang" with more chivalry than success, for it would seem that the house of bribers is a house of incurables too. As, however, we have already recorded our approval of the way in which the honourable member began and followed out his charges upon a recent occasion, as well as our conviction that he then vindicated himself, in defiance of the taunts of his deprecators and the bully-ragging of the Times, we shall here say "no more on that head," but merely dash off a few of the other salient points of our parliamentary hero's political career.

Mr. Roebuck, then, has long belonged to the independent class of extreme radicals,—holding opinions, generally, which we believe to be not far short of republican, and with the violence and excess of which we find nothing in common. All the eloquence of the honourable member would never seduce us into a disrespect for the institutions of the country, or shake our allegiance to the principle of a limited monarchy.

Mr. Roebuck began his career as a barrister; and if the said career was in the same capacity, a brief one, we believe the circumstance was principally owing to a want of briefs—a locus a non lucendo sort of reason, which is not incompatible with the style of a great deal of the honourable member's oratory. From the hopeless bar, however he turned his thoughts to the hopeful parliament, anchoring his ambition on the reform bill, or rather upon what threatened, under agitation, to be its final issue,—and setting Blackstone's Commentaries to float with Coke and Lyttleton in any other cockle-boat than his—leaving them to the pleasures of smooth water if they liked them, while he, and others of his genus and kidney, sailed upon a sea of discord; and, to do justice to their courage and adventurous spirit, in a very crazy and unseaworthy political bark. Mr. Roebuck might now, therefore, be often heard haranguing multitudes in the high places, and labouring hard after a celebrity that might sometimes have been more honoured in the breach than the observance; but which he nevertheless continued slowly and perseveringly to attain, until at last, when the world was beginning to apply to him the old familiar sneer of, "Go to Bath," the slang equivalent to "We are better without you,"—the honourable gentleman took society at its word—did go to Bath with a vengeance; and with a hey presto moment, became, in the twinkling of a bed-post, the principal political pump of that ancient city. Ever since then, although he has not been all the time in Parliament, he has worked the said pump-handle with a laborious industry worthy of a better genius; and the waters of his eloquence have been spouted forth upon society usque ad nauseam, and with a torrent-like superfluity that would surfeit even the most peculiar and persevering thirst. The public horse that may stoop its head for refreshment to the babbling of some gentler rivulets, can hardly be expected to finish in gulpiike draughts of phrenzy the turbid waters of your mud-stirred ponds. Mr. Roebuck begun to find that it would be better to filter his beverage, and take the advice given to Goody in the burletta of Midas, to "moderate the rancour of her tongue." This, however, did not occur until he began, in a measure, to feel the responsibility of having acquired a position.

We have only to justify our opinion of his former violence, by reminding our readers of his conduct in reference to the Canadas; and how completely his name was associated with the names of Hume, Thompson, and others, with the mischievous doctrines and agitations that had assumed even the formidable shape of enjoinments "to shake off the baneful domination of the mother country," and were said eventually to have incited the disastrous, though soon-quelled rebellion of 1838. Mr. Roebuck, however, we do not believe to have been such a thick-and-thin disturber, as the friend of the traitor Mackenzie; but rather give him credit for sincere though violent convictions, the holding of which he perhaps converted, in his own mind, into a sort of imaginary duty—as the people who owned them were his clients—and he was in this country, as a barrister and member of Parliament, the recognised and paid advocate and agent of the Canadian claims. He even figured in their defence and favour at the bar of the Commons; where, however, he made no great hand of their cause, being more windy than argumentative, and displaying greater elaboration than force.

He was put out of the last Parliament; but having been re-elected for Bath to the present House of Commons, has evinced a more steady and prudent tone of mind, and has curbed the flavour of his public expressions of extreme and almost revolutionary radicalism, however affectionately he may in secret be cherishing its creed. He is, in fact, a more sober man before the public—better liked, more respected, and, in the recent instance of his election petition exertions, very generally approved.

Mr. Roebuck has some credit for manly bearing and physical courage; and, in the event of a gentlemanly or ungentlemanly personal quarrel, does not refuse to "go out." He has had one or two touches of the duello, to give a smack of relish to his political career. With discretion he may live and die in the attainment of as much distinction as a mediocre respectability of intellect is capable of achieving in the broad pathway of the political world. But, should he be thrust very strongly prominent, it will be notoriety, and not greatness, that will crown his name.

We understand that her Majesty intends to visit Scotland early in September, and that her Majesty will go by sea.

A dinner was given at the Clarendon Hotel, on Saturday, to Lord Mahon and Mr. Sergeant Talfourd to celebrate the passing of the Copyright Bill, at which Lord Monteagle (in the absence of the Chancellor, who was prevented by indisposition from attending) presided. Amongst the company present were Lord Campbell, Lord Lyttleton, Lord Ashley, the Attorney-General, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, and Sir Howard Douglas.

CHARTIST OPEN AIR MEETING IN SOUTHWARK.—On Monday evening a vast body of the working classes, in number about 4000, assembled in the open space adjoining the pin manufactory, adjacent to St. George's-market, Southwark, "for the purpose of adopting a memorial to be presented to her Majesty, praying her to dismiss the present administration from her councils, and to appoint a ministry who will make the people's charter a cabinet measure," &c. About half-past seven o'clock, a van drew up, wherein several delegates and speakers placed themselves. Mr. Morley was called to the chair; when, having explained the objects of the meeting, several other parties addressed the assembly, which conducted itself in the most orderly and peaceable manner. The observations generally were to the effect, that the working classes were in a very distressed and degraded state, and the only remedy for which was to unite with the Working Men's Association, in order to obtain the charter; but this only could be obtained by peaceable measures, and whoever should attempt to break the law, would only give encouragement to the new detective force and system of espionnage, and was an enemy to the cause and to his fellow man. They were determined to have a voice in the representation, and no longer to submit to the dominion of the aristocracy, and for this purpose the country would be kept in agitation. It was stated that Mr. F. O'Connor was absent attending to the election at Southampton, having previously exerted himself in the attempt to prevent Mr. Walter being returned for Nottingham. A resolution condemnatory of class legislation, and for presenting the memorial having been adopted, three cheers were given for F. O'Connor and for the Charter, and the meeting separated.

It is very confidently asserted in the court circles that it is her Majesty's intention, with Prince Albert, to honour the Duke of Devonshire with a visit in the ensuing month at his grace's noble seat in Derbyshire (Chatsworth House), where he arrived on Monday se'nnight to spend the autumnal months.

THE COUNTRY RIOTS.

In our last paper we had regretfully to announce the first outbreak of sad and serious riots in the manufacturing districts. Alas! their turbulence has since swollen into a giant torrent, which, tearing and bursting its furious and misguided way among our northern depots of commerce, has swept down the barriers of citizenship and order, converted the labourer into an anarchist, and assumed all the alarming features of systematic insurrection. The flame of mutiny seems, like the Grecian naphtha, to have spread its lurid mischief over whole districts of excited misery—to have thrown its glare upon the squalid face of starvation, and, with something of the attributes of the dark lantern, to have flung its revealments upon a wretchedness that was fast gathering into crime. Thousands upon thousands of distressed artisans have increased their distresses by foregoing the fruits of work, have repudiated labour, and congregated in field and city with an organized confederacy of purpose, which proves that "bread-want" has not been their only impeller; but that, apart from personal privation, they have been taught politically to brood. They have long been ponderers over the destinies, which they might patiently and peacefully and unduringly have borne, if the most cruel of all human agitation had not lent its exasperating malignity, to increase the bitterness of wrong and suffering among the manufacturing poor, and so thrilled them by the awakening of bad passions, that a ferment of the spirit was engendered and kept up, until its yeasty effervescence overboiled the heart of poverty; and broke loose upon society in madness, in vengeance, and in hate. It was not enough that the people should have, as they unquestionably had, too much want and affliction to bear easily; but their brutal and cowardly inciters must needs destroy their endurance with the explosive elements of blood-shedding and bootless revolt.

In other columns of this journal will be found the sickening details of the calamity and disaster to which the agitation we are most earnestly condemning has unfortunately led. The anti-corn-law leaguer and the chartist are, we fear, responsible for the results—responsible, as we think, to their Queen, their country, and their God. We are no partisans; we do not oppose, abstractedly for their peculiar doctrines, either the chartist or the anti-corn-law leaguer; we leave all political opinion, however violent, its fair play; but we despise the infamous diplomacy which would make its game out of the miseries of the people, which would drown the human heart in its interests, and humiliate Christian sympathy into the guilty wretchedness of self. Nothing can more excite our indignant rebuke than the revolutionary and almost sanguinary villany of the quack preacher of politics, who says, "I have a charter to achieve here, or a corn-law to repeal there, and, now that the people are starving and in tatters, I will convert their rags into banners of rebellion, and their hunger into the sign of blood." Yet this we believe to have been the course that was pursued and is pursuing, furnishing the key, if we are not grievously mistaken, to all the riots and seditions that are disturbing the land.

On the other hand, how deeply do we mourn for, how anxiously do we sympathise with, the poor deluded men who have plunged themseves headlong into these alarming tumults. We cannot shrink from a conviction that they have been dreadfully pressed by the evils of the time—that want and sorrow, and sometimes even injury, have stared them in the face; that the ties of kindred have pulled at their very heartstrings; that wives and children have looked up at them with the craving spirit and the starving eye; that bread has not been crumbled within their threshold, nor fire sparkled upon their hearths: in a word, that they have been lean, hungry, wretched, and perhaps oppressed; but still we feel that, with all this grief, they might and would have struggled their way into the sunshine, and gained the relieving influence of better days, if the devilism of the demagogue had not flung darkness upon their hoping and enduring spirits, and lit up the flame of anarchy in the temple of despair!

As it is, the worst signs are upon the political horizon. All the manufacturing districts are up in arms; at Preston the insurgents have been fired upon, and some of them wounded mortally; troops, guards, artillery, have been poured in upon the shocking scene of insurrection; and there seems to have been a spreading organization of a most formidable and disciplined character, everywhere at a moment's notice, and with a most baffling and unexpected presence springing up in displays of moral and physical power, and indicating predetermined plans of action, and not the loose outbreak of a merely infuriated crowd. There is a mischievous shout, too, of "run for gold"—a direct cry of pressure upon the savings' banks—and every other aggravating horror and inconvenience to which malignant ruffianism can resort. All this is not the wisdom, but the madness, of the people. They can gain nothing by it—they must lose much. They lose labour, wages, sympathy, relief. The insurrections are sure to be put down, and that effectually, even though it be in blood. This is not a country where mere riot among the lower orders can by possibility gain victorious strength or sway. The middle classes—the balancing scales of the community—must in England form the thermometer of any revolution that political fury may enact; and such class outbreaks as are now disturbing our manufacturing districts will never entail either honour, or triumph, or freedom, upon those who experimentalize with their rash weapons, and arm themselves with their brittle reeds.

Every way, therefore, we lament the dismal occurrences that have transpired, and from which, because they are destitute of social peace and order, even the justification of injury is taken away. Heaven knows that our cause is with the poor, and strongly have we reasoned and remonstrated on their behalf; but we set up JUSTICE and HUMANITY as our household gods, and for neither poor nor rich will we despoil their altars. There is no justice, there is no humanity in the late revolts; and although we rest their blame and guilt more upon the inciters than the enactors of the crime, yet we will not take the part of the latter because we execrate and detest the first. We will stand by the poor with our latest word and breath—proclaim and redress their grievances—sympathising with their sorrows, their suffering, and their wrongs—but never advocate the restlessness of their passions, or palliate the wickedness which sullies the moral dignity of endurance with the stigma of vengeance and the stain of blood.

VIEW OF MANCHESTER.

MANCHESTER.

Manchester, the metropolis of manufacture, is, at present, an object of universal and painful anxiety. We have gathered from the events of the day a few detached scenes which may prove interesting to the reader; we had intended also to give a topographical sketch of the place, but the necessity for going into this part of the subject is almost obviated by the engrossing interest attached to the other. A short sketch, however, will be necessary.

Manchester is situated in the hundred of Salford and the county of Lancaster, 168 miles N.W. by N. of London. The parish, which comprises several townships, had in 1773 a population of 13,786, and, in 1831, 270,363, of which there were in the township of Manchester 142,026. From 1801 to the last census in 1831 the population had more than doubled itself; nor has the increase come to a stand. In Pigot's Manchester and Salford Directory, for 1829, were given 34,200 names of resident housekeepers; in that for 1839 above 44,000: in the former the number of streets was 2,740; in the latter 3,620. Under the Reform Act Manchester sends two members to Parliament. In the first election (1832), contested by five candidates, there were given 9,689 votes; in the election in 1835 four candidates received 9,636 votes.

Under the Municipal Act the borough has a commission of the peace, is divided into fifteen wards, has a mayor (Thomas Potter, Esq., the first mayor), sixteen aldermen, and forty-eight councillors, whom the act empowers to hold a Court of Record for the trial of civil actions, provided the sum or damages sought to be recovered do not exceed twenty pounds. Under the same act the borough has also a commission of the peace and the right of holding quarter sessions.

The town is not distinguished for architectural beauty; its chief streets are occupied with warehouses and shops, the more and the less opulent inhabitants residing, at a greater or less distance from the centre of the town, in dwellings separate from those in which they conduct their business, many of which are spacious and beautiful. There are, however, some objects of architectural interest in Manchester. Under the sanction of Acts of Parliament, much has been done for the improvement of the town, both in convenience and appearance. Market-street, the chief mart for retail business, was not many years ago a mère lane: it is now a very handsome street. The improvement was completed in 1834, when the total outlay was £232,925. The Manchester Improvement Committee have also judiciously applied the profits of the gas-works, which are in the hands of the Commissioners of Police, to the improvement of the township: £20,057 were thus expended by them in the year 1835. Among the public buildings worthy of notice may be named the chaste portico of the Subscription Library, and the truly classic and handsome Royal Institution, both in Moseley-street, and the hall of the Museum in Peter-street. The Infirmary is a fine building, and has an advantage which is rare in Manchester, namely, that of being in a favourable situation. Several new churches have recently added to the appearance of the out-districts of the town, among which the churches at Pendleton and Hume deserve special mention, but even these are inferior to the beautiful church in the pointed style erected by Mr. Atkinson, architect, near Smedley-lane, Cheetham Hill.

Manchester stands on the south-east bank of the river Irwell, by which it has a communication with the Mersey, Liverpool, and the ocean. It is situate in a district which contains some of the best coal strata of England, a circumstance to which the place is in no small degree indebted for its prosperity. The weekly consumption of coal in the town and neighbourhood is estimated at 26,000 tons, the charge of which is for the factories about 8s. per ton, for private houses 12s. per ton. In 1836, 913,991 tons were brought into Manchester.

Next to the trade and prosperity of the place, the condition of the people is of the greatest importance, and the following description of it by a recent writer contains, we fear, much truth.—"As to the intellectual and moral condition of the working classes, there has doubtless been great exaggeration, but it is equally true that in that condition there is much to deplore. The prevalence of the factory system has broken up the old domestic manufacture, and thereby destroyed old domestic habits; it has also called from every district of the kingdom, and especially from Ireland (there are at least 50,000 Irish in Manchester), masses of people heterogeneous in their character, yet all more or less ignorant and uncultivated and not likely therefore to coalesce speedily into a compact form of civilized existence. Most of them have been much bettered in their circumstances without having found an equal increase of morally improving influences. Children, by the amount of their wages have become independent of their parents; girls have been sent into the mill before they have learnt the rudiments of domestic duty; and mothers, whose presence in their own houses is indispensable, work for twelve hours in the day amid a mass of people, young and old, with whom they have little or no connection, and from whom, in consequence, they can scarcely derive any improvement. It must also be said the atmosphere of the factory is unnatural, and consequently unhealthy; while the degree of heat tends to the premature development of the passions, and, as the least harmful consequence, to early, improper, and improvident marriages. The charges against the factories of being the scenes of violence and cruelty to children, of extortion against the men, as destructive alike of life and morality, may be considered as gross extravagances or little better than falsehoods; but it is not the less true that neither their moral nor their physical atmosphere is favourable to the well being of the work-people; that, with some honourable exceptions, the masters are disregardful of the comforts and improvements of those whom they employ, and think exclusively of the wealth they can extract from their establishments, and that this there has arisen on the part of the workmen a feeling of jealousy, of dislike, of sullen discontent, which, added to other depraving influences, makes their moral tone hard, disposed to violence and almost reckless, while their congregating together in masses gives them opportunities of communicating their feelings to one another and of concentrating their power. The system has not been sufficiently long in general operation to afford accurate means of judging of its effect on health and life; it has also been tried in relation to these matters, under favourable circumstances, since there has been a continual influx of fresh population to the mills from rural districts or small towns, and therefore statistical tables cannot furnish any adequate means of forming an opinion; but in relation to children, the wonder is, that any one should have doubted of the injurious influence which it has upon their health, and consequently on their character. As it is, the moral condition of the young, and of the homes where they come, are in many cases very bad. When the mother is in the factory, the home must be in disorder. When parents subsist on the earnings of their children, as in many instances, the relations of domestic life are subverted; the weak labour, the strong are idle, idleness begets vice, vice is the parent of discontent, and this leads to the use of intoxicating drinks; the parent is moreover punished in the disobedience, if not insolence, which soon manifests itself on the part of the children, who are well aware how much the family depends on their earnings."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The ratifications of the treaty between France and Belgium on the linen duties have been exchanged; the treaty came into operation on Monday last.

The responsible publisher of the Gazette de France has been sentenced by the Seine Court of Assizes to a year's imprisonment, and a fine of 12,000 francs (£480), for seditious articles since the Duke of Orleans's death. M. Herbert, the Procureur-General, conducted the prosecution, and in the course of his speech having remarked that he knew of no Henri Cinq, M. Maugrin, the Bonapartist Deputy, who defended the Gazette in a most able address, replied that there had been legally a Henri Cinq, for on the day when the abdication of Charles the Tenth and the Duke of Angoulême took place in favour of Henri Cinq, the documents were deposited in the archives of the Chambers, and the election of Louis Philippe on the 7th of August followed subsequently therefore Henri Cinq had existed legally.

The Débats refers to the absence of Lord John Russel from the task of reviewing the business of the session, and says "Lord Palmerston is undeniably a very clever man, and one of the most skilful and experienced debaters in Parliament. He excels in making the most of a bad cause, and of giving the appearance of success to the most unmitigated defeat. Lord Palmerston required all his oratorical dexterity to accomplish his purpose, for, in attacking the policy of his adversaries, he had naturally to defend that for which he was responsible for ten years. The task could not have been in better hands, for if Lord Palmerston has any other quality equal to the fecundity of his resources, it is imperturbable assurance, which is designated by his adversaries by a term much less discreet. Where the most courageous British statesman would lose confidence in the force and future prospects of their country, Lord Palmerston alone would preserve an unchangeable confidence in himself. He fully represents, if not the genius, at least the bonne prosperitation, he speaks of the ruins he has produced in the most quiet manner, and under the bloom of the Afghan disaster—of the prolonged war in China—of the disorganization of the Ottoman empire—of the relations between England and America—of the French alliance destroyed—and of the peace compromised in the entire world, Lord Palmerston still finds sufficient assurance to congratulate his opponents on the brilliant legacy he has bequeathed to them, and to magnify quite seriously the glorious results of all the enterprises into which he blindly embarked England. He did this in a very skilful and brilliant and sarcastic speech; but, unfortunately, he had a stronger adversary to reply to him, and Sir Robert Peel's vigorous onslaught must have pretty well calmed the enthusiasm with which the remembrance of his victories and conquests had inspired the ex-minister for Foreign Affairs."

The Paris Journals of Monday contain no facts of importance.

M. Dupin moved, on Sunday, his report on the Regency Bill to the Committee of the Chamber of Deputies, by whom it was unanimously approved.

According to the Commerce, two amendments only will be introduced in the Bill. The Regent will be required to take his oath previous to entering on the discharge of his functions, and to renew the oath afterwards before the Chambers, which are to be convoked, not in the three months, but in a delay of forty days, after the demise of the King. Another amendment will increase power to Paris as launched at Cherbourg, on the 10th instant. Monday the Feast of the Assumption was observed as a strict holiday in Paris, and was also the fête of Napoleon. Among the incidents of that day was a procession of the wrecks of the old Imperial Guard to the Invalids, and to the column in the place Vendome. The 5 per cents were down at the Café Anglais at 78f 50c.

SPAIN.—MADRID, August 7.—These few days past the Journals of all shades of politics have published letters from Castile, Asturia, Navarre, Murcia, Santander, Catalonia, and even from Galicia, all breathing fears and suspicions of a coming movement, or rather of simultaneous movements, in various parts of the kingdom.

The new Minister of Marine is displaying some activity at Ferrol. The new frigate Christina, as soon is ready for sea and exertions are making to restore the naval artillery to a respectable state, but the want of funds is all sufficient to retard the best-directed efforts.

To day the Queen had three double teeth extracted, to make room for new ones. In the course of the last month the dentist, Don Melchor Ibarrondo, also removed two colmillos, or canine teeth, which were each struggling for precedence with their rivals. Her Majesty grows apace, and is growing strong also. She bears these operations admirably. Her attendants wished to postpone the last of the three extractions to day, but she had made up her mind, and begged that all might be finished without delay, for she thought nothing of the pain.

Barcelona was tranquil on the 9th Instant. The Constitucional of that day publishes a memorial signed by the colonel and all the officers of the regiment of Guadalajara, in which they reprove the sentiments lately expressed by some of their comrades, in favour of the rights of Christina to the Regency, and declare that the liberties and institutions of the country, the constitutional throne of Isabella II. and the Regency of the Duke of Victory, have not more loyal and strenuous defenders, than the officers of that corps.

PORTUGAL.—The Royal Tar arrived on Saturday morning. Her dates of leaving are, from Gibraltar the 4th, Cadiz the 5th, Lisbon the 8th, Oporto 9th, and Vigo 10th inst.

The treaty with England is looked upon by all classes to be productive of no mutual or patrial interest to either country, and as giving the coup de grace to the ruin of the wine trade on the Douro. Some of the amendments, or rather reductions, proposed by the Portuguese commission on the custom-house tariff are truly ridiculous. Articles of no consumption, and which are seldom or ever imported into this country, have been selected as objects of their benevolent contemplation, viz.—London sticking plaster, tobacco pipes, &c.

It appears that Senhor Aguilar has demanded, on the part of Spain, from the Portuguese Government, that it shall not allow henceforth deposits of British goods of any description in Elvas or other frontier places, and that it take immediate steps for the carrying into effect this absurd and useless pretension. He has also claimed 32,000 dollars compensation for the Spanish master and merchant, who was seized by a Portuguese guerilla, taken into Portugal and ransomed by his son.

NAPLES, July 30.—This city lately had a visit from the French fleet, consisting of fourteen sail of the line. The Admiral was much mortified at not being permitted to anchor with all his force off the port, but the regulations, which since the visits of Nelson have been rigorously enforced, are that only four men-of-war shall anchor at any one time. During their stay a ball was given by the Prince de Joinville on board his ship, the Ville de Paris, which was very elegantly and handsomely attended. During the evening a quarrel arose between two midshipmen, the subject of which was one of the ladies in waiting of the Princess Polacastro. They got leave to go ashore the next morning, and took a room in an hotel, where they fought till one of them fell, pierced through the heart. The news of the death of the Duke of Orleans reached Naples by telegraph, after the Prince de Joinville had sailed, and a steamer was sent out to the fleet to communicate the sad intelligence.—Vesuvius has lately been exhibiting greater activity, which leads us to suppose it probable that there will be an eruption, if not immediately, at least within a few months; this is the more likely from its being now nearly four years since the last eruption. The railroad between Naples and Castellamare is now finished, and may be ready soon to pass on the most beautiful circuit in Europe. It is conducted all the way on the seashore, and the views of Naples, Resina, Torre del Greco, and Del Annunziata and Castellamare are most enchanting.—The English fleet have been long expected here, but they have not yet shown anything themselves either for war or peace. It is now two years since an English man-of-war has shown itself in the bay. The fleet of the King of Naples is preparing to convey his sister to Lisbon, where they are to meet the squadron of the Emperor of Brazil to conduct the Princess to her future husband.—The English church here is in a very low state, as the residents are obliged to pay not only a high rent for the church, but also nearly £300 per annum for the consular residence.

RUSSIA.—It is rumoured that an engagement has taken place between the Russians and Circassians, which ended by the latter taking possession of the fortress of Aboon. Aboon is a basis of operations for the Russians. It is the storehouse to serve a portion of the army, a place of refuge after a retreat, a tête-du-pont exceedingly useful to them, both for offence and defence, and neighbourhood. The Circassians may have annoyed the Russians, killed a few of them, and gained what is called a victory; but it is not likely that they should take fortresses at this time of the year, when the Russians are in their full strength, and more ready to do mischief than experience it.

GREECE.—By letters, under date 31st ultimo, it appears that the greatest confusion prevailed in the councils of King Otho, one portion of the Cabinet supporting Russian interests, and the other those of France. The Government had drained the treasury in order to forward 500,000 drachmas to Baron de Rothschild, to pay the interest of the loan, relying on France to advance the additional million necessary to complete the sum required for that purpose. Another earthquake was felt at Calamata the 12th, which was more violent perhaps than the shock experienced there in April last. The church of St. George, which was remarkable for its beauty and solidity, was destroyed, and two others, with forty or fifty houses, were more or less damaged.

TURKEY.—Constantinople, July 27.—The Austrian steamer from Trebisonde, which arrived on Sunday, the 24th, brought no news from Persia. The Turkish Envoy had not arrived. Preparations were, however, being made for hostilities, and Riza Kauli Khan, who commands the Persians, had had a skirmish with the Governor of Sulimania, and had been worsted. This news, however, merits confirmation. The English and Russian Governments have offered their mediation in the Turco-Persian business, and it will be doubtless accepted. The interests of the Persians in Constantinople are to be confided to Russia, during the period the hostilities from that country menace Turkey. On the morning of the 27th the announcement was made to the public of the dismissal of his Excellency Arif Pacha, President of the Grand Council of Justice. He is succeeded by his Excellency Ahmad Pacha, formerly Grand Vizier. Raouf Pacha yesterday went to the Palace and took his seat.

SYRIA.—A private letter from Beyrout of the 20th ult. mentions that the British Vice-Consul at Tarsus, Mr. Clapperton, had been ill-treated by some Pashas, that immediate satisfaction for the offence had been afforded by the Governor. The British Preacher in Jerusalem had quarrelled with the authorities, and the works of Dean Prideaux, church and all, had been consequently suspended. Bishop Alexander was continued to be confined from fever.

TURKISH AND RUSSIAN POLITICS IN WALLACHIA.—GALATZ, July 22.—The Imperial Russian Commissioner, Colonel Duhamel, is now on his journey back to Petersburgh, by the way of Jassy. He arrived at Bucharest without the foreknowledge of the Porte, for the purpose of investigating the causes of the misunderstandings existing between the Prince and his boyards. He is now returning to Russia without having accomplished anything; and the invidiuants of this country heartily congratulate themselves on perceiving in the intervention of Austria and France an application of the July treaty. Therefore, as the Porte has since then been placed under the protection of all the Three Powers, it is hoped there will be a reciprocal control against any preponderance which the one or the other may hope to establish.

REGENCY OF TRIPOLI.—By the arrival of her Majesty's ship Vernon from Tripoli, we have letters of the 23rd ult. The reign of the new Pacha has commenced favourably, and joy now prevails where disgust and dread were too recently conspicuous. A perfect Englishman at heart, the Pacha caused no small astonishment at his levee, which was held on the 19th for the reception of foreign Consuls and other dignitaries, by receiving them standing, and tendering his hand in European fashion. The ready facility, too, with which certain dignitaries, old friends of the tyrant Askor Ah, uttered their congratulations, and paid their homage to the new Regent, furnished matter of curious speculation to the Arabs, unmitiated in the mysteries of diplomacy. Colonel Warrington alone commands their esteem by his undeviating firmness.

EGYPT. ALEXANDRIA, July 15.—Orders have recently been given by the Pacha, that henceforward passengers' baggage in Egypt shall pass through without being at all subject to the annoyance or impertinent interference of the Custom-house officers, that all passengers and their baggage arriving by the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamers from England, shall be landed at the Mahmoudie Canal near the Shouara, without passing, as heretofore, through the city of Alexandria, by which means six hours' time will be gained.

The Alexandria advices of the 20th afford evidence of the Pacha's disposition to promote the overland India passage by the Isthmus of Suez. Private letters of the same date state that the Egyptian fleet was preparing to quit the harbour, for the purpose of exercising its crews at sea. Said Pacha, the new Admiral, had arrived from Zaria at Alexandria, and all the seamen who had been employed in the shipbuilds of the Pacha were to be on board in the course of five or six days. The Pacha was negotiating a loan of 1,500,000 talaris with some Armenian sarrafs in Constantinople, the proceeds of which were to be applied to the payment of the arrears due to the Government officers. The caravan from Soudan had reached Siut, in Upper Egypt, bringing 3000 slaves of both sexes, and 2000 camels laden with tamarinds, elephants' teeth, gold-dust, gum, &c., from the interior of Africa. Another caravan, coming directly from Darfour, had arrived within 18 days' march of Siut, with 3000 slaves and 6000 camels laden with various goods. The former had stopped at Siut until the customs' officers should repair thither from Cairo, to levy the usual duties, before it could proceed on its journey.

AMERICA.—The Acadia arrived at Liverpool on Saturday, after a voyage of nine days fifteen hours from Halifax, and less than twelve days from Boston. The intelligence contained in these papers is gratifying and important. It removes all doubt as to the settlement of the boundary question, in so far as the parties are concerned, among whom the greatest difficulties to an amicable adjustment might have been expected to arise. Lord Ashburton, on the part of Great Britain, the Commissioners of the State of Maine, and the Delegates of Massachusetts, having been able to concur in an arrangement, which is also sanctioned by the Executive Government of the Union, there is little reason to apprehend that the Senate of the United States, whose concurrence, according to the American constitution, is essential to the completion of a treaty, will interpose any serious or lasting impediment. Negotiations between Lord Ashburton and the Foreign Secretary of the American Government, with a view to the contemporaneous settlement of all the other questions in dispute, would naturally be carried on pari passu those relating to the boundary. We learn from the papers now before us not only that this was the actual course of affairs, but that the former negotiations, as well as the latter, have terminated successfully. That all the existing topics of dispitation between Great Britain and the United States are comprehended in the same adjustment, is the more gratifying that it is a circumstance which entitles the indictment to the American Senate to sanction and ratify what has been done.

SOUTH AMERICA.—Her Majesty's packet Ranger, Lieutenant Turner, with mails from the Brazils, and the Royal Mail Company's steamer, Teviot, Captain Bullock, from Mexico and the West Indies, arrived at Falmouth on Friday last, the former bringing 30 passengers and about £20,000 sterling on freight, and with dates from Rio de Janeiro to the 18th of June, Bahia 28th ditto, and Pernambuco 6th of July, the days of sailing from those places. By this arrival we learn that disturbances in the province of St Paulo still continued, and that a fresh insurrection had broken out at Barbacena, in the province of Minas, to both of which quarters the Government were despatching troops.

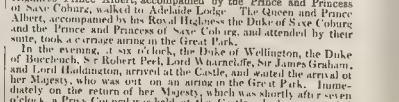
Whilst the Teviot was lying at Havannah, an alarming fire broke out in the wardroom, which threatened the most serious consequences, but, through the prompt and great exertions, was fortunately subdued, though not before doing great damage, and to repair which a detention of some days was occasioned.

The Texian Army, the Republic of Mexico, was said to be aiming at the supreme power, and to further his views, had partially gained over the military, and introduced a new constitution to Congress. These political events had caused much excitement, and had partially suspended hostilities. The intended hostilities against Texas were, it was said, about to be more vigorously carried on, but by what means is not very clearly apparent.

The Malta Mail publishes a very curious document. It is the excommunication, pronounced by the Romish Archbishop of Smyrna, of Mrs. James Whittal, a young Englishwoman, for having embraced the religion of her husband—Protestantism.

Advices from Aden of the 16th of July state that all was quiet, but from the warlike preparations of the Arab tribes an attack on the British Garrison was expected towards the end of the month.

Smyrna letters of the 29th ult. state that the French squadron, under the orders of Admiral de la Susse, sailed on the 28th for Syria.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Saturday.—This morning her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, walked to Adelaide Lodge. The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by his Royal Highness the Duke of Saxe Coburg and the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, and attended by their suite, took a carriage airing in the Great Park.

In the evening, at six o'clock, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Buccleuch, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Wharncliffe, Sir James Graham, and Lord Haddington, entered the Castle, and waited the arrival of her Majesty, who was out on an airing in the Great Park. Immediately on the return of her Majesty, which was shortly after seven o'clock, a Privy Council was held at the Castle, which was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the foreign ministers. Mr. Greville attended as clerk of the Council. The Council, after a short deliberation, broke up, and the whole of the members immediately returned to town. The Council was held for the purpose of adopting the most prompt and effective measures for suppressing the riots in Lancashire.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady C. Dundas, and Sir C. Conyngham, joined the royal dinner party in the evening.

SUNDAY.—Her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Duke of Saxe Coburg, and the hereditary Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, Viscountess Jocelyn, Colonel Wylde, and Captain Buckley, left the Castle at half-past eleven, and attended divine service in Cumberland Lodge Chapel this morning. The Rev. Mr. Atkins officiated, and preached an excellent sermon upon the 5th chapter of the Second Book of Kings, and the 13th verse.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and Lady C. Dundas, attended divine service in the parish church this morning. The Rev. I. Gross it officiated.

MONDAY.—This morning her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and his Royal Highness the Duke of Saxe Coburg, took walking exercise. In the afternoon the Queen, Prince Albert, and his Royal Highness the Duke of Saxe Coburg, attended as usual, rode out in the Park in pony carriages and four.

The Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, attended by Baron Bran-denstein, took their departure from the Castle this morning, and proceeded to town by the Great Western Railway.

WINDSOR, Wednesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert and the Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha, attended by the Duchess of Norfolk, breakfasted with her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent this day, her Royal Highness's natal day, at Frogmore Lodge. His Serene Highness the Prince of Leiningen was of the party.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—Saturday was the birthday of her Majesty the Queen Dowager. The auspicious event was celebrated at Gopsall Hall, Leicestershire, where her Majesty is paying on a visit to Earl Howe. His Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar arrived from town to join his august aunt and the royal circle.

GOPSALL HALL, Monday.—The intended visit of Queen Adelaide to Worcester and Malvern Wells is given up, in consequence of the disturbances in the provinces. On her Majesty's route from Gopsall to visit the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter at Burghley, this day week, the royal party had occasion to change horses at Billesdon, a village about ten miles the other side of Leicester, and an incident occurred there of rather a laughable nature. The royal carriage, containing the Queen Dowager and Earls Howe and Denbigh, and the Countess of Sheffield, was on the point of having the horses removed, when the notice of her Majesty was called by the appearance of several aged females, with a teapot in one hand, ornamented with ribbons, and a nosegay of flowers in the other, when one of them presented a petition to her Majesty, by whom it was attentively perused. The purport of the petition did not transpire to our knowledge, but before the royal carriage drove away, the illustrious visitor deposited a sovereign in each of the teapots, to the agreeable surprise of the "ladies" of Billesdon, who retired amidst the laughter and cheers of the assembled villagers, no doubt highly gratified with the success of their mission, looking a thousand thanks to the "good" Queen Adelaide, of whose benevolence and amiability they had received so princely a proof.

ROYAL VISIT TO PLYMOUTH.—We understand that a special messenger arrived at Portsmouth on Tuesday, with instructions to the authorities to prepare the royal yacht, if possible, by Saturday, to convey her Majesty to Plymouth if being her Majesty's intention to honour with her presence at the Dockyard the launch of the Albion, henceforth to be named the Albert. We are sure that nowhere will our young and gracious Sovereign receive a more zealous and hearty welcome than in the west of England; and that sincere feeling, not less than the stimulus to activity and business which such a visit will occasion, will mark her royal reception in these towns.—Plymouth Journal of Thursday.

Sir Robert Peel left Whitehall-gardens on Monday morning, on a visit to Viscount and Viscountess Villiers, at Osterley Park. It was expected the right hon. bart. would return in a few days.

Sir James Graham has postponed his intended visit to the Isle of Wight for a short time; the business of the Home-office requiring the daily attendance of the right hon. bart.

Lord and Lady Beauvale have arrived at Mivart's Hotel, from Germany. Immediately after the arrival of the noble lord, who was for some years ambassador at the court of Vienna, Viscount Melbourne and Viscountess Palmerston waited upon him and his lady. On Saturday the Dowager Lady Holland entertained his lordship and lady at Holland House, a select circle having been invited to join the dinner party.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF KENT.—Wednesday was the birthday of her Royal Highness, when she completed her 56th year.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the President of the Art-Union of London, attended by Colonel Jones, visited the pictures and other works of art now exhibiting to the subscribers, at the Suffolk-street Gallery, on Saturday last. His Royal Highness was attended through the rooms by the honorary secretary, and expressed great satisfaction. The duke visited the collection again on Tuesday.

KING OF PRUSSIA'S PRESENT TO THE PRINCE OF WALES.—The object of art which excites the greatest interest at Berlin at present is the present which the King of Prussia sends to the Prince of Wales, as a godfather's gift. This gift is a shield, whose material is gold and gems, with every possible resource of ornament which the art of the goldsmith offers. Stieler is the artist, and his graceful inventions for ornaments exceed even those of Schinkel. The gold and gems, however, are secondary to the beautiful designs for the shield, which are by Cornelius, being the first important work he has executed in Berlin. Its form is circular, and the subjects chiefly religious, containing the principal mysteries of the Christian religion.

THE ROYAL STATE LIVERIES. We understand that it is contemplated to have a new set of state liveries early in the ensuing year. The liveries worn on state occasions by the domestics of the Queen's household were made as far back as 1819 and 1825, and it has been remarked that their appearance denotes them to have seen much "service."

Our readers have, doubtless, seen allusions (originating, we believe, in the Times newspaper) to the loss of some jewels by Lady Augusta Gordon, in which the name of Lady Winchilsea was plainly indicated as having—monstrous as the assertion may appear—abstracted the jewels in question. We have now the best authority for stating that a letter has been written to Lord Winchilsea, by Lady Augusta, withdrawing the charge. It appears that Lord Winchilsea, a long time before, had presented to Lady Winchilsea a bracelet, &c., precisely similar to those lost by Lady Augusta Gordon, and on this statement being made by Lord Winchilsea to Lady Augusta, her ladyship wrote the letter in question. The charge was incredible at first sight, and quite unaccountable; and the issue shows how careful persons ought to be of giving currency to hasty charges, the first impression of which it is sometimes difficult to erase.—Brighton Gazette.

The village of Isleworth will be the scene of much festivity on the 25th inst., on the occasion of the marriage of Lord Prudhoe. Dinners will be given to the children of different schools; a rowing-match will take place for a handsome new wherry, presented by his Grace the Duke of Northumberland; other prizes will be given by the inhabitants; and, in the evening, the parishioners will dine together at the Northumberland Arms.

CELEBRATION OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF KENT'S BIRTHDAY AT WINDSOR.—At an early hour yesterday morning the band of the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards proceeded from the barracks at Spital, near Windsor, to Frogmore House, and serenaded her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent from the lawn in front of the mansion, commencing with the "Morning Hymn," and concluding with "God Save the Queen."

The annual Bachelor's Revel, to celebrate the birthday of the royal duchess, and in honour of her Majesty's accession to the throne, took place yesterday, in the Area, at Windsor, and was attended by several thousands of persons, from all parts of the neighbourhood. A grand dinner took place under a spacious marquee on the ground, and the day passed off, as usual, to the entire gratification of the thousands who were present.

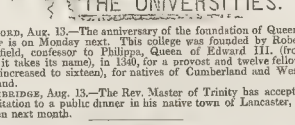
THE UNIVERSITIES.

OXFORD, Aug. 13.—The anniversary of the foundation of Queen's College is on Monday next. This college was founded by Robert Eggleshefd, confessor to Philippa, Queen of Edward III. (from whom it takes its name), in 1340, for a provost and twelve fellows (once increased to sixteen), for natives of Cumberland and Westmoreland.

CAMBRIDGE, Aug. 13.—The Rev. Master of Trinity has accepted an invitation to a public dinner in his native town of Lancaster, to be given next month.



SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

SAILING MATCH.—ARUNDEL YACHT CLUB.

The annual below-bridge-match, for a handsome silver cup and cover, and by the members of this highly-respectable club, took place on Monday. The following had been entered to contend:—

Yachts.	Tons.	Owners.	Colours
Dauntless.....	7	Mr. T. Edwards.....	Blue, with red cross.
Bermudean Maid.	7	Mr. H. Bailes.....	Red over white.
Rocket.....	6	Mr. Stanton.....	Red over white.
Briton	7	Mr. J. Gardiner	Blue.

The Briton and Dauntless from the first moment of entering divided the interest; and, although the other two are very excellent boats, they neither came to the starting-place, leaving the first-mentioned pair to dispute the honour of the day. The wind blew from the east a gentle air, with an occasional calm, deficient in strength to test the power of boats to any great extent. The club officers were accommodated with a view of the match on board the Brilliant, which accompanied the race throughout, and at eleven in the morning the Dauntless and Briton were in readiness, facing the Royal Hospital at Greenwich, to sail thence to Greenhithe and back. The start took place at a quarter past eleven, and both were in trim at the same moment. The Dauntless took the lead, and kept it, arriving at Greenhithe at eight minutes to three, and her opponent at seven minutes after three. In the running up, the Dauntless still held her position, and won the race by nine minutes.

ARCHERY.

The woodmen of the Forest of Arden held their grand annual wardmote during the past week.

On Monday, the 8th inst., the Master Forester's Gold Medal, and the Senior Verderer's Silver Medal, were shot for, at 100 yards, when the former was won by the Rev. Joseph Webster, and the latter by Charles Harding, Esq.; the Rev. T. C. Adams being Lieutenant of the Target.

On Wednesday, the 10th inst, the Silver Arrow was contended for, at nine score yards, and won by the Honourable and Reverend Charles Finch. Miss Wolferstone having drawn the winner's number, received a small ornamental gold arrow.

A sweepstakes between ten of the woodmen, at the same distance, then followed, when Captain Dilke, R.N., and the Rev. C. Coker Beck having gained the same number of ends, the tie was shot off, and won by the latter.

On Friday, the 12th inst., the Silver Bugle Horn of Arden was shot for at eleven score yards. After a keen contest of eleven ends, the prize was won by the Rev. C. Coker Beck. Miss J. J. Beck having drawn the winner's number, received a small gold ornamental bugle horn.

In the evening, the Woodmen resumed target shooting at 100 yards, and the ladies at 50 yards. At the conclusion, the Rev. C. Coker Beck was declared Captain of Numbers, and as such, received the Gold Dighean Medal. "Optime Merendi;" and the Rev. T. C. Adams, as Lieutenant of Numbers, received the Silver Dighean, "Bene Merenti."

The first ladies' prize, a handsome gold collar necklace, with turquoise, for the greatest number of hits, was adjudged to Miss Caroline Beck; and the second, a beautiful engraved gold brooch, to Mrs. H. Biddulph, for the hit nearest the centre.

Many of the neighbouring nobility and gentry, as well as strangers, were present; among whom were—The Warden, the Earl of Aylesford, the Countess of Aylesford, Ladies Augusta and Sarah Finch, Lord Guernsey, the Hon. Charles and Daniel Finch, the Rev. Charles and Lady Charlotte Palmer, Lady Harriet Ferrars, Mr. Joseph and Lady Elizabeth Boultbee, Lady Sykes, Lord Lascelles, the Hon. General Finch and the Hon. Colonel Finch, Viscount and Viscountess Lifford and the Hon. Misses Hewitt, Sir Theophilus Biddulph, Bart., Misses Robert Peel, Ferrars, Newdigate, Dugdale, M.P., &c.

The band of the regiment of Warwickshire Yeomanry was on the ground each day, and Elston's Leamington Quadrille Band attended at the Forest Hall on Wednesday and Friday, when the merry dance was kept up with each evening with much spirit and hilarity.

ANGLING.

THE ROACH.

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Although the roach holds but a humble place amongst fish, yet I do not think him unworthy of notice, as he affords excellent sport to a very numerous class of anglers, and requires considerable care and skill to fish for him with success. He is a handsome-shaped fish, having fins of a beautiful bright red, eyes of a deep gold colour, tinged with red. His size varies from three ounces to a pound and a half, above which weight he is seldom taken. He spawns in May, is in season again in July, and continues so until the end of the year, when he is far from being a bad fish for the table, if cooked within two or three hours after he is taken out of the water. He is found in most rivers in England, although not so much in those in which trout delight, the water generally being too cold for him. In ponds they thrive well; and no fish is so good to stock those in which pike and perch are intended to be kept, as they multiply very rapidly, and afford an excellent supply of food. After the spawning season, you will always find them in the deepest water, both in the pond and river. In the river, I like to fish for him where there is just a perceptible current, plenty of depth of water, say not less than three feet, close to the bank; and if the bank is covered with sedges, so much the better, as they will serve to hide you from his view. I should recommend the roach fisher, if he wishes to take large fish, to seat himself quietly, as much out of sight as the situation he fixes on renders it possible, to avoid walking about near the side, to pursue the following directions, and I have no doubt, if it be possible to take them, he will be able to give a good account of them, both as to the number and size. Let your rod be small and light (the fly-rod, with an extra top, shorter and stiffer will do), fitted with a small reel two or three inches from the bottom; and a line made of very fine silk, the nearer the colour of the water the better; a gut bottom from two to three yards long, tapering down to the hook to the fineness of a single hair (some use hair bottoms, but gut ones may be procured with a little trouble quite as fine, and much stronger); your hook a No. 12, the sneck bend, made of very fine wire; float a common goose-quill, the feather part cut off, and a loop of wire inserted for the line to pass through at the bottom, and fastened in the usual way with a keeper at the top. These floats are much more buoyant than when plugged with wood in the common way, and will carry six No. 5 shot. Let one be fixed about six inches from the hook, and the remainder at least a foot higher up. These will make the float stand on end in the water, and the least "nibble" will be perceptible. Always plumb the depth before you begin to fish, and let your bait swim as near the bottom as possible. With regard to baits, I have always found the two best that can be used are common brown grains, and paste made of white bread. The former is not only good for the hook, but is a most excellent ground-bait. Throw in a handful or two before you begin to fish, and every few minutes keep scattering in a very small quantity, taking care not to throw in any whole grains, as those you must put on the hook to bait. For paste take a piece of bread, and as you want your baits take off a small piece, and work it between your thumb and finger till it is of a proper consistence, then put on a piece about as big as a small pea. Bread makes an excellent ground-bait when you are fishing with paste. Chew a small quantity occasionally, and throw it in when you are fishing; it will sink, and keep washing down the stream, and will not fail to attract the fish. Maggots and small worms are also a good bait for roach. You must use a short line, keeping your float as much under the point of your rod as possible; and be very quick in striking when you perceive you have a bite. A good roach will mostly give you plenty of notice before you should strike, as he generally nibbles once or twice, and then bites fair. Then is your time, and the sooner the better. Roach will also take the artificial fly, but not quite on the surface of the water. The red and black palmer and the common house-fly are the best you can use, and these when there is a little fresh on the water.

THE DACE

Is angled for in a similar manner to the roach. Their habits are very similar, although they do not grow so large, a dace of half-a-pound being a good sized fish. They are not found in such deep water. The edge of a deep hole, where there is a stream, is the best place to fish for a dace; and on the shallows in summer and autumn they will afford capital sport to the fly-fisher, using the same flies as directed for roach. You will often take two at a time when they are in the humour for rising; and if you can get to the right place, may fill your basket in two or three hours. They are reckoned better fish for eating than the roach, but must be cooked as soon after they are caught as possible.

A DISCIPLE OF IZAAK WALTON.

TEMPERANCE IN HANOVER.—We learn from Osnabruck, in the kingdom of Hanover, that temperance societies have increased there to such an extent, that the revenue derived from the duty upon brandy, for the last year, is 36,000 crowns less than in the preceding year.

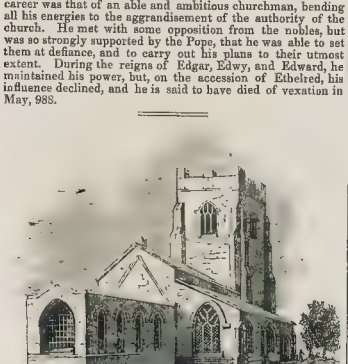
ANOTHER INTRUDER AT THE PALACE.—There has been another intruder in Windsor Castle. About nine o'clock on Monday night, as Mr. Taylor, one of her Majesty's pages, was passing through the grand entrance hall, he discovered on one of the benches near to the fireplace a person dressed in a fustian jacket and trousers, lying apparently at his ease, stretched at full length on one of the benches. He stated that he had walked about 30 miles that day, having come from Woolwich, and all he wanted was his pension and something to drink. He said he walked into the Castle by the tradesmen's entrance, but no questions were asked him, neither did any person attempt to stop him. It appearing to the Lord Steward that the fellow was under the influence of liquor or very stupid, or that he was both drunk and stupid, his lordship ordered the Inspector Sindo to take him to a lock-up house for the night, and on Tuesday morning he was conveyed by the seven o'clock train to town to undergo a further examination. On Tuesday morning he underwent a strict examination at the Home Office, and was remanded until Thursday. It appeared that he came from Maidstone, in Kent, and that his name is Thomas Quested. There is every reason to believe that he is a person of unsound mind. It is supposed at the Castle that he gained admission by clambering over the low wall, into the quadrangle, near King Charles's statue, and not, as he stated, by the tradesmen's entrance

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. VII.

ST. DUNSTAN'S-IN-THE-WEST.

Close to Temple-bar, on the city side of that structure, stands the church of St. Dunstan; not the building on whose well-blackened front the passer-by, especially if from the country, was wont to pause and gaze, attracted by the sight of the two large figures that once stood beside the clock and struck the hours with their clubs. Often have we passed the knot of freshly-imported rusticity, or that still more curious class whose profit was derived from the former, whose fingers were exploring in one direction while the eyes of the unwary stranger were gazing in another. But both cause and consequence have vanished; now the church front presents nothing to arrest the steps of the passer by. The clock in the steeple is a mere every-day dial, and to the unimaginative pedestrian is like the "yellow primrose" of Wordsworth,—it is a clock, "and it is nothing more." The widened pavement and the less obstructed way must, we suppose, be accepted as the compensations for the loss of the "old curiosities," which now adorn, we believe, the gardens of the Marquis of Hertford, by whom they were purchased when dislodged from their ancient position.

St. Dunstan, to whom the church is dedicated, is one of the most celebrated saints of the calendar. He was of noble family, and was born in 925, at Glastonbury, where he received his earliest education. He mixed for some years with the occupations of the court of Athelstan, but being disgusted, for some unknown reason, with secular pursuits, he returned to Glastonbury, and resumed the life of a monk, practising all the austerities of the monastic life with extraordinary rigour. He obtained a widely spread reputation for sanctity; but there seems reason to believe that his mind was somewhat affected. The well-known story of his taking the devil by the nose with a pair of red-hot pincers was, probably, nothing more than a delusion which, believing himself, was received with general belief by others. There is much less doubt on another point, namely, that he was a man of extraordinary talents; and so great was the reputation he acquired that, after having been for some years in retirement, he was called again into the world, and, in 948, Edred, the successor of Edmund, gave over his conscience, his treasures, his authority, to the exclusive and entire control of Dunstan. From this time forth his career was that of an able and ambitious churchman, bending all his energies to the aggrandisement of the authority of the church. He met with some opposition from the nobles, but was so strongly supported by the Pope, that he was able to set them at defiance, and to carry out his plans to their utmost extent. During the reigns of Edgar, Edwy, and Edward, he maintained his power, but, on the accession of Ethelred, his influence declined, and he is said to have died of vexation in May, 988.



SHELFORD CHURCH.

In this quiet "corner" of our fair isle lies buried one of those men whose names have become universal, as the equivalents of certain qualities which those who bore them possessed, or were supposed to possess. In English "Chesterfield" and "politeness" are synonymous; perhaps we should rather say were so, for, since his once celebrated letters to his son were published, the ideas of the world on this subject have undergone considerable change. But, whatever their value may have been, we fancy they are now rather talked of than read; and their courtly author here rests, free from the anxiety of being a model of good breeding. Death was a guest that even he could not bow to the door, and dismiss with the cool politesse of the ancien regime. The fabric is larger than most village churches, and contains nearly equal portions of the three styles of English architecture. The tower is of a late style, and has a heavy solemnity in its appearance, it being wider than the nave. The aisles, which form the decorated part of this church, are of the best possible date, although by no means an expensive example. Only four windows out of eight contain their tracery; and each of these is of a different design to the other, causing a pleasing effect, and adding testimony to this prolific style of architecture, which is now being revived, and which we hope will have the strongest support. The early English and chancel part projects easterly from the nave four windows, but has lost much of its effect from having had its former roof taken off, and a low-pitched one placed on instead of it. The large unsightly east window contrasts but badly with the slender lights of the side walls. The tower is made useful by being the receptacle for the clock and five well-toned bells. Altogether there are many tablets to different branches of the Stanhope family, but none of any great merit. There is one though to Lady Georgiana West, by the late Sir Francis Chantrey, in 1825; the principal figure is a female weeping, which fully shows the grief at death, and must draw forth the praise of the great sculptor by whose hand it was executed. There is no monument at all to the polite Chesterfield, before mentioned, in this church. In the chancel is a monument to Sir Michael Stanhope, who was a great character in the reigns of Henry the Eighth and Queen Elizabeth. Shelford is about five miles from Nottingham. The probability is that the tower lost its pinnacles and the windows their tracery during the civil wars, for we find Col. P. Stanhope was slain and many of his men killed at Shelford.

THE FASHION.

Paris, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, August 16, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—In preference to mourning suits, which are but little suited to the taste of your fair readers, I send you this week what cannot fail to be interesting to all—a vivid portraiture of the young and beautiful Fanny Beaulieu, in her wedding dress, as she stood by my side on Tuesday last. The whole costume you will perceive is characterised by that graceful simplicity which is becoming every day more and more prevalent in the taste of French fashionables. The dress is of mousseline d'Inde, of the lightest fabric, adorned—the French call it "furnished" (garnie)—with small plaits or tucks, and entredeux of lace let in between. The body is trimmed also with plaits and is fitted on like a corset; the sleeve fits close to the arm and comes about three parts down to the elbow; the dress it will be noticed is rather higher on the shoulders; but whether this style was considered more suitable to the modest blushes of a bride than the costume of our more dashing elégante is a question I shall not venture to decide, though I may be pardoned a little badinage in making the observation, that our rulers of fashion seem to consider it indispensable that a certain portion in length of the female form should always be visible; thus when the skirts are worn long the bust is more fully shown, and vice versâ. But to return to the wedding dress. The hair is put up in Grecian braids, disposed so as to form a coronet; and these braids terminate in ringlets slightly frizzed out, which fall down and stand out from the cheek, thus giving an expression of fulness and an oval appearance to the face, which the past fashion tended to destroy. A wreath of blush roses supersedes the usual orange flowers, and a veil passing through the hair and descending from the back of the head completes the wedding dress. The gloves are the usual gauntlets, so much the mode for the last three months; Fanny wore them plain, but it is not unusual to go to great expense in these as well as in velvet mittens; on which embroidery, bands of silver cord, and bouquets, not of flowers only but pearls and even diamonds, are not unfrequently seen. We have nothing new at present, but I expect the autumn fashions will be out shortly, and our most distinguished milliners have already set their invention on the rack to discover a new article, something between a cloak, a tippet, and a spencer, with which they intend to supersede the cardinals and camails which have had such a run during the summer season.

JULIE.

THE PACHA OF EGYPT.—We read in a letter from Alexandria, July 22nd, published by the Augsburg Gazette—"The Pacha has just authorised Captain Engledrie, not only to repair the road between this place and Suez, but also to realise the project of a Steam Navigation Company for the transit trade. He is to build at Suez, at the cost of the Pacha, a large hotel for the accommodation of travellers, and warehouses for the reception of goods. The Pacha proposes also to establish a steam-boat communication between Alexandria and Constantinople." The same letter states that since the arrival of the English bishop at Jerusalem several Jews have embraced the Protestant religion.

The town of Knittelfel, in Styria, was on the 26th ult., so dreadfully ravaged by a fire, that 56 houses and 60 farm buildings were entirely consumed, and six persons lost their lives.

A fire broke out at Lugos, in Hungary, on the 21st ult., which destroyed the town-hall, the church, and more than 300 houses.

LITERATURE.

ENVIRONS OF LONDON. By JOHN FISHER MURRAY. Parts I. to IV. 8vo. With Illustrations. London and Edinburgh, 1842. Blackwood and Sons.

This is a publication of remarkable interest and beauty, which we have only yet had the opportunity hastily to scan, but which we have found abounding in such attraction, literary and pictorial, as ought to induce its popularity. The theme treated is on all accounts a most fertile one. The suburbs of London—the places of holiday resort of our dense throngs of citizens—the pleasure-haunts of our aristocracy, and "spots of green" beyond the noise and bustle of metropolitan existence—have grown into an interest which surpasses that which we attach even to the churches, monuments, and palaces of lordly London itself. It is to the places that skirt the town—either in "lap of green" or upon the banks of the silver river—that we rush for natural recreation, and seek for poetry and peace, or, if these be too romantic and ideal for the ordinary reader, then we may plunge into the actual, and remind him that it is in the suburbs that men dine and drink with gusto and enjoyment, and that white-bait and cold punch are bootless upon the appetite unless the scenery of some beautiful environ is glowing in its sunny freshness in the vicinity of the goblet and the dish. It has been well said by Mr. Murray, the accomplished author of the work before us, that the environs of London, from whatever quarter you approach them, abound in loveliness.

The breezy downs and heaths of Surrey—the forest glades and far-spreading meads of Essex—the blossom-bearing hills and richly-cultivated vales of Kent—the fair seats and noble demesnes of the metropolitan county—Thames and his tributary streams—afford an inexhaustible store of pleasure to the explorer; disclosing, from a thousand points of view, beauties, varied, contrasted, and pleasing, in every variety.

Nor has the hand of man been wanting here, to educate, accomplish, and adorn, what nature so liberally bestows. Art and taste have been busy in every quarter of our environs: boundless wealth has been lavished, from age to age, in seconding the efforts of nature, or in compensating for the partial distribution of her favours.

But still higher attractions may our environs justly claim. We find in them the favourite retreats of poets, statesmen, warriors, heroes, kings. They possess attractions with which mind is associated—attractions of classic ground: rambling along the pleasant shores of the river Lea, in the footsteps of Izaak Walton; hunting the shades of Twickenham, made classic by the muse of Pope; in the towers of Hampton, contemplating the rise and fall of Wolsey; pursuing, from the venerable halls of Eton, through future life, the career of men illustrious in our annals; musing among the royal retreats of Windsor; everywhere we find, not merely enjoyment in contemplating the present, but matter of instruction in the historical personages and events associated with the past. While exploring palaces, cathedrals, monuments, halls, we study, in a recreative way, the history of our country.

To the attractions which thus seem to present themselves in every quarter of the circle which confines the metropolis, it is the design of the work before us to give vivid and palpable illustration, and for this purpose the best artists and wood-engravers have been employed upon a series of embellishments to which we can afford almost unqualified praise. The writing which accompanies this is written in a poetical spirit, with a flowing and familiar style, and the ensemble of the production thus affords the reader an unquestioned gratification. The work, too, assumes all the usefulness of a guide-book, and thus blends the utile with the dulce in no ordinary degree. The parts, as far as they have gone, take in a large range of subjects, comprising all the objects of interest which present themselves in the excursion to Richmond by the Thames; the land outlet through Kensington to Twickenham; then Strawberry Hill, Teddington, and Hampton Court, with Wimbledon, Thames Ditton, Sunbury, Walton, Chertsey, Staines, and, in fact, all the loveliest spots that gem the landscapes round the metropolis. It is our purpose, in a future number, more minutely to examine the work; but, for the present, we must be content to avail ourselves of a few extracts. Let us open with a notice of the picturesque village of Putney.

PUTNEY.

"This pleasant village, from its situation a place of considerable intercourse, and, from its agreeable air and proximity to the river, a favourite place of resort for the citizens, has had the honour of producing two eminent statesmen. West, Bishop of Ely, a favourite ambassador of Henry VIII., an eminent scholar, and magnificent in his way of living, keeping in his house a hundred servants; to fifty of whom he gave four marks wages, to the other fifty forty shillings, allowing every one four yards of cloth for his winter livery, and three yards and a half for his summer livery. Bishop West was buried in Ely Cathedral.

"Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, was the son of a blacksmith of Putney. The place of his birth is yet pointed out by a tradition, which is in some measure confirmed by a survey of Wimbledon manor taken in 1617, describing the spot as 'an ancient cottage, called the smith's shop, lying west of the highway leading from Putney to the Upper Gate, and on the south side of the way from Richmond to Wandesworth, being the sign of the Anchor.' It is remarkable, that among the numerous possessions which this eminent statesman acquired during his prosperity may be reckoned the manor of the place where he was born. The striking features of his history, his introduction at court by Wolsey, his sudden rise, the active part he took in the Reformation, and his subsequent disgrace and fall, are well known. His master Wolsey, to whose power he succeeded, was going up Putney Hill, on his road to Esher, when he was overtaken by Norris, who there presented him with a ring, as a token of the continuance of his Majesty's favour. Stowe declares that, 'when the cardinal had heard Master Norris report these good and comfortable words of the King, he quickly lighted from his mule all alone, as though he had been the youngest of his men, and incontinently kneeled down in the dirt upon both his knees, holding up his hands for joy of the King's most comfortable message. Master Norris lighted also, capying him so soon upon his knees, and kneeled by him, and took him up in his arms, and asked him how he did, calling upon him to credit his message. "Master Norris," quoth the cardinal, "when I consider the joyful news that you have brought to me, I could do no less than greatly rejoice. Every word pierces so my heart, that the sudden joy surmounted my memory, having no regard or respect to the place; but I thought it my duty, that in the same place where I received this comfort, to laud and praise God upon my knees, and most humbly to render unto my sovereign lord my most hearty thanks for the same."

"Queen Elizabeth frequently visited the house of a Mr. Lacey, citizen and clothworker, at Putney, staying sometimes two or three nights. The courtesy shown by this great Queen to eminent citizens of London appears to have been very great, and was equally wise and politic.

"During the civil war in 1647, Cromwell established his headquarters here, for the double purpose of overawing the king, then at Hampton, and the Parliament. Fairfax, Ireton, Fleetwood, and Colonel Rich, had quarters in the town. These worthies held their councils in the church, sitting with their hats on round the communion table, here entertaining fanatic preachers, native and foreign, and dividing their time between plotting treason and singing psalms. The church is a handsome structure, with a stone tower; to the east of the south aisle is a little chapel built by Bishop West, the roof adorned with rich Gothic tracery, interspersed with the bishop's arms, and the initials of his name."

GATE TO PRIVATE GARDEN, HAMPTON COURT.

"A little beyond the south-eastern angle of the garden front, a gate, generally closed, but which will be speedily opened upon the summons of the bell, leads into the private garden, without seeing which none can say they have explored all the beauties of Hampton Court. Evelyn alludes to these gardens 'In the garden is a rich and noble fountain, with syrens' statues, cast in copper by Fanelli, but no plenty of water. The cradle-work of horn-beam in the garden is very remarkble for the perplexed twining of the trees. There is a parterre which they call Paradise, in which is a pretty banqueting-house set over a cave or cellar All these gardens might be exceedingly improved, as being too narrow for such a place.'

"There are some very fine holly trees in these gardens, with a number of pleasant walks, shelving banks of velvet turf, arbours, pleached alleys, one in particular distinguished as Queen Mary's Bower, and the like. If the weather be sultry, the orange trees will be ranged in order outside their winter-house; among the plants preserved here is the orange myrtle, said to have been brought to this country by King William III.

"The vine, the largest in Europe, if not in the world, in fruitful seasons encumbered with between two and three thousand bunches of grapes, weighing on an average a pound each, is worthy observation. The stem of this giant vine, in itself a vineyard, is thirty inches in circumference at the greatest girth, is one hundred and ten feet long, and encloses a space of two thousand two hundred feet square. The fruit of the black Hamburgh sort, and said to be of exquisite flavour. It is exclusively preserved for her Majesty's dessert. When the grapes are ripe, a visit to this vine will be amply repaid, even by a journey express from London."

We shall conclude our notice with a description of Claremont.

CLAREMONT.

"Claremont owed its origin to the witty and eccentric Sir John Vanbrugh, who bought some land here, and built a low brick house for his own accommodation. Thomas Holles Pelham, Esq., Earl of Clare, afterwards Duke of Newcastle, bought the estate of Sir John, much improved the grounds, and added a splendid banqueting-room, for the entertainment of his colleagues in office and parliamentary supporters.

"Kent, the gardener, had the laying of the grounds at Claremont, of whom Horace Walpole, in his tract on gardening, says, 'that if his ideas were rarely great, it was owing to the novelty of his art. The features in his landscapes were seldom majestic; he aimed at immediate effect. His clumps were puny. A small lake, edged by a winding bank, with scattered trees that led to a seat at the end of the pond, was common at Claremont, and others of his designs.' The seat derives its name from a building erected on a mount in the park, by Lord Clare, and called after his own name. Of the gardens at Claremont another writer says, rather pompously, 'There you may wander with secure delight, and saunter with perpetual amusement.' Dr. Garth, in the preface to his poem of Claremont, remarks that the situation is so agreeable and pleasing, that it inclines one to think some places of this nature put Ovid at first upon the story of Narcissus and Echo.

"The grounds being thus improved, the original house was found no longer worthy so magnificent a demesne; the great Lord Clive, who purchased the estate from the Duke of Newcastle, gave Browne orders to erect a mansion, regardless of expense.

"He is said to have performed the task very much to the satisfaction of his employer, although the expense was above one hundred thousand pounds.

"This is the only mansion Browne completely finished from his own designs, although he altered many. It is a noble mansion, forming an oblong square of forty-four yards by thirty-four. On the ground floor are eight spacious rooms, besides the hall of entrance and the grand staircase. In the principal front a flight of fifteen steps leads to the great entrance, under a pediment supported by columns of the Corinthian order. The general effect is grand without heaviness, and chastely elegant.

"On the death of Lord Clive, this estate was sold for little more than one-third of what the mansion and improvements had cost; it was purchased by Lord Galway, by whom it was sold to the Earl of Tyrconnel, who disposed of it to Charles Rose Ellis, Esq.; this gentleman resided at Claremont until 1816, when it was purchased by Government for £69,000 for the country residence of the Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold."

We have said and shown enough to prove the attraction of this publication, to which, for the benefit of our readers, we shall most pleasurably recur.

THE CALOTYPE FAMILIARLY EXPLAINED. By W. RALEIGH BAXTER, M.R.C.S., &c. &c. Renshaw, Strand.

The art of Photography, which has of late attracted so much of public attention, has undergone a new modification, by the invention of the Calotype, a result of certain discoveries made by Mr. Fox Talbot. By this ingenious process common writing paper is rendered sensitive to the influence of light, and capable of receiving the most delicate and beautiful impressions from copies taken by the camera from nature, or from prints and other objects placed in proximity with it, and without the intervention of the camera. Mr. Baxter's monograph contains a full explanation of the calotype process, and furnishes a complete hand-book to all who desire either to know it theoretically or pursue it practically. The admirable lecture now being daily delivered by Dr. Ryan, at the Royal Polytechnic Institution, forms the basis of Mr. Baxter's treatise, which, in a highly commendable spirit, he has dedicated to the Polytechnic directors, by whose zeal and efficiency this exceedingly interesting subject has been effectually brought under public notice, through their able and eloquent lecturer, Dr. Ryan.

THE BOTANICAL LOOKER-OUT. By EDWIN LEES, F.L.S. Tilt and Bogue.

If a contemplation of nature, in its most inviting and beautiful form, can warm the greatest dullard that ever lived, what must be its inspiring influence on a mind highly cultivated and well informed like that of Mr. Lees? This work is compiled from a number of sketches previously published by the author, in a detached form, in a respectable provincial journal, and is as pleasant a handbook during a summer ramble as one can carry withal. It is an agreeable book for the general reader, and to the young botanist a very valuable one. We subjoin a short extract, as a specimen of the attractive style in which our author treats his subject:—

"The Lotus, or Water Lily of Egypt (Nymphæa lotus), was ancicently much celebrated in the East, and was consecrated as the peculiar flower of the sun, who was styled 'Lord of the Lotus.' The blue Lotus (Nymphæa cærulea), with 'azure skirts and vest of gold,' a native of Cashmir and Persia, has also been often sung in Eastern hyperbole, as a fit couch for the repose of the gods; and in China and Japan various beautiful species of this favourite genus are cultivated in the tanks and ponds, for their beauty and delightful fragrance. In the present day a new and interesting member of the tribe of Water Lilies has been discovered in the river Berbice, in a part of British Guiana, South America, which the discoverer, Mr. R. Schomburgk, has named Victoria Regina, after our beloved Queen, and which the Botanical Society of London have adopted as their emblem. Mr. Schomburgk describes this plant as a 'vegetable wonder,' and says that, when it first met his view, all his toils and calamities were forgotten. The flower is fragrant, consisting of many hundred petals, passing in alternate tints from pure white to rose and pink: some of them were found to be fifteen inches across. The leaves are still more gigantic, salver shaped, almost orbiculate, with a rim from three to five inches high on their margin, green within, crimson without, and resting, in their extension of six feet, on the surface of the water. The smooth water of one of the expansions of the Berbice river was covered with those beautiful lilies, and Mr. Schomburgk remarks that he rowed from one to the other, and observed always something to admire. Exciting as this narrative is, tempting one to throw down pen, ink, and paper, and everything else, dashing off on the instant for Guiana, in accordance with the phrenological development hinted at in the commencement of this chapter, I would, nevertheless, recommend those who have not yet seen our beautiful British Water Lily, bathing her silver chalice in our alpine lakes and solitudes, to do so first; and then, if they please, ransack the waters of Guiana for the imperial Victoria Regina."

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

RUBINI.

To-night closes the career in England of this distinguished artist—the most accomplished singer of his age—the vocal wonder of every land in which he has poured forth his endless stores of rich and various melody. Now that he is quitting us, we shall take occasion to make public a few facts connected with his engagement at her Majesty's Theatre, the inducements which prevailed upon him to come amongst us, and the sneers, half begot of jealousy, which have run the round of the sarcastic journals of France upon this subject of the Legion of Honour, which they would fain make it appear has been the furor of Rubini's ambition. The public will at this moment take a fresh interest in our little narrative, more particularly as all the facts redound to the credit of the eminent favourite who is about bidding them farewell.

At the time that M. Viardot took upon himself the entreprise of the Italian Theatre at Paris, he did so solely with the hope that he would be able to retain Rubini, who, on the other hand, was anxious to withdraw from public life to the magnificent chateau which he has built for his retirement, and to devote himself to soothing the declining years of his aged father, to whom he was attached with a filial reverence and affection that reflect honour upon the generous qualities of his heart. It was now that M. Viardot strove in vain to overcome this feeling, and with pressing urgency endeavoured to woo the great artist from his purpose.

At last, when all hope failed him of procuring Rubini, the hope of the entreprise failed him also, and he threw it up in despair. Subsequently, the importunities of another Parisian management induced Rubini to sing two more seasons in Paris; but this was under the exercise of an almost official influence, the entrepreneur declaring that it was the express wish of the Minister, and that Rubini's compliance with the general will would be deservedly rewarded with the order of the Legion of Honour. At the end of that season, however, instead of the promised honour, the great master received at the hands of Government the appointment of inspector-general of the music of the kingdom; a distinction conferred rather as a lure to induce him to remain one more season, when the first-promised high mark of public honour was to crown his career. Rubini did, and, as we think, with no small generosity, continue his valuable talent in the service of the French public, and during all the time of his residence in Paris was the idol of the aristocracy of the land. No one was ever more courted, fêted, worshipped. At last the season terminated, and the Legion of Honour did not come; but this was not the cause of Rubini's rejecting the renewed importunities of the French entrepreneur for a new engagement, and accepting those of our English manager instead. Rubini could well afford to smile at the neglect of a Court promise, and could hardly seek in an honour, which would be reflected upon those who conferred it quite as much as upon himself, fresh food for a vanity that might well have been surfeited by the flatterings and attentions and caresses of all the high and noble and intelligent among the intellect and the aristocracy of France.

But, though Rubini had now lost his parent, and had thus the barrier of the claims of filial piety removed from any renewal of his engagement, he refused to sing for the French entreprise, on the score of the almost insulting terms upon which he was pressed to continue his stay.

On the other hand, the more spirited and becoming tone of the English director was such as to inspire a great artist like Rubini with a generous acquiescence in his wishes equal to the confidence which he found reposed in his genius and honour. Mr. Lumley, who seemed to think that as the one was worth any price, so the other was likely to be commensurate with it, sent to Rubini an engagement with the terms left blank, and a desire that he should fill them up himself; which he did, of course, on a scale equal to his reputation, but still modestly, and so as to leave the English entrepreneur, now that his season is terminated, more than satisfied with the result. This we rejoice to know; and the fact is honourable to all parties—to the enterprise of Mr. Lumley, the attractions of Rubini's genius, and the taste, judgment, and patronage of the English public.

We cannot conclude this notice without an expression of earnest regret that Rubini is leaving us, without also a clinging and lingering hope that he will return. But, should he not, we feel that he has earned and deserved his retirement; and, although but too regretfully spared, we must still wish him a life of quiet ease and happiness, and years of those mild and bright enjoyments, some of the most exquisite pleasures of which he has himself so liberally dispensed unto the world.

LABLACHE, AS HARRY THE EIGHTH.

"Small by degrees and beautifully less,"
Is now a motto that has run to waste.
"Great by degrees," O Father of Queen Bess!
The bluff King Harry of the World of Taste!

Who'd ever stuff you? stuff you? stuff you?—stuff!
Lablache is not a hare, or duck, or goose.
He always looks as if he'd had enough,
And without stuffing is both tight and loose.

Falstaff or Harry—it is what we call,
In most emphatic English, "the same thing;"
Only, that big Lablache, to great and small,
Still looms, and looks, and acts, and is a King!

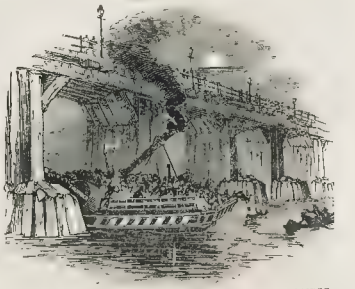
A very fine marble bust of Mozart, said to be exquisitely executed, is now on its way from Munich to Saltzburg, where it is to be put up in honour of the great musician—an honour deferred until half a century after his death.

THE HOSPITAL OF ST. CROSS, NEAR WINCHESTER.—Among the few vestiges of ancient hospitals, or almonries, now existing throughout the kingdom, may be enumerated that of St. Croix, or St. Cross, which is situated about a mile from Winchester, on the road to Southampton. By the will of the donor, every traveller who knocks at the door of this hostel, on his way to or from Winchester, is entitled to receive from the porter a pound of wheaten bread and a cup of strong beer, of which many highly respectable persons have, out of curiosity and the novelty of the thing, partaken. This hospital is some little way off the high road, and is furnished with a good garden, which is kept in very neat order. Not one person in ten thousand who have travelled on the above road was aware that such an eleemosynary institution was yet in existence, and, now that the Southampton railway has thrown the line of traffic into a different channel, it is very probable the above pilgrims' hospital will, in the course of a few years, become little, if at all, resorted to.



ACCIDENT TO THE THUNDER STEAMER AT BATTERSEA-BRIDGE.

On Monday morning, between nine and ten, as the Thunder steamer was returning from Putney, heavily laden with passengers, she struck her larboard side against the pier of Battersea bridge; the concussion was so violent that both paddle boxes were shattered to atoms. The immense crash occasioned by the concussion created the greatest alarm on board, the screams of the females being terrific. Two passengers on deck, one a gentleman and the other a lad, were, by the violence of the concussion, forced overboard. A waterman, named George Elliot, a coxswain at Searle's boat-house, who was boating two gentlemen, picked up the lad, and the gentleman was picked up by a lug-boat, both in a very exhausted state. Several boats put off to the assistance of the steamer, and she was towed ashore to the White Swan Stairs, where her passengers were safely landed.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 20, 1842

The riots are everywhere the absorbing topic of public talk. The world looks with anxiety for every item of fresh intelligence that can reach the metropolis from the disturbed districts; the voices of the tradesmen and the loiterer are alike loud with inquiry and discussion; the leading articles of the journals are rife with comment and speculation; in a word, the riots absorb the minds of the metropolitan community, and, doubtless, spread their interest wherever news can reach. It is for this reason we have devoted so much of the space of this journal to a record and illustrations of the unhappy and hopeless sedition that has ensued, to the exclusion of many other topics that we could have wished to treat, and to the curtailment of our ordinary remarks upon the political occurrences of the period. But it would seem that there really is no other political occurrence. Parliament "hath shut its doors"—the six hundred and fifty-eight legislators are become distributed like the waste type in a printer's office. The game is getting ready for the gun—and, although the corn has ripened bountifully, the manufacturing places have ripened also—only that the agricultural districts have ripened into food, and the manufacturing into revolt. Common sense will suggest which must produce the best harvest. In the meanwhile, however, there is abroad a most distressing state of public alarm—a sort of dread of revolutionary violence, which we shall rejoice to find quelled by a re-approach, on the part of the deluded labourers, to peace and order. They are only spreading their terrors—they are making no head—like the "will o' the wisp" on the common, their light only dodges from point to point, and is now in a thicket and now in a bog. Their movement has neither the power, nor the discipline, nor the courage, which make duration sure. They have no moral strength, and their physical strength would fail them at a blow. For the sake of humanity they should be undeceived; and we must repeat, that those who would spur them on in their career of miserable sedition are indeed the wretches of the land. We need only direct the reason of our readers to a careful perusal of the reports, to ensure from them a conviction of the hopelessness of the demagogue cause, and of the truth and justice of the doctrine which proclaims, in all crises of public disturbance, love and loyalty and order to be the banners of the constitution.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ART-UNION PRIZES.—Saturday there was a private view of the pictures selected by the prize-holders of the London Art-Union. Selected from the various exhibitions of the past season, these pictures are in some degree familiar to the public; newly arranged, however, in the British Artists' Gallery, Suffolk-street, Pall-mall East, they appear to much greater advantage than they did on the comparatively crowded walls of the Royal Academy and other institutions where they first courted public criticism. Hence the exhibition is peculiarly interesting.

THE CONSECRATION OF THE FOREIGN BISHOPS IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.—The ceremony of the consecration of the bishops, who have been appointed to the colonies under the new act of parliament, is to be celebrated on Wednesday, the 24th instant, in the choir of Westminster Abbey. The ceremony will be a very imposing one, over which the Archbishop of Canterbury will preside. The sermon will be preached by the Dean of Ripon. The precincts of the Abbey will have the issuing of the tickets, which will be chiefly confined to the clergy of the metropolis, the choir being a very limited place. As these ceremonies are of rare occurrence, the place is expected to be crowded, as the application for tickets has been very numerous. [In our next number we shall present our readers with a magnificent engraving of this interesting and imposing ceremony.]

INTERESTING EVENT AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—On Tuesday the boys of the Royal Military College paid their annual visit to this favourite place of amusement. Their appearance, as they marched from Chelsea to Kennington, attended by their militia-tune band, was highly interesting. Colonel Williamson, the governor of the asylum, together with the quarter and sergeant masters, accompanied the school; and in the evening the illumination of St. Peter's was honoured by the presence of their Royal Highness the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, with the Princesses Augusta and Mary, Baron Knesebeck, and a numerous suite, who occupied the "private box on the banks of the mimic Tiber." The gardens were very well attended during the whole afternoon, and the performance of the juvenile musicians, under the direction of Sergeant Blizard, a Waterloo veteran, were much applauded. The number of children at present in the school is 350 boys and 30 girls. Twenty years since the average was 500 boys and 500 girls, but on the cessation of war fewer applications for admission were made, and the number has gradually decreased. The children are eligible only by the loss of one or both parents, and at fourteen years of age have the option of entering the army, or following any trade they may prefer. During the afternoon they were regaled with buns and ale, and the day appeared to be one of perfect enjoyment to them. On Thursday they visited their companions in the Royal College, at Greenwich, when the two schools spent the afternoon together in the park. It is an interesting fact that many members of the band, under the able direction of Mr. Godfrey, at the Gardens, were educated in the Royal Military College.

CHARTIST MEETING ON CLERKENWELL-GREEN. On Wednesday evening a numerous meeting of the Chartists took place in the open space fronting the Session-house, Clerkenwell-green, to discuss matters connected with the present disturbed state of the country. The meeting, which is the second that has been held on the same spot this week, was convened to take place at seven o'clock, but the chair was not taken until twenty minutes to eight. At the latter hour there could not have been fewer than 2000 persons present, and, among the crowd, there were several women and children. Several policemen were about the green, but there was no interference on their part, and the mob did not attempt the slightest riot. Pollard, the Chartist, was in the chair, and the various speeches that were delivered by Savage, Cameron, Frost, and other Chartists, embraced the usual topics. It was extremely difficult to hear the whole of the sentences in consequence of the noise of the crowd; but the chairman, or speaker was understood to "inform" the meeting that fifty soldiers had been brought up in a waggon from the north, and had been confined in the House of Correction for laying down their arms, and refusing to fire upon the "people." The resolutions were of the usual character.

CHARTIST MEETING AT STEPNEY.—On Tuesday morning a van was drawn up on the green, in which were fixed the union-jack and a flag, and about 200 persons had collected. A little before 6 o'clock a Chartist came from the committee, which was sitting at a room of the public-house adjacent, and took the flags from the van. Shortly after the committee arrived and took their stations in the van, by which time between 3000 and 4000 persons had assembled. There were also many females present. A Mr. Blackmore moved, and Mr. Mantz seconded, a resolution to the effect that a memorial be presented to the Queen, praying that she would order the troops to be withdrawn from the disturbed districts, and that the charter might be adopted as the law of the land. The proceedings concluded a little before nine o'clock, at which time there were between 8000 and 10,000 persons present. At the conclusion of the proceedings three cheers were given for the charter, and three groans for the Government.

CHARTIST CAMP MEETING AT WATFORD.—On Monday morning last the inhabitants of the quiet and retired town of Watford were thrown into considerable alarm by the appearance of a large body, about 2000 in number, composed of both male and female Chartists, who entered the town through the railway arch, walking in procession, carrying flags and banners, and preceded by a band of music. They had arrived from London, whence they had been conveyed in about 30 vans, some drawn by two and others by four horses, in which they would have entered the town, had they not been stopped, about a mile off, by order of the magistrates, and told that the vans would not be allowed to go into Watford unless the banners were taken off. The whole in consequence descended, and determined to walk and carry the banners, &c., leaving the vans behind. The procession repaired to the Wheatsheaf, where they partook of some refreshment, and then dispersed in various groups to enjoy the neighbouring scenery; they afterwards returned to dinner, which was laid out on the spacious bowling-green. At the conclusion of this repast, the whole body marched off to a field at the back of the town, whither they were followed by several agricultural and other labourers of the neighbourhood, and also by several farmers and others in gigs and on horseback. A hustings having been erected, Mr. Savage and several others addressed the meeting, urging the working men to join the association in order to obtain the People's Charter, as the only means by which they might expect to get a fair day's pay for a day's work. Three cheers were given for Feargus O'Connor and Mr. T. Duncombe, whose colours were carried at the head of the procession, and at the conclusion three cheers for the charter. The present awfully distressed state of the country was much commented on, but scarcely any allusion made to the present disturbances. The party after wards returned to the Wheatsheaf, where they were joined by several of the townspeople, and dancing commenced, which was kept up till long after the Chartists left to return to London, where they did not arrive till near midnight. Not the slightest disorder occurred There were, however, 200 of the Hertford police stationed in the town in case of emergency, as the meeting was not wholly unlooked for, from the circumstance of the Chartists having caused handbills to be posted and distributed through the town, announcing their intention to make this rural excursion. The police, however, did not exhibit themselves. The procession was formed in Cross-street, New-road, London, and thence proceeded to their destination; and to this circumstance may be attributed the absurd rumour which prevailed throughout the metropolis on Monday, that 2000 Chartists had marched from London to Manchester and the disturbed districts.

REPAVING OF LONDON-BRIDGE.—According to the notice issued by the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, upwards of 200 men commenced on Monday morning taking up the right-hand side of the carriage-way previous to its being newly paved. To prevent confusion, the omnibuses, carriages, waggons, carts, and other vehicles, were only allowed to pass over the bridge from the city side; those coming from the Borough, Elephant and Castle, Brighton, Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, were obliged to go over Southwark-bridge. Only one side of the carriage-way will be done at a time, so that the other may be open to the public vehicles crossing from the city to Southwark. That as little inconvenience as possible shall be caused to the public, a great number of labourers were engaged to expedite the necessary repairs. It is expected that the bridge will be re-opened, newly paved, in less than a fortnight.

MADNESS MISTAKEN FOR INTOXICATION.—On Tuesday a long inquiry took place before Mr. Wakley, M.P., at the Elephant and Castle, King's-road, Camden-town, on the body of William Hales, aged 58, an insane pauper belonging to the parish of St Pancras. The unfortunate object of the inquiry has recently, by the decision of a suit in Chancery, been declared the rightful heir to a very large property, and £14,000 in cash, and which it was expected, had he lived, would, in a very short period, have been in his possession. Thomas Harris said he was an inmate of St. Pancras workhouse, and acted as an assistant nurse in the infirmary, in which the deceased was an insane patient occasionally, and had been so for several years. During the past week he had been placed in a strait-waistcoat, but on Thursday morning, becoming more violent in his cries for water, and an idiot in the ward got up to give him some, but witness prevented him, and, on witness going to his bed shortly after, found him dead.—James Hales, the son of the deceased, said he was desirous of being examined, as he thought his father's death was caused by his fall on the pavement, and at times would let his head bump against the stones. Witness remonstrated with the police for their inhuman conduct towards his father, but they told him that if he interfered they would lock him up.—The jury ultimately returned a verdict of "Natural death," and the coroner said the son was bound to make the same statement before the magistrate of the district, or the police commissioners, who would have the parties, if they were removed to have been guilty of improper conduct, brought to punishment.

EFFECTS OF THE WEATHER.—DEATH OF A VALUABLE HORSE OF MESSRS. BARCLAY AND PERKINS.—On Tuesday afternoon, as several drays belonging to Messrs. Barclay and Perkins's, in passing along Charlton one of their most valuable horses, considered to be worth nearly £100, dropped dead on the road. The death of the animal is attributed to the extreme heat of the weather.

EXTENSIVE SEIZURE OF SPURIOUS TOBACCO AND SNUFF.—On Saturday a most extensive seizure of adulterated tobacco and snuff was made by the EXCISE, on the premises of Mr. Lott, in Peckham. It consisted of rhubarb, sprut sops, green moss, rose leaves, wild dock leaves, &c., and weighed 12 cwt The whole of the rubbish was in a prepared state, and was about to be removed by railway to Beverley, in Yorkshire, when the EXCISE had, on the previous day, taken possession of two tobacco manufactories, in which an immense quantity of spurious snuff was also found.

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN CATTLE UNDER THE NEW TARIFF.—On Monday the supply of cattle at Smithfield market was much greater than for several weeks past. There were sixty head of cattle imported under the new tariff from Rotterdam and Hamburgh. They resemble very much the Lincolnshire breed, but are far inferior to our own as regards fatness, and met with a very dull sale. The importation of foreign cattle offers but a poor profit, as our markets are so plentifully supported from Scotland and Ireland with a much superior quality.

From an early hour on Monday several men bearing placards suspended from their necks, announcing that a public meeting would be held at six o'clock in the evening on Clerkenwell-green, to consider the condition of the country, paraded the streets. At the appointed hour about 200 persons assembled, but none of the Chartist leaders made their appearance. A person named Cowan ascended a temporary platform, and announced that the meeting was adjourned to another evening. The police were in attendance, and every precaution was adopted to preserve the public peace. After Mr. Cowan descended several others spoke at great length.

SWINDLING.—LOCK SHARP.—A female about twenty-eight years of age, who is supposed to be dressed in a black silk dress with stripes, green crape bonnet, with gold neck-chain and ear-rings, and who passes by the name of Frenchy, has contrived to obtain goods fraudulently from Messrs. Swan and Edgar, Regent-street, by sending letters signed "Baron de Browe," ordering goods to her house.

On Sunday a foreigner, a German, who was very well dressed, and had a silver watch and guard, besides a quantity of German coin, in his possession, expired in the Westminster Hospital. He died without being able to state who or what he was, and must be buried by the parish, unless this should be noticed by some of his friends. On Friday evening the deceased was very tipsy in York-street, Westminster, and so evidently incapable of taking care of himself, that the police conveyed him to the New-way station. He became so much worse that Mr. Pearce, the surgeon, was sent for, and found him labouring under delirium tremens. He advised that he should be immediately taken to the hospital, which was done, and every attention paid to him. He continued insensible up to the time of his death, and the only words he was heard to utter were something like "Where is the captain? I want to go to sleep." He was an extremely well-made man, about six feet high, and twenty-five to twenty-six years of age, with a fair and very engaging countenance, and long auburn hair.

THE FINE ARTS.—ROYAL COMMISSION, REPORT, &c.—The report and appendix drawn up under the directions of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the members of this commission, have been lately laid before Queen Victoria, and honoured by her Majesty's entire approbation, a circumstance which thus affords additional evidence of the lively interest which our gracious Sovereign takes in promoting the interests of art, by encouraging the cultivation of the highest classes in this intellectual profession. This document is of considerable length, occupying about fifty folio pages, is very ably drawn up, not only as to the clear and proper exposition of the numerous facts which it contains, but also as to the arrangements of the various parts in their due order of succession, as follows: 1. The commission from her Majesty, Queen Victoria, to the Earl of Ellesmere, &c., by virtue of which they were appointed, viz., "To inquire into the mode in which, by means of the interior decoration of our said palace at Westminster, the fine arts of this country can be most effectually encouraged;" and the usual authority is then given to the commissioners to call before them such persons as they "shall judge likely to afford them any information upon the subject of the commission, and to inquire further concerning the premises by all other lawful means." And it is also provided that the commission "is to continue in full force, and to have power indefinitely to assemble from time to time, although the same be not continued by adjournment." This is, therefore, evidently a permanent commission. "The Report," specially so called, follows the recital of the commission, and is addressed, as we formerly stated it would be, "To the Queen," &c., and it goes on to state, that having carefully taken the information of the best-informed persons, they would submit their opinion, "that advantage ought to be taken of the rebuilding of the Houses of Parliament, for the purpose of promoting and encouraging the fine arts in the United Kingdom." The report closes, by stating that, although the competition to which they invite has reference chiefly to fresco painting, yet that it would not be correct to infer, therefore, that they intended to recommend its exclusive adoption for the decoration of the new buildings; "for that the future attention of the commission will be directed to the best mode of selecting for employment, artists skilled in oil painting and in sculpture, and that due consideration will be given to other methods and departments of art, applicable to decorative purposes."

DEATH OF LORD BERWICK.—The decease of the right hon. William Noel, Lord Berwick, of Attingham Hall, took place at his estate, in Hampshire, on Thursday week. His lordship was the second son of Noel, the first Lord Berwick, by Anne, daughter of Henry Vernon, Esq., of Hilton, in the county of Stafford. He was born about 1773, in London, educated at Cambridge, and succeeded his eldest brother, the right hon. Thomas Noel, Lord Berwick, in the peerage, Nov. 3, 1832. His lordship was unmarried, and is succeeded in his title and estates by his youngest brother, the hon. and Rev. Richard Noel Hill,

M.A., rector of Berrington, in the county of Salop; and it may be remarked as a somewhat uncommon occurrence, for three brothers in succession to take the title of their father.

THE MODEL PRISON AT PENTONVILLE.—This prison, of which we gave a drawing last week, is now completed, and will shortly be made available to the purposes for which it has been erected. The plan was determined on after a most laborious and careful inquiry into the construction of and state of discipline practised in most of the prisons of Europe, the West Indies, and North America, as well as those in Great Britain and Ireland. The construction of the prison is considered to be a decided improvement over all similar buildings, particularly as regards carrying out the separate or silent system of discipline. The expenses incurred in carrying the scheme to completion, it is stated, have exceeded £20,000. This is independent of the cost of erecting the buildings. It is understood that it will be opened for the reception of its unhappy inmates early next month. In the meantime all the appointments will be filled up. The qualifications for the principal situations have been very numerous. Upwards of 100 candidates for the appointment of governor have sent in testimonials, most of them from highly respectable and competent persons. The salaries will be as follow, viz.:—governor, £500 per annum; surgeon, £400; chaplain, £300; deputy-governor, £200; master manufacturer, £200, with suitable residences, &c. The inferior officers, with residences outside in the angles, will have salaries from £120 to £50.

THE NEW CHURCH OF ALL SAINTS, ST. PANCRAS. This church, the first stone of which was laid by Sir R. H. Inglis in November last, is situated in the neighbourhood of Gordon-square, and is now completed and ready for consecration. It is built in the Grecian style, and bears an inscription on one of the foundation-stones, dedicating it to the eternal Trinity. The parish in which it is situated, contains, according to the recent census, 130,000 inhabitants, but with church accommodation, including proprietary chapels, for only 16,000 of that number. In order to meet this enormous deficiency, the Church of All Saints has been erected at a considerable cost, under the immediate direction of the Bishop of London, in whom the patronage is vested. It is proposed to establish schools in the more destitute sections of the district, which in itself contains upwards of 7000 persons. The church is provided with 1200 sittings, one-third of which is entirely free. Among the donations may be enumerated £1500 from the committee of the Metropolis Churches Fund, £500 from his Grace the Duke of Bedford, £300 from Mr. Waller, and a splendid Gothic communion service from Mr. J. Greaves, of Irlam Hall, Lancashire.

THE LATE THUNDER STORM.—A curious incident occurred in a crowd; the finger of an individual suddenly became light, and was conducted with electrical velocity into another person's pocket, when, being attracted by the metal, it struck upon the whole of it, and then glided off as that the bolt which usually follows was quite in another direction.—Punch.

FROM OUR LATE EDITION OF LAST WEEK.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND.—We understand that the Queen and Prince Albert propose to pay a visit to Scotland at the commencement of next month. Her Majesty and the Prince will, we believe, go to Scotland and return by sea. Her Majesty will probably make an excursion to the Highlands during her stay in Scotland, paying visits to the Earl of Kinnoul, Lord Mansfield, Lord Breadalbane, and Lord Willoughby D'Eresby. It is said that her Majesty will reside, while in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, at the Palace of Dalkeith. The Royal George Yacht, at Portsmouth, is fitting out with the utmost expedition, doubtless for the purpose of conveying her Majesty to Scotland. [Our journal, the week her Majesty makes her tour, will be the most splendid of any which has yet appeared.]

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE opens for the season on the 3rd of September.

VAUXHALL GARDENS are, for the remainder of the season, to be open at one shilling each, without any diminution of the performances.

DISTURBANCES IN THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.

MANCHESTER, Friday Morning.

By five o'clock the people again assembled in large masses in the Granby-row fields, St. George's-fields, New-Cross, and other parts of the town, and crowds of from 200 to 400 paraded Oxford-road in a menacing attitude, soliciting persons they were freely given to them by the shopkeepers. The Magistrates commenced their sittings between five and six o'clock, and continued to be occupied until a late hour in swearing in special constables. Up to the present time of writing there are few short of 2500 specials appointed.

The first act of the rioters this morning was to attack some large silk-mills in Silver-street, which had again gone to work. These they compelled to stop, after which they visited several other factories. Notwithstanding the resolutions come to by the magistrates, and a deputation of the meeting yesterday, but few mills have returned to work this morning. It was decided by the magistrates, that on any mill returning to work, it should be protected by a certain number of the military and special constables. The conduct and behaviour of the mob appears very determined, and great fears are entertained that the day will not pass over without some collision. The troops and police marched this morning to their several stations soon after four o'clock. The organization of the people appears complete, but it has not exactly transpired under what leaders they are acting. At nine o'clock a notice was given to the police, that a meeting of the leaders of the disturbance was to be held at the lead-mills of Messrs. Eccleshaw, in Piccadilly. A strong detachment of constables, accompanied by a party of dragoons, immediately went to the spot, and entering into the rear of the premises, succeeded in capturing ten prisoners, who were directly removed to the town-hall. A notice was immediately afterwards issued, of which the following is a copy:—"All persons who have been sworn in as special constables, with the exception of those who are now on duty, are requested to assemble at the town-hall forthwith.

"Town-hall, August 12, 7 o'clock a.m. W. NEILD, Mayor."

Another meeting has been held at the Carpenters'-hall, for the purpose of appointing delegates to a meeting, to be held at two to-day.

Rochdale is in the same excited state, and acting upon the same system as Manchester. They have determined to move out to-day upon Todmorden and the various manufactories in that neighbourhood to "force all out." The Royston people are to move simultaneously into Rochdale, and do duty for their absent brother operatives, in keeping watch and ward over the mills and other works, so as to prevent any of the hands from going "in."

SALFORD.—FIRING UPON THE MOB.

An attack was made at seven o'clock this morning upon the mills of Messrs. Gisborne, printers and bleachers, at the Adelphi works, which was resisted by the parties placed inside for their protection, who fired upon the mob, and wounded five persons.

APPROACH OF THE COLLIERS.

I open my parcel to state that the turn-out colliers have arrived at Pendleton, one mile from Manchester, on their march towards the town. They have attacked several mills. A detachment from the military has just been dispatched to intercept their progress in that direction.

SPOONFORT, Friday Morning, seven o'clock.—At five o'clock this morning an immense assemblage of persons took place on the Waterloo-road, where resolutions were passed in favour of a repeal of the corn-laws, and in favour of the people's charter. All the mills are turned out, and the mob have broken open and pillaged the work-houses of food and clothing. They are going about in mobs robbing the provision shops. The Cheshire Yeomanry are out, but the applications for a military force from Manchester have been unsuccessful.

Saturday Morning.

The latest intelligence unfortunately proves that the turn-out still continues, not only in Manchester, but in every town in the neighbourhood Bolton, Ashton, Oldham, Bury, and Rochdale. At the latter place the accounts received this morning state the manufacturers have been compelled to cease working the mills, and the rioters have taken the plugs out of the boilers, to prevent the engines from running. In general a suspension of labour was never known before. The magistrates are using every possible means in their power, by swearing special constables, &c., to preserve the peace; but the impression is, that had the workmen any organization, matters would be much worse. It is much feared that the great communications of the country—the railroads will be attempted, by endeavouring to tear up and destroy the rails and their bearings, &c. Every precaution, however, is used to protect them.

From Scotland, we regret to say, the "turn out" has taken strong root, and at Dunfermline serious riots have taken place among the weavers, many of whom have been taken prisoners. A letter from Glasgow, says, "The Airdrie district was quiet on Thursday forenoon, except pillaging potatoes, &c., which continues as formerly. When the news of the riots at Manchester, Dunfermline, &c., has spread, perhaps it may be otherwise." And the following will show that other places are swelling the unhappy list:

"ABERDEENSHIRE AND FORFARSHIRE.—Intelligence had been received in Edinburgh on Wednesday night from the manufacturing districts, which unfortunately gives too good reason to fear that the present riotous proceeding will extend to the principal commercial towns and burghs in these extensive counties."

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

WINDSOR, Thursday.—The royal party returned from VIRGINIA Water shortly before eleven o'clock last night. This morning the Queen and Prince Albert and the Duke of Saxe Coburg took an early walk to the Home Park and Slopes. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken out as usual, accompanied by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Prince rode out in a pony phaeton, his Royal Highness driving. The Duke of Saxe Coburg, the Duchess of Kent, and the Prince of Leiningen, were in the next carriage.

Sir Robert Peel passed through Warwick about seven o'clock on Tuesday morning, on his way from Hopton House to his seat at Drayton Manor; the Premier changed horses, and alighted to purchase some books; he appeared to have all his parliamentary documents with him.—Leamington Chronicle.

The Commissioners of Police had interviews with Sir James Graham on Thursday at the Home-office. Sir James visited Sir R. Peel, in Whitehall-gardens. The Attorney and the Solicitor-General were in attendance on the Home Secretary during a long period. Lord F. Somerset, military secretary to the Commander-in-Chief, visited Sir J. Graham at the Home-office in the afternoon. Mr. Hall, chief magistrate of Bow-street, attended at the Home-office. Mr. Stewart, deputy-chairman of the Customs, had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in Downing-street. The Commander Marquis Lisboa, Brazillan minister, transacted business at the Foreign-office.

BELFAST ELECTION.—At the close of the third day's poll, the numbers were—Mr. Ross, 740; Mr. E. Tennent, 671; Lord H. Chichester, 552.

CAMBERWELL FAIR.—This old established fair commenced on Tuesday. From an early hour the road to and from the Elephant and Castle was thronged with "go-carts" and caravans—the drivers vying with each other in economy of locomotion. The fair itself was beyond an average in booths and stalls, though from the opposition of many of the inhabitants, who have long endeavoured to abolish it, the contrary might have been expected.

COMMITTAL OF THE INTRUDER INTO WINDSOR CASTLE TO BETHLEM.—The individual who was discovered in Windsor Castle on Monday night, under circumstances of great suspicion, was brought to the Home-office yesterday for further examination. We stated his name in our last report to be John Quinlan; that was incorrect—his real name, it appears, is Thomas Quested, aged 40, and a native of Maidstone. After a lengthened examination, no doubt remained but that he was insane, and the medical gentlemen signed a certificate to that effect. He was then conveyed to Tothillfields-prison, and an order was made out for his committal to Bethlem Hospital; and as soon as it received the signature of the Home Secretary, the prisoner was removed to that place of confinement, there to remain during her Majesty's pleasure.

ANOTHER SUICIDE BY LEAPING FROM THE MONUMENT.—At half-past ten o'clock on Friday morning a suicide of a most extraordinary kind—that of leaping from the Monument—was committed by a respectably-dressed young female. In her descent she turned round, and as she struck the earth whilst in a position by which her knees were near her chest, nearly every bone was broken. She took such a leap, that she fell upwards of twelve feet from the base of Monument, in Fish-street-hill, and cleared a cart which was standing by the side of the pavement.

POLICE.—BOW-STREET, Friday.—An interesting-looking female, named Hart Seaman, was found on Waterloo-bridge, and policeman F 50 (thinking she contemplated suicide), arrested her. After expressing her contrition for the attempt, Mr. Bowstead, the clerk, observed a description of one Martha Seaman, who had absconded from Mr. Thomas Frye, churchwarden of Saffron-Walden, taking some old coins with her. The description corresponded exactly with that of the prisoner; and on her being closely questioned, she confessed that she had been, all lately, in the service of Mr. Frye, of Saffron-Walden, and had absconded, but she denied all knowledge of the coins which she was suspected to have stolen. Mr. Twyford ordered her to be remanded till Monday.

UNION-HALL.—Hart Seaman, alias Martin, were charged with breaking into and robbing a dissenting chapel, in Tooley-street. The discovery took place owing to a quarrel between a woman and one of the prisoners with whom she cohabited. As other charges are likely to be made against them, the prisoners were remanded.

CHARTIST MEETING IN LINCOLN'S INN-FIELDS.—On Thursday evening, about ten o'clock, the neighbourhood of Lincoln's-inn-Fields was placed in a state of great excitement by a large body of Chartists, marshalled in procession, proceeding towards a temporary hustings, which had been previously prepared for the delegates opposite the Royal College of Surgeons. The majority of the shopkeepers in the immediate neighbourhood where the meeting was about to be held, shut up their shops, fearing lest evil consequences should follow the meeting. The police were not in attendance up to half-past ten o'clock, although the multitude of people that assembled in the fields rapidly increased. A person named Browning acted as chairman on the occasion, and harangued the multitude at some length, exhorting them to keep the peace. He, nevertheless, assured them that they were superstitiously weak in trusting to the promises that had been held out to them by the Government. He further observed, that the police were not there, but that it was the duty of every Chartist to mark the several members of the police who might interfere with them. A female sat by the side of the orator. The general feeling evinced around the spot where the meeting took place was condemnatory of the proceedings; and a seeming disgust prevailed in the hearts of all who were not infatuated with the "spirit of Chartism."

CHARTIST MEETING AT ISLINGTON-GREEN.—An immense assemblage of Chartists took place on Thursday evening, at Islington-green, at about twenty minutes past seven o'clock. Dr. Webb, on taking the chair, pronounced himself an old Reformer, who had retired from public life for some time, but was induced to come forward on the present occasion, when he found a disposition on the part of the manufacturing employers to take advantage of the promise of a plentiful harvest, to reduce the wages of the working classes. Mr. Mantz proposed the first resolution, pledging the meeting to a deep sympathy with the men of the north in their resistance to the tyranny which attempted to grind them down. After some other speeches to the same effect, the meeting separated in an orderly manner, notwithstanding an attempt to create confusion, by some heavy flint stones being cast at the platform. About 5000 or 6000 of those assembled adjourned to Clerkenwell-green, and were again addressed by other speakers when our reporter left.

DISTURBANCES IN THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.

MANCHESTER, WEDNESDAY EVENING, 12 O'CLOCK.

Up to this time the town has not been disturbed by any riotous proceedings this day, but the authorities are, nevertheless, watchful. The delegates have been sitting, but nothing particular has emanated from them. The proprietor of a printing press, with a form in type, from which seditious placards were to be struck off, was taken into custody this morning, by order of the local authorities. Some of the mills have been "going;" it is said that they are the factories from which the men turned out this day week. The men are to go extensive round of the Manchester and Leeds Railway, who were obliged to turn out on Friday, went to work again this morning. To-morrow it is expected a great number of hands will go in. An attempt was made this morning to turn out the hands at Messrs. Hermann, Victoria Mill, Pendleton, but were driven back by the workmen. They then visited Messrs. Coates' and M'Naghten's print works, at Seedley, but the men of those establishments armed themselves with bludgeons, and with the co-operation of the police and special constables, they put the mob to the rout, after thrashing them, and chased them over the country, taking three or four of the ringleaders in custody.

At six o'clock in the morning two companies of the 58th, with Captain Burke, and a troop of the 1st Royal Dragoons, marched off to Oldham. Fears were entertained at that place of a tumultuous assembly, and the local authorities despatched a messenger to General Sir W. Warre for some more troops to aid them in dispersing it, but no conflict took place. The mills at Ashton, Stalevbridge, Lees, Glossop, and Worsley, are yet without hands, but will all be set going again by Monday. There is not the least symptom of riot or political disaffection, either at Ashton or Stalevbridge, and it is not thought requisite to station any troops in those towns. A meeting of the millowners was held, when it was determined that the hands that were forced out should resume work to-morrow. On the Manchester and Leeds Railway men are stationed so as to communicate almost instantly a movement of any party on the line

THURSDAY EVENING.—We are tolerably quiet to-day, and the town is resuming its wonted activity.

THREATENED ATTACK UPON SIR R. PEEL'S AT DRAYTON MANOR.

BIRMINGHAM, Thursday.—This evening the streets of Birmingham, at a late hour, were in a state of considerable commotion, in consequence of about 100 of the police force being sent proceeding in the direction of Daddeston-row and the London, Derby, and Grand Junction Railway stations. They were headed by Superintendent Atkins, on horseback, accounts having arrived of a contemplated attack upon the residence of Sir Robert Peel, near Tamworth. The colliers, in the course of this morning, had visited Beaudesart, the seat of the Marquis of Anglesea, and Ingestrie, the seat of the Earl of Talbot, and, it was stated, were proceeding from thence to Drayton Manor, the seat of Sir Robert Peel. A troop or detachment of the 3rd Dragoon Guards was immediately ordered out. They have just left Birmingham for Fazeley, the nearest town to the residence of the right honourable baronet. Sir Robert Peel was at Drayton Manor the early part of the week. A meeting of the Chartists in Birmingham this evening (to which the police were directing their special attention), although numerously attended, passed off quietly.

SHEFFIELD, WEDNESDAY EVENING.

The turn-outs have been here stopping the mills, and beating in the plugs. A collision has taken place with the police, and 25 of the rioters are secured. Mr. Read, chief constable of the force, is very much bruised by the brickbats that were thrown at him by the mob. The most active exertions are being made to arrest the progress of the turn-outs.

BLACKBURN.

About three o'clock (Tuesday) the mob arrived from Burnley at Furthergate (about a mile and a quarter from Blackburn), to the number of several thousands, and the military were stationed there to prevent their entering the town. The mob would not disperse on being required to do so; and at length the troops (dragoons and hussars) were ordered to charge, and in five minutes the mob was scattered in all directions, and 80 of the rioters were captured, 40 of whom were sent off to Preston House of Correction the same evening, and the other 40 would be sent to-day. The mill of Messrs Fieldens and Townley was not stopped, except during the short time that it was surrounded by the mob

WEDNESDAY NIGHT.—Up to this time the town remains in the same state of tranquility, but serious apprehensions are still entertained of another outbreak.

LIVERPOOL, THURSDAY.

Some apprehensions were created yesterday in consequence of numbers of strangers having come into town from the manufacturing districts. They walked in straggling groups of between twenty and thirty strong, down London-road, for the purpose, as is supposed, of stirring up the disaffected in the borough, and thus extending the scene of these riotous proceedings which have prevailed in the neighbouring districts.

CLITHEROE.

No disturbance has taken place here; but, owing to the excitement which prevails, the masters of the spinning and weaving-mills have closed their works, except the print-works of Messrs. Thompson and Co.

HINDLEY, AUGUST 17.

The rioters first made their appearance in this village at about 20 minutes before nine o'clock on Monday morning last. They came from Wigan, in a straggling manner, and 200 or 300 of the lowest class of people, chiefly Irish, and the greater part of them handloom weavers from the Scholes. On their way here they stopped several coal-works, and also Mr. Gidlow's cotton-mills at Ince.

THE MINING DISTRICTS IN THE MIDLAND COUNTIES.

BIRMINGHAM, Thursday Evening.—The turn-out continues in South Staffordshire, and both men and masters appear determined to stand out. A host of coals was swamped in the neighbourhood of Oldbury on Tuesday night, and all possible means are adopted to prevent the proceeding of the various manufactures of the neighbourhood.

DERBYSHIRE.

The glove hands, and a large number of men engaged in the hosiery manufactures, have refused to work, a notice to reduce their wages having been given, it is said by the Messrs. Boot at Belper, who state that an abatement is making by other manufacturers.

LEICESTER.

The stocking-makers in this district have all struck, in consequence, as is alleged, of the masters exacting full frame-rent for half a week's work.

PRESTON, WEDNESDAY EVENING.

Reports stated that immense bodies of the rioters from Wigan, Chorley, and the districts of the collieries, some making them as numerous as 15,000, armed with axes, spades, bludgeons, &c., were on their way to the town. It was reported that a large cotton factory at Bamberbridge, was partially destroyed by the mob. From the church steeple and the North Union Railway Bridge, which command extensive views of the various roads to Preston, it was soon ascertained that the mob were in a body on their road towards the town of Chorley. However, the police and the military were brought together, and took up their station near Walton-bridge, the police being in the turnpike road, and the Rifles on each side being concealed behind the hedges. About three o'clock in the forenoon a mob of about 1000 persons, chiefly armed with iron truncheons, reached Walton, passed through the village, and were about entering the town, when the police force attempted to prevent them, and in consequence, a battle ensued, in the course of the police were severely wounded, one of whom had two fingers nearly severed from his hand by a blow with an iron bar. It soon became evident that the police force would be defeated, and the appearance of the mob became so alarming, that orders were given to the military, who instantly burst through the hedges on either side of the road, and presented a bold front to the mob. The sudden appearance of the Rifles spread consternation and dismay in the ranks of the insurgents, who fled in all directions. The police pursued them and succeeded in apprehending 38. The consequence of this defeat of the mob had a great effect on the inhabitants, and in the evening complete tranquility and confidence were restored throughout Preston. Leyland, Croppel, Euxton, Blackrod, Standish, Worthington, &c. The alarm was great, the mob having, in the course of the day visited all the factories, bleach works, collieries, &c., and the hands were all turned out.

AUGUST 17.—The town and neighbourhood is perfectly quiet—not a single disturbance has taken place to day. Last night sent of the leaders of the Walton affray were examined and committee for trial.

ASHTON, THURSDAY EVENING.

We have had some slight disturbances to day. Several bricklayers and other labourers were known to have resumed work, and a crowd of people gathered together in the market-place about eleven o'clock, and began to turn the men out of their places of employment. The magistrates immediately called out the available force, consisting of about 300 special constables. The Riot Act was read, and after very trifling mischief the rioters left the town.

BURY AND THE NEIGHBOURHOOD.

On Thursday an assemblage of 200 or 300 persons, apparently from the neighbourhood of Edenfield, passed through Bury, to Ratcliffe, where they stopped all the mills on their road. The rioters proceeded from Bury to Ratcliffe, where they stopped all the establishments they found at work; but, on proceeding to the collieries of John Fletcher, Esq., they were attacked by the Bolton troop of Yeomanry, a party of the 72nd Highlanders, and a body of constables, who routed them completely, taking 78 prisoners, who were placed in carts, and lodged in the New Bailey Prison. We believe all the mills in Bury are at a stand this morning, the work-people having refused to return to their employment.

NOTTINGHAM, THURSDAY EVENING.

It having been announced that a large meeting would be held in our market-place at one o'clock to day, to consider the propriety of ceasing from work, a great demonstration was expected by the Chartists. The affair, however, has proved a complete failure; and the leaders of the business recommended, as the meeting was so small as not of sufficient importance to decide on the resolution, to adjourn till the evening.

THE SCENE AT NEW CROSS.

THE DISTURBANCES IN THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.

A supplement to the London Gazette of Friday last, offering a reward of fifty pounds for the authors, abettors, or perpetrators of the outrages at Manchester, was published on Saturday.

DEPARTURE OF TROOPS FOR THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.

Throughout Saturday the greatest bustle and activity were displayed at the Home Office, at the Horse Guards, &c., in consequence of the arrival at the former place of an express from Manchester as early as seven o'clock, which, from its important nature, was immediately forwarded to the residence of Sir James Graham, who shortly after, with Mr. Manners Sutton, the under-secretary, was in attendance at the Home Office. About nine o'clock three of the magistrates of Manchester, who had left that town late on Friday night, and had come express to London for the purpose of laying before her Majesty's Government the latest information as to the state of the disturbed districts, and to impress upon them the necessity of the most energetic measures being immediately adopted for the suppression of the disturbances, were admitted to an interview with Sir James Graham, which was of considerable length. Whatever was the extent of the communications made by the deputation to the right hon. baronet has not been permitted to transpire, but their importance may be conjectured from the fact, that summonses were immediately afterwards issued for holding a Cabinet Council at the Foreign Office, in Downing-street, at twelve o'clock, which was attended by Sir Robert Peel, and the whole of the Cabinet ministers in town. Previous to the assembling of the Council, Sir Robert Peel visited Sir James Graham at the Home Office, and in the course of the morning two gentlemen, forming a deputation from Macclesfield, had an interview with the right hon. secretary. Immediately after the conclusion of the deliberations of the Cabinet Council, which occupied upwards of two hours, orders were forwarded from the Horse Guards to Woolwich, for a party of the Royal Artillery to hold themselves in instant readiness to depart for Manchester; and a similar order was despatched to St. George's Barracks, Charing-cross, for the departure of the third battalion of the Grenadier Guards, stationed at that barracks, for the same destination, via the London and Birmingham Railway.

The fact that troops had been ordered off to the disturbed districts soon became publicly known both at Woolwich and in the metropolis, and produced an intense feeling of alarm and excitement in the minds of individuals generally. Large crowds of persons shortly began to assemble in the neighbourhood of the barracks at Charing-cross, for the purpose of witnessing the departure of the troops, who congregated themselves together in detached groups, and appeared to be canvassing the objects and views of the "turn-outs," and the probable ultimate result of their proceeding. About six o'clock a detachment of 150 of the Royal Artillery left Woolwich, having in charge four heavy pieces of ordnance, each drawn by four horses, and accompanied by numerous waggons, containing ammunition, baggage, stores, and accoutrements, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Smith, and proceeded to the terminus of the London and Birmingham Railway. At eight the third battalion of the Grenadier Guards marched out of St. George's Barracks, numbering between six and seven hundred strong, under the command of Colonel Sir Ord Honeyman, Bart., headed by the band playing, though the front gates in Trafalgar-square, and proceeded along Pall-mall East, Pall-mall, and Regent-street, into the New-road, on their way to Euston-square. They were followed by a large crowd of persons, which continued during their progress to increase, by accumulations of working men and boys, until their arrival at the railway station. By the time they reached the Quadrant, murmurs of groans and hisses burst from the crowd, which continued to increase as they advanced up Regent-street, mingled with exclamations of "Remember you are brothers." About the middle of Regent-street, the crowd pressing closely on the band, the officer in command directed the band to strike playing, and at the same time ordered the soldiers to "fix bayonets," which order was immediately obeyed. That, however, did not silence the groans and hisses, which were uttered by the crowd until the battalion reached the terminus.

LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY, SUNDAY.—This morning, as early as nine o'clock, another troop of Royal Horse Artillery arrived from Woolwich at the Euston Station of the London and Birmingham Railway, with three field pieces and ammunition. About 4 o'clock, the Quartermaster of the 34th Foot, from Portsmouth, attended by an orderly, arrived, and ordered refreshment to be procured from the various public-houses for that regiment, which was en route by the South Western Railway from Portsmouth. The greatest excitement at this time prevailed, the Quartermaster being obliged to be escorted from the various public-houses by the police. In an hour after, two waggons, laden with ammunition and guarded by several soldiers of the 34th, came up, and was shortly after followed by the regiment, under the command of Colonel Airey, consisting of 600 men. On their arrival they were greeted with the most discordant yelling by the mob, and it was as much as the police could do to prevent them from forcing an entry into the railway yard.

[illegible] TROOPS [illegible]

MANCHESTER, SATURDAY EVENING.

Captain Sleigh, the active assistant-commissioner of police, was on duty all last night, and in constant hourly communication with Colonel Wemyss, as from information obtained from authentic quarters, it was feared that incendiary attempts would be made upon one or more quarters of the town. At 7 o'clock this morning, upwards of one hundred respectable inhabitants were sworn in as special constables. Although the apprehended attack on the carts coming with supplies to market did not take place, the markets and shambles have been very scantily supplied. At eight o'clock information was early received at the Town-hall, that a large mob had gone to turn out the hands at the engine manufactory of the Leeds Railway. On receipt of this intelligence, a large body of police and special constables were dispatched, who succeeded in preventing any further outrage, although the hands did not return to work. About noon a strong force of mounted police, with one hundred police constables on foot, and about an equal number of special constables, were dispatched to Little Ireland, in the township of Chorlton on-Medlock, where they succeeded in dispersing a large crowd, and seizing large accumulations of stones and brickbats. No less than ten cart loads were removed under the protection of this body, who entered many houses, where they found large accumulated heaps. The police were attacked with showers of stones, and amongst others, Superintendent Sawley was severely injured by a blow from a brickbat. At this time, and until four o'clock, the Town-hall was under the protection of the special constables, of whom there were large bodies, numbers arriving constantly to be sworn in. The Riot Act was read at an early period of the day by D. Maude, Esq. It was subsequently read at other parts of the town, and the following notice, in large letters, was extensively posted:—"Public Notice.—The Riot Act has been read, and all persons are desired to go peaceably to their respective homes, on pain of being apprehended and punished as rioters and disturbers of the public peace. William Neild, Mayor. Town-hall, August 10, 1842." At this hour the streets were being scoured by large detachments of foot and horse police in every direction. About noon a messenger arrived at the Town-hall, by an express train from Preston, from the magistrates, requesting military aid. Expectations of a general turn out were entertained as early as Thursday, on account of which many special constables were sworn in, and the sergeants of militia, as well as the pensioners, were called to active service, and took up their quarters at the prison. It was understood at the Town hall that three troops of the Lancashire Yeomanry had been called out for active service. Three persons have been killed; and although this town is in but a poor condition to spare any troops, 150 Rifles have been sent down by the three o'clock train. This morning none of the mills, except those of Messrs. Birley, in Oxford-street, and Messrs. Kennedy, in the same street, have commenced work. The suburbs of the town have been crowded with gangs of marauders, on the pretence of seeking alms. About noon a very daring and riotous attack was made on a mill at Quarry-bank, near Willastow, belonging to Mr. Greg, the late member for Manchester, by about 500 men; who after demanding admission, which was refused, forced open the door, the whole body marching into the lower part of the mill, and effecting considerable damage before they could be ejected, After this they went to the village shops and bakehouses, seizing all the bread they could lay their hands upon.

At 3 o'clock in the afternoon, intelligence was received of a most daring attempt on the Leeds Railway, which was no less than to seize the mail train. A large mob ascended the inclined plane from St. George's-fields, and threw the guard down the embankment. They then let all the water out of the boiler, leaving the fire in, expecting that an explosion would be the consequence. Prompt aid was sent by a strong detachment of Rifles, police, and special constables, but on their arrival the crowd had dispersed. Seeing that their attempt had not been effectual, and had not rendered the engines unfit for work, the mob were about to renew the attack, when they were dispersed. An attempt was also made to throw the express engine off the road, which brought the request to this town for military aid, by several obstructions being thrown in its way.

At 6 o'clock a special messenger arrived at the Town-hall from the magistrates at Staleybridge, giving information that 10,000 persons, including navigators and others, had passed through that town, the majority of whom were armed with clubs. They passed through very quietly, with the exception of repeated cries that they would have blood for blood. The letter requested military aid. At 9 o'clock a letter was received from the Superintendent of Police at Bury, addressed to Sir Charles Shaw, stating that upwards of 5000 persons had left the town on their way to Bolton, and were expected back at night. Large assemblages had also come into the town from Heywood. He also accompanied this with a strong request for a company of soldiers. At 10 o'clock it was announced at the Town-hall that all was quiet in the different districts.

Sunday Morning.—The accounts from many of the out-districts received yesterday evening, continue to be of a very alarming description. At Hyde, the districts were placarded with bills from the magistrates, forbidding all assemblages as illegal; whilst counter bills were issued, declaring that the workmen would not return to work until the Charter had become the law of the land. At Ashton, where the riots in this district commenced, there are no mills at work. A battalion of the Coldstream Guards has just reached here by the 7 o'clock train from London. The 73rd Regiment is on its way from Ireland.

Monday Evening, Seven o'clock.—The mill owners and manufacturers have resolved not to open their factories or resume business until a general and simultaneous plan can be adopted. For this purpose the mayor is in constant correspondence with the Home Office; but before it can be followed it will be necessary to have another reinforcement of troops. At three o'clock this afternoon, in consequence of information received that an open air meeting was to be held in the Granby-row Fields, there was an imposing array of military force collected opposite St. Peter's Church. It being feared that another attempt would be made, at 4 o'clock a much more imposing force, consisting, in addition to the above, of four hundred police and special constables, went down to Granby-row Fields; but there being no opposition, they marched onwards through Ancoats, back through Oldham-street, to their destination. Some factories in Poland-street, Ancoats, have been taken as barracks, of which a large party of the Fusilier Guards have taken possession. A large detachment of the 12th Lancers arrived this morning from Liverpool by special trains, having just come to that port from Dublin. Placards, of which the following is a copy, were extensively distributed this day round the walls of the town:—

"RUN FOR GOLD!!!

"Labour is suspended! Public credit is shaken!! Labour is worthless!!! Run for gold. Every sovereign is now worth thirty shillings. Paper cannot be cashed. Run, middle-class men, trades, odd-fellows, sick clubs, and money clubs, to the saving-banks, and all banks, for gold! gold!! gold!!!"

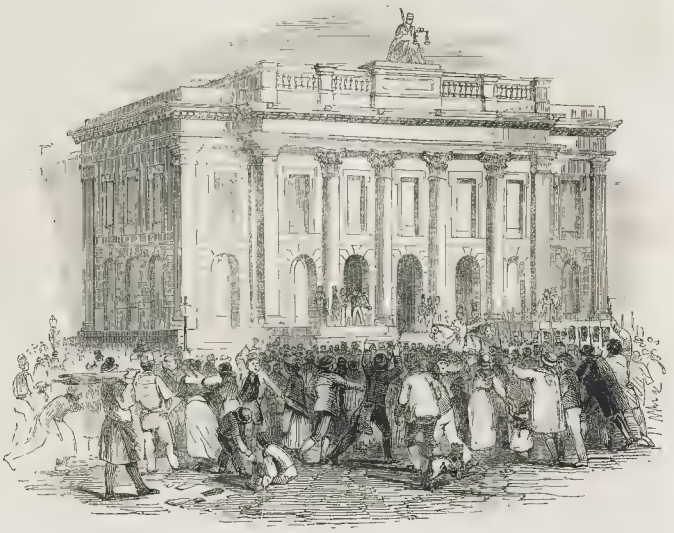
At the meeting of the delegates, held at the Town hall this morning, much inflammatory language was used. A resolution was passed not to return to work until the charter had become the law of the land.

Wednesday Morning. This town remains nearly in the same state as yesterday. None of the cotton-mills are at work; but an expectation exists that a portion of the workmen will, in a short time, resume their employment. It is plain, from what has occurred at the meetings of the working-classes, that a large body of them disapprove of the resolution which the ultra-radicals have, in some instances, succeeded in carrying, that our shall not be resumed until the Charter becomes the law of the land. Since Saturday night two of the leaders in the proceedings which have caused such disturbance in the town, Mr. Tinker and George Seddon, have been apprehended.

ATTACK ON A PRINT-WORKS.—THE MOB FIRED ON. TWO MEN AND THREE BOYS WOUNDED.

Messrs. Wilson and Co., of the Adelphi print-works, Salford, resumed work on Friday, all their hands being taken on. The news speedily made known amongst the rioters; and shortly after six o'clock a large crowd presented themselves at the entrance gates, Adelphi-street, and demanded that the hands should be turned out. We believe one of the Messrs. Wilson answered a determination that the works should not be stopped, and stated that he had a body of police in the yard to protect them. The gates were then closed, and the crowd proceeded to throw stones over the wall. A body of police rushed out, and drove the crowd back; most of them then went round to the south side of the building, and hurled showers of stones at the windows, evidently determined to destroy as much property as they could. The police again made a sally, and drove the crowd away; but before they had succeeded, a private watchman, who had stationed himself at one of the windows inside, discharged a blunderbuss loaded with No. 4 shot at the legs of the assailants, and five of them, we regret to say, were wounded. They were carried off to the Salford Royal Dispensary; and the mob being thus intimidated, no further violence was attempted, and the works proceeded without interruption up to the hour at which we write.

The men were shot from the ground-window of the mill, as seen in the print.



TOWN HALL, MANCHESTER, READING THE RIOT ACT.

THE COLLIERS' STRIKE—WARWICKSHIRE.

The miners of South Staffordshire having obtained information that some of the works in their district were being supplied with coal from the pits in Bedworth and Foleshill, which are situated between Coventry and Nuneaton, on the borders of Leicestershire, they deputed six colliers to visit the men in the above district. On Friday they proceeded to the place, where they were joined by Mr. O'Neil, from Birmingham, the Chartist lecturer, and another. At six o'clock in the evening a few assembled, and adjourned until four on Saturday morning; at three they commenced calling each other out of their houses, and at the appointed hour about 1000 were collected on a piece of waste ground leading from the high road. A collier from West Bromwich was appointed to preside, upon which Mr. O'Neil addressed the men on the rights of labour, and the necessity of the men of Warwickshire co-operating with those of Staffordshire for an improvement in their condition. He advised them to obey the law, and not to force their fellow-labourers to quit work, but to reason them into compliance, as the struggle then going on was to be conducted by moral means alone. The result was communicated to the colliery bailiffs, and in a short time after six boats, which had come from Oldbury in Staffordshire, and were lying in the adjoining canal, were started back to their owners empty, amidst the cheers of the turn-outs. The ground of complaint amongst the men in Bedworth consists more in the number of hours they are required to work, than their wages. They have at present 3s. a day for getting their coal, but work fourteen hours a day.

DREADFUL RIOT AT PRESTON.—RIOTERS SHOT.

Preston, Saturday, One o'clock. A meeting of operatives was held in Chadwick's Orchard last night, about nine o'clock; and though the numbers in attendance were considerable, the crowd was not anything like what might have been anticipated. A detachment of the 72nd were lodged in the assembly-room of the Bull Inn, and were under arms all night. It was was scarcely anticipated that any measures would have been

PROVINCIAL.

SOUTH HANTS ELECTION.—The high sheriff of the county has appointed the nomination of this election to take place on Tuesday, the 23rd inst., and the polling, in the event of there being any contest, on Friday and Saturday the 26th and 27th. A public meeting was held at Portsea on Monday evening, at which Lord Charles Wellesley was introduced to the electors by Rear-Admiral Sir Lucius Curtis.

IPSWICH ELECTION.—The nomination of candidates to supply the vacancy created in the representation of this borough by the decision of the late election committee took place on the Cornhill on Monday last at ten o'clock. The Chartists mustered in rather strong force. There was no exhibition of party colours on the occasion. The Mayor having opened the business of the day, and the usual forms having been gone through, Mr. J. E. Sparrow proposed Captain Gladstone, as a fit and proper person to represent the Borough, which was seconded by Mr. Rain. Mr. Thornbury was next proposed by Mr. Wrells, which was seconded by Mr. Muley. Mr. S. Lane Fox was next proposed by Mr. Rodwell, and seconded by Mr. Schreiber. Henry Vincent (the Chartist) was then proposed by Mr. Buck, seconded by Mr. Lovewell. Mr. John Nicholson was proposed by Mr. Hamlyn, seconded by Mr. Mott. The candidates then severally addressed the electors, after which, a show of hands being for the Chartist candidates, a poll was demanded on behalf of the Conservatives. The following were the numbers at the close of the poll:—Gladstone, 651; Fox, 641; Thornbury, 548; Vincent, 471

The typhus fever has been very prevalent in Devonport, and has swept away four of the children of Mr. Dawson, late manager and lessee of the Devonport Theatre.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE OPENING OF THE GATES OF DERBY.—This anniversary was celebrated with the accustomed signals of rejoicing. A salute of cannon was fired at an early hour in the morning, flags were hoisted on the cathedral and at the Royal bastion, and the joy-bells sent forth merry peals throughout the day. In the evening the apprentice boys assembled in their club-rooms, where they enjoyed themselves for a few hours in the utmost harmony. The whole proceedings went off in the most peaceable manner and without the slightest interruption.—Derby Sentinel.

ENGLISH FRUIT FOR SCOTLAND.—On Wednesday the large steam ship Royal Adelaide, of 1000 tons burden, Captain Richardson, Commander, left the St. Katherine's Steam-wharf, under the care of Mr. Bell, the pilot of the company, with 150 saloon, fore-cabin, and deck passengers for Leith, among whom were many of the Scottish nobility and gentry, and several English gentlemen on grouse shooting excursions to the Highlands. In addition to a large cargo, and several horses, carriages, and sporting dogs, the vessel contained an enormous quantity of English fruit, which continued arriving from various quarters until the moment the vessel got under weigh. There is a great demand for English fruit in Scotland, and the season has been so very prolific that great quantities have been shipped in the Scotch steamers; but the Royal Adelaide, on this occasion, took out an unusually large supply, amounting, in the whole, to 100 tons, which, should the steamer meet with a fair voyage, of which there is every probability, will soon be disposed of in the Edinburgh markets.

TEMPERANCE AND CHANGE.—The great apostle of temperance, Father Mathew, arrived here about ten o'clock on Saturday morning, from Dublin, accompanied by the very rev. Mr. Murphy, of Church-street chapel, in that city. As this has been expected for some time previously, a very large assemblage had congregated on the quay to welcome him, and to gratify themselves with a sight of the great philanthropist. On landing he was received with much cheering, and the crowd escorted him to the residence of the Right Rev. Bishop Scott. He proceeds, we have heard, from this to Liverpool on Thursday next, and in a few days resumes his labours in Ireland.—Greenock Advertiser.

IRISH REAPERS.—We mentioned in our last the arrival of a boat-load of Irish reapers. Since then, several other steamers, even more crowded than the one we then alluded to, have arrived here. Among others, the Rover, from Londonderry, on Friday morning, had close upon 1500 passengers. Not merely her main and quarter-decks, but the paddle-boxes and gangways were crowded, and even the very shrouds and the top of the funnel were occupied. As an instance of the progress of temperance among this class of passengers, we may mention that, a year or two ago it was an invariable practice, for the safety of all concerned, to deprive the "boys," before going on board, of the "slips" with which they furnished themselves. They were gathered together, and on reaching the port of destination, were thrown ashore in a heap. The consequence, among such a pugnacious set, might easily be guessed, when no man could get his own stick, and would not, if sober, know from whom it proceeded. Sobriety is at an end, such scenes are altogether unknown, no precaution being necessary, as, even in such a large cargo as was on board the Rover, no disturbance whatever took place, that being as easily managed and as peaceable as a boat full of lambs.—Ibid.

SWANSEA.—DREADFUL MURDER.—On Tuesday morning last, the 16th inst., the town of Swansea was thrown into a state of very great excitement in consequence of a report that a person, named John Bowling, had been murdered in cold blood early that morning by some five men. It appeared by the evidence adduced on the coroner's inquest, that a quarrel had taken place early on Tuesday morning between some Irishwomen, who live in the same court as the deceased. The five men charged with crime were attracted towards the spot by the noise. Soon after, those men attempted to take indecent liberties with the women; spoke of their intention of passing the night with them, which conduct some of the Irishmen resented. Blows ensued, and the Irishmen were worsted, and two of them beaten dangerously. Soon after the deceased, John Bowling, entered the court, and said, "What is all this noise about?" when the five men said, "We'll soon let you know, you Irish b——;" and with that he was cut down with a hatchet, and fell dead at once. After he had fallen, he was kicked and stabbed repeatedly; and his wife in attempting to save him, received very dangerous injuries. An inquest was held on Tuesday, and adjourned to Wednesday, for the purpose of receiving further evidence; but from the evidence already produced there cannot be the slightest doubt of the guilt of the five men, as all equally participated in the destruction of the unfortunate deceased. Another Irishman, who ran to his assistance, was so severely kicked, that no hopes are entertained of his recovery. The police were most active, and apprehended all the prisoners in the course of the morning.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, August 15.—A branch of the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland, was formed at Blessington, county of Wicklow, on Saturday last. The Marquis of Downshire presided, both at the business meeting in the morning, and the dinner of the society in the evening. The proceedings excited much interest, and passed off with the happiest unanimity.

The getting in of the harvest will be quite general in Ireland this week.

One hundred cottiers, sent out by Colonel Wyndham from his estate in Clare to Canada, from Limerick, on landing at Quebec, received 20s. each to proceed up the country, having been otherwise well provided for.

The garrison contract for meat has fallen one penny three-farthings a pound this month.

Mr. Leslie, son of the late Colonel Leslie, is a candidate for Monaghan, on the Conservative interest, with every probability of success.

Mr. Ireland, residentiary magistrate at Naas, has retired. It is not probable that the vacancy thereby created will be filled up by Government.

BELFAST ELECTION.—The election for this borough commenced on Saturday at twelve o'clock, when Lord Hamilton Chichester was proposed by T. L. Stewart, Esq., and seconded by John Clarke, Esq.; James E. Tennent, Esq., proposed by John Kane, Esq., and seconded by Richard Davison, Esq.; D. R. Ross, Esq., was proposed by George T. Mitchel, Esq., and seconded by Edward O'Korke, Esq. The show of hands was in favour of Mr. E. Tennent and Mr. Ross. A poll was then demanded on behalf of Lord Hamilton Chichester, and the court adjourned till Monday morning at nine o'clock. At the close of the first day's poll, the numbers stood thus:

Tennent	170
Ch chester	26

At the close of the second day's poll the numbers were:

Ross	453
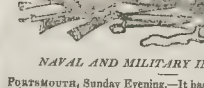
Chichester	184

DEATH OF LORD ROSSMORE.—The demise of Lord Rossmore took place on Wednesday evening last at Rossmore Park, in the county of Monaghan. His lordship had been in a declining state of health for some years. It is said that the deceased nobleman had in the heyday of youth enlisted in the army as a common soldier, and served as such for some years. His lordship was in his seventy-seventh year.

TROOPS FOR THE DISTURBED DISTRICTS.—On the arrival of the intelligence this morning of the disturbed state of the manufacturing districts, immediate orders were issued by the authorities to the two steam-packet companies to have each a vessel in instant readiness for the conveyance of troops to England; accordingly, the Nottingham and Mercury steamers were prepared for the reception of a regiment of infantry, and this evening, at four o'clock, sailed for Liverpool, having on board the whole of the 58th Regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Frith.

TRIAL OF MRS. BYRNE FOR THE MURDER OF HER HUSBAND.—Dr. Adams, Surgeon Kirby, and Mr. Shea, an apothecary and chemist, were examined, and gave it as their opinion that Byrne died from apoplexy, produced by drunkenness, and that his body might have become decomposed in a few hours after death. Baron Pennefather charged the jury, who retired, and in about half an hour returned with a verdict of "Not Guilty."



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

PORTSMOUTH, Sunday Evening.—It has already been stated that it was her Majesty's intention to take an excursion to sea in the royal yacht in the course of the summer. Orders were received here on Tuesday morning by telegraphic despatch to get the Royal George yacht ready for sea immediately, and her captain, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, arrived here on the same day; and it then became known that her Majesty had signified her intention of visiting Scotland, and that the royal yacht was to be equipped for the purpose of conveying her there. By the activity of her officers and crew she was manned and fully rigged, with all her running gear rove and her sails bent, by Friday, having in the mean time been into dock and had her copper cleaned. The royal barges have also been got ready for the reception of her Majesty, and their crews have been furnished with handsome uniform dresses for the occasion. The Pique, 36, the Hon. Captain Stopford, now lying at Spithead, is named as one of the ships which is to attend her Majesty, as also the Salamander steam-frigate, Commander A. S. Hamond. The Resistance troop-ship, Commander G. E. Patey, sailed yesterday for Canada, with the 71st Regiment, which marched from Chichester Barracks to the port in two divisions on Wednesday and Thursday last, and immediately embarked. The Brisk, 3, Lieutenant Commander George Spring, arrived here on Thursday from the coast of Africa, and sailed on Friday to the eastward, to be paid off. The Rolla, 16, Commander C. Hall, arrived on Tuesday also from the coast of Africa, and has gone round to Chatham to be paid off. She left Ascension on the 19th of June, at which date the Albert, steamer, one of the unfortunate Niger expedition, and the Prompt schooner, were lying there. The Madagascar was at Cabenda, near which place, with the Waterwitch, she had destroyed a baracoon, and liberated 9000 slaves. She was expected in a few days at Ascension. The Alban steam-vessel arrived on Friday from Gibraltar and Lisbon, with invalids—last from Plymouth. The Pique, 36, Hon. Captain Stopford, is now ready for sea; she went out of harbour on Wednesday. The Minden, 72, hospital ship, Captain Bate, which sailed from Plymouth for China, was at the Cape of Good Hope on the 18th of May. The Vixen, steam-frigate, Commander Boyes, was at the Mauritius on the 15th of April, on her passage to China. The Imaum, 74, fitting out as the receiving-ship for Port Royal, went out of the basin on Wednesday last, and will be ready for sea in a few days, by which time it is expected she will have completed her complement of men.

THE COAST-GUARD SERVICE.—NEW REGULATIONS.—Two additional lieutenants are to be promoted every year to the rank of commander—one from a coast-guard revenue cutter; but no lieutenant can receive the step of commander who has not served for two years in a sea-going ship, and those who have served the two years will be allowed one year's time for every three years in the coast-guard service, or eighteen months in a revenue cutter. The Admiralty have conceded to the Board of Customs the appointment of chief mates of revenue cruizers, and they recommend to the Board of Customs, when vacancies occur for second mates, that a preference may be given to such persons as have been brought up in the Greenwich Hospital Schools, or some other public institution. It is considered that these regulations will diffuse a spirit of emulation and perseverance highly beneficial to the service in general, and urge lieutenants of the navy to serve two years at sea as speedily as possible, without which on no account are they to receive promotion in the coast-guard service. And, further, such officers must also have certificates from the Comptroller General of the coast-guard, stating that their conduct "has been active, zealous, obedient, and in all other respects satisfactory."

MALTA, Aug. 5.—SHIPS OF WAR IN PORT.—The Queen, 110, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir E. W. C. R. Owen, commander-in-chief; Howe, 120, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir P. Mason, second in command; Impregnable, 104; Rodney, 92; Monarch, 84; Indus, 78; Vernon, 50; L'Aigle, 24; Magicienne, 24; Snake, 16; Devastation and Geyser, war-steamers; Prometheus and Alecto, steam-packets; and the Ceylon, receiving-ship, bearing the pendant of Rear-Admiral Sir John Louis, superintendent of Malta Dockyard.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE REST OF THE MEDITERRANEAN FLEET.—The Formidable, 84, Juseur, 16, and Lizard, steam-tender, at Gibraltar; Thunderer, 84, at Cadiz; and Belvidera, 38, on the south coast of Spain; Scout, 18, and Medea, war-steamer, at Corfu; Vanguard, 80, Cumberland, 78, and Phœnix, war-steamer, at Biskay Bay, near the Dardanelles; Stromboli, war-steamer, at Constantinople; Inconstant, 36, Hecate, and Vesuvius, war-steamer, at Beyrout; Cyclops, at Alexandria; Locust, steam-tender, at Tripoli, in Barbary, and the Savage, 10, at Tunis; Beacon and Magpie, at Port Russia, in the Island of Faros; Polyphemus, steam-packet, at Marseilles.

NARROW ESCAPE OF ONE H.M. SHIPS.—The Crocodile troop-ship, Commander T. Elson, during her recent passage to North America, had a narrow escape from being destroyed by fire, the captain's steward having accidentally set fire to a store in the cockpit, adjoining the ship's magazine, on the afternoon of the 29th July. He had been absent from it about twenty minutes without being aware of the dangerous position in which his light had been placed, and had it not been that the purser's steward providentially went to the purser's store about that time, to issue provisions to the troops on board for the ensuing day, the whole of the passengers and crew of this fine vessel might have been blown up in the middle of the ocean, and not a human being left to account for the loss of so many lives and so much valuable property. The fire, it is very gratifying to state, was extinguished by the united efforts of five individuals, and, by the judicious manner in which the commander acted on the occasion, the knowledge was confined to them alone during the rest of the voyage. Its occurrence has now, however, been made known to a larger circle, and great expressions of gratitude have been awarded to the men for their presence of mind under such trying circumstances, and for the manner in which they kept their secret.

Lieutenant Barton and Lieutenant Meech, of the Monarch line-of-battle ship died towards the end of June at Athens, of fever caught in the marshes, while engaged with other officers in the removal of Grecian antiquities to be sent to this country. They were buried with military honours, Sir Edward Lyons and General Church being present.

WOOLWICH, Wednesday.—[illegible] and seven o'clock on Tuesday evening, 439, including officers and men, of the Chatham division of Royal Marines, received orders to proceed immediately to Woolwich, under the command of Lieut.-Col. Stevens. The men, having been previously under orders to hold themselves in readiness, in case their services might be required, marched on the shortest notice to Gravesend, where they embarked on board a steam-vessel, and arrived at Woolwich at half-past three o'clock this morning. Late, or rather early, as the hour was, they were billeted on the various hotels and public houses, and the scenes that occurred in endeavouring to gain admission it is almost impossible to describe, the inmates, particularly the female branches, wringing their hands, and showing every symptom of despair, from a firm belief that the knocking at the door, and the voices of so many persons in the streets, could only proceed from a mob of Chartists or evil-disposed persons, and it was with the greatest difficulty the tired and hungry marines could gain admittance. They expressed themselves thankful to be admitted to the tap-rooms, where, after partaking of bread and cheese and beer, they were content with the hard forms and tables on which to repose. It was generally believed, although nothing was definitely known, that the Royal Marines were to perform the duties of the Lord Regiment, in the event of the services of that corps being required in the disturbed districts. This conjecture was realised between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, by the arrival of a route from the War Office, ordering all the effective men to march from Woolwich at half-past five o'clock on Thursday morning for London, and proceed by railway into Yorkshire. No specific town is named in the route, as further instructions will be issued on their arrival in that county for their guidance, according to the circumstances which may arise to require their services at any particular place. Very little baggage will be taken with the regiment, and all the recruits and sick, and the women and children, will remain at Woolwich. It is supposed the effective men will amount to upwards of 600, and they will be commanded by Colonel James Frederick Lowe, C.B. and K.H., their commanding officer. A troop of Horse Artillery is under orders to hold themselves in readiness, in case their services may be required at short notice.

COURT-MARTIAL.—The General Commanding-in-Chief has had the honour to lay before the Queen the proceedings of a general court-martial, held in Chatham barracks, on the 27th of June last, and continued by adjournment to the 2nd of July, for the trial of Ensign Samuel Walter Kirk, of the 18th Regiment, arraigned upon the undermentioned charges. [The charges (ten in number) are too voluminous for insertion. They all refer to gross irregularities in the prisoner's conduct.] Upon these charges the court found the prisoner guilty on the whole of the ten charges, with the exception of so much of them as charges him with conduct unbecoming the character of a gentleman, of which part of the charge the court therefore acquits him. The court having found the accused guilty of the whole of the charges exhibited against him, with the exception of so much of the additional charge as before stated, which, being in breach of the articles of war, does in virtue thereof sentence him, the said Ensign Samuel Walter Kirk, of the 18th Regiment of Foot, and acting Quartermaster of the provisional battalion, to be cashiered; and her Majesty was pleased to approve and confirm the finding and sentence of the court.—JOHN MACDONALD, Adjutant-General.

The sentence on 2nd Lieut. Geale, 5th Fusiliers, is, that he is to be publicly and severely reprimanded, and placed at the bottom of the list of officers of that regiment. His place, at present, is fourth on the list, and he loses four steps. The date of his commission is June, 1840.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT TO CAPTAIN BURDETT.—On Saturday morning last, while the 17th Lancers were performing their field exercise, under the command of his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, on Woodhouse-moor, an accident befel Captain Burdett, son of Sir Francis Burdett, which at first appeared to be of a very serious nature. During the movements, and when the troops were charging in line at full gallop, his Royal Highness in front, the "halt" was sounded, and in the confusion and jostling unavoidable on such occasions, Captain Burdett was thrown from his horse, the animal stumbling upon him. The unfortunate gentleman was so stunned by the fall, that he lay as if dead, and the utmost anxiety was felt by his Royal Highness and the officers of the regiment. After the lapse of a quarter of an hour, he was so far recovered as to be able to stand, and shortly after was conveyed to the barracks in a coach.—Leeds Mercury.

PORTSMOUTH, Sunday.—At an early hour this morning the 34th Regiment, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Airey, left this garrison, and proceeded by special train to London, whence it will be forwarded by the London and Birmingham and the Grand Junction Railways to Manchester and other towns in Lancashire, where it has been ordered to proceed to assist in putting down the disturbances now unhappily prevailing in that locality. A special message from the Horse Guards arrived here yesterday evening for the band under the colonel, and at eight o'clock this morning the regiment marched out of barracks, and proceeded to the Gosport terminus. The 71st Regiment marched in here from Chichester barracks on Wednesday and Thursday, and embarked on board the Resistance troop-ship. The 32nd Regiment will leave the garrison in a few days, and will be relieved by the 16th, now lying at Gosport. It is stated that the 32nd will proceed to Winchester, and occupy the barracks there. The 4th Lancers are expected to arrive in this garrison. The depôt of the Rifle Regiment abroad proceeded during the week to the Isle of Wight, where it occupies, in conjunction with the depôts of several other regiments, Parkhurst barracks, near Newport. The 65th Regiment, now lying at Plymouth, is expected here in a few days, as it is understood that it is one of the regiments which is ordered to replace the 32nd and 34th.

The 58th Regiment, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Senior, are hourly expected from Plymouth, to relieve the 34th Regiment, ordered to Winchester. The 32nd Regiment will also move to Woolwich, on the arrival of the 6th Regiment from Deal. The latter regiment will occupy Horton and Hasdar barracks; and the 16th, Cambridge and Forehouse barracks, now occupied by the 32nd.—Winchester Paper.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

COWES, ISLE OF WIGHT, August 12.—The Ida, from Amsterdam for Batavia, will come into the harbour to repair, being leaky.

AUGUST 13.—The East Indiaman Robert Small, Captain J. P. Scott, arrived off the Wight this morning. She left Calcutta May 1st, the Cape June 4th, and St. Helena June 23rd. She brought nearly thirty boxes of despatches, including Admiralty and Treasury despatches. The mails were conveyed by a pilot to Southampton, and arrived there just in time to be sent to town by the morning mail train. They were consequently delivered in London on Monday afternoon.

RAPIDITY OF STEAM NAVIGATION.—The British and North American royal mail steamer the Columbia sailed from this port on the evening of the 19th ult., and arrived at Boston early on the morning of the 1st instant. The Acadia left Boston on the afternoon of the 1st, and reached the Mersey in the forenoon of the 13th in bringing replies to letters dated Liverpool, July 19. The interval between sending the letters and receiving the replies to them was few hours more than 24 days. This is, we believe, the most rapid conveyance of letters between the Old and the New World ever known.—Liverpool Albion.

NEW YORK, Aug. 29.—The Ada, from St. Stephen's, New Brunswick, to Liverpool, went on a ledge in Passamaquoddy Bay, the 8th instant, but came off next tide, with considerable damage. The Fluminise (Brazilian brig) was wrecked on the 20th of October last, on Coretta Islands: master and fourteen men drowned, and one saved.

ST. HELENA, June 23.—The Helen, hence to the Cape, was wrecked on Nieu Point, Table Bay, the 20th ult. Crew saved.

PENZANCE, August 11.—The Earl of Devon (schooner) has been raised, and brought into harbour to-day.

SHIELDS, August 11.—The Tynemouth Castle, which was aground near the Black Middens, came off on this evening's tide, and was brought into the harbour.

QUEBEC, July 18.—The Marquis Wellesley, for Dublin, which sailed on Wednesday last, grounded in the Traverse, but was got off, and has been brought back to this port.

July 23.—A brig, in distress, with loss of mainmast, and under double-reefed foretopsail, was passed in latitude 36, longitude 74 3, by the Fanwico, arrived at ——; the sea being rough at the time, could render no assistance. A large ship, with lead-coloured bends, painted ports, with loss of maintop-gallant-mast and maintopmast head, was passed on the 13th in latitude 35 25; next day saw the wreck of a ship, bowsprit, topmast, &c., gone, the deck strewed with the carcases of dead cows, sheep, and horses; the bottom frame of a vessel, a large galley, painted dark green, supposed to belong to some large ship, lost or foundered in the late gales, by the Sea-flower, arrived at Georgetown, South Carolina.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—GLOUCESTER, MONDAY, AUG. 15.
CROWN COURT
(Before Mr. Justice Erskine.)

A man of the name of Adams was placed at the bar, charged with having sold an infamous publication, containing a blasphemous libel against the Christian religion. The words in which it was couched will not admit of our repeating it.—Mr. Alexander conducted the prosecution on the part of the Crown, and Mr. Thomson defended the prisoner.—Mr. Justice Erskine, in summing up, directed the jury to inquire whether they were satisfied that the words, as alleged in the indictment, and as proved to have been contained in the publication sold by the prisoner, were intended to bear the meaning and construction implied in the innuendoes, and were intended to bring into contempt the Christian religion, the Holy Scriptures, and our blessed Saviour. The Christian religion is the foundation of our law, and no functionary is admitted to any office connected with its administration without being first required to take an oath, which oath derives all its efficacy from that veneration which is due from us all to our holy religion. It is quite possible, however, that a man may be a hardworking, industrious, moral man, and yet, entertaining opinions adverse to Christianity, may think that he is advancing the cause of those who think with him by giving publicity to his doctrines. The learned judge concluded his observations by directing the attention of the jury to the evidence they had heard, and without a moment's hesitation they returned a verdict of Guilty through the foreman, who expressed his own and their abhorrence of the details that had been necessarily elicited.

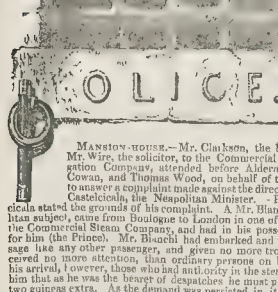
The next case called on was that of the Socialist Holyoak, who stood charged with having uttered certain blasphemous expressions at a meeting held at the Mechanics' Institute, at Cheltenham, on the 24th of last May. In appearance he is a thin miserable-looking lad, and although he asserted the contrary, he does not seem, either from his demeanour, his language, or his articulation, to have ever had the benefit of the most ordinary education. He took the opportunity afforded him of making his defence, to dilate at great length in praise of Socialism, and to express his conviction in the non-existence of a Deity, which he protracted in the same dull, incoherent, and discordant strain until nearly ten o'clock at night, an audience being occasionally somewhat relieved by the perusal of quotations from nearly thirty different writers; but, unfortunately, the prisoner had adopted a pronunciation and accentuation so peculiarly his own, that we were in most cases wholly unable to detect the meaning, and even when that was practicable, it was almost impossible to discover what relation the subjects, which he thus abruptly introduced, bore to the charge of blasphemy, which had been preferred against him. Suffice it, however, to observe, that he met with a most patient and attentive hearing, both from the learned judge and an intelligent jury, who, after a careful and impartial summing up, which occupied more than an hour, fully convicted the prisoner of the heinous offence imputed to him. Mr. Justice Erskine then passed upon him sentence of imprisonment for six months, during which it is to be hoped, he will have ample opportunity of reflecting upon the enormity of his guilt, and of discovering the futility of the impious doctrines which he had the effrontery to avow.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.—WELLS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 12.
HAWKINS v. PRATT.

The action arose upon the right to certain rooms in Sharpham-park, which Mr. Hawkins had occupied and ornamented as a sub-tenant of Mr. Laver, who occupied the property as a farmer of the Earl of Cavan. The executors of Mr. Laver upon his death, as was stated and in part proved, had claimed the rooms as belonging to that individual, and in the assertion of that right had knocked about the furniture, pictures, and wine of Mr. Hawkins, which had given rise to every species of action, trespass, not, trover, and assault.—Verdict for plaintiff, subject to a reference, and a verdict of acquital of Mr. Hawkins as to assault and riot.

DEVIZES, MONDAY, AUGUST 15.

The commission for holding the assizes in the county of Wilts was opened here by Mr. Justice Wightman. The business was particularly heavy, there being twenty-two civil causes, and upwards of seventy prisoners for trial. There has been a general complaint as usual about the court here. The ventilation is so bad that it has been necessary to take out every pane of glass, in order to render the courts in the least degree bearable.



MANSION-HOUSE.—Mr. Clarkson, the barrister, and Mr. Wire, the solicitor, to the Commercial Steam Navigation Company, attended before Alderman Sir John Cowan, and Thomas Wood, on behalf of that company, to answer a complaint made against the directors by Prince Castelcicala, the Neapolitan Minister. Prince Castelcicala stated the grounds of his complaint. A Mr. Bianchi, a Neapolitan subject, came from Boulogne to London in one of the vessels of the Commercial Steam Company, and had in his possession a letter for him (the Prince). Mr. Bianchi had embarked and taken his passage like any other passenger, and given no more trouble, and received no more attention, than ordinary persons on board. Upon his arrival, however, those who had authority in the steam-vessel told him that as he was the bearer of despatches he must pay the sum of two guineas extra. As the demand was persisted in, it was paid, and it was for restitution application was now made.—Mr. Clarkson said that every country on the face of the earth which sent despatches to England was in the constant habit of paying the charges of which his Excellency complained. It could also be proved that the Dover steam-boats made similar charges, and that even the English messengers never hesitated to pay the same amount upon bringing over despatches. Of all this the Prince had been informed by the company. Mr. John Bleaden, secretary to the Commercial Steam Navigation Company, stated that it was the custom, when any messenger, either public or private, brought despatches to this country, to charge him two guineas extra. The charge was never refused, and the English as well as foreign messengers paid it. Sir John Cowan: How long has the custom existed?—Witness: Five years. Ever since the company began to run to and from Boulogne.—Mr. Martin Pratt, (secretary to the General Steam Navigation Company) stated that he had examined the books of the company; that two guineas were usually charged messengers with despatches since the company had begun to run to and from Boulogne, about five years ago. It was understood at the Foreign Office.—Prince Castelcicala: In the case of the Sardinian Consul, the two guineas received by the General Steam Company were refunded.—Mr. Clarkson: In that case the fact was, that one or two gentlemen who were anxious to be treated with distinction, and were desirous of more than ordinary accommodation, stated that they had despatches, and the additional demand was of course made, and refused. However, when it was represented that they were not the bearers of despatches, the company would not insist upon detaining the money, although the trick deserved some punishment of the kind.—Prince Castelcicala said he did not feel by any means satisfied at the explanation he had received, and declared that the company were not at all justified in keeping the two guineas. If the Lord Mayor had no power to interfere, he (the Prince) certainly would not have persevered in his application for redress, but would have gone to another court.—Mr. Clarkson: If your Excellency continues to entertain the opinion that you are right, we will give you an opportunity of trying the question by insisting upon the same amount from the next messenger who brings despatches to you.—Sir John Cowan said the Lord Mayor had, from a spirit of courtesy, written to the company in the hope that a satisfactory explanation would be made. His lordship, however, had no jurisdiction in the case. He (Sir J. Cow n) believed the company were justified in enforcing payment.—Alderman T. Wood expressed a similar opinion. The messengers received extra accommodation, it was evident, and must naturally submit to an extra charge. The Prince then retired.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—Thomas Fletcher and John Burke were brought before Mr. Traill on Tuesday, charged with creating a disturbance in the Victoria Theatre. A constable attached to the theatre stated, that on the preceding night, the defendants, who were in the gallery, excited a disturbance by the violence of their conduct. They at first began to hiss, and on being requested to desist, they insulted those who were in the vicinity of the place where they sat, and it was obvious that they came there for the purpose of creating a disturbance. At length they became so noisy, that it was impossible for the audience to hear what was going forward on the stage; in addition to which, they flung some oyster shells into the pit, and it was only a matter of astonishment that some of the persons there were not severely injured. When the constable made his appearance and insisted on the removal of the defendants, they expressed their determination not to quit the house, and it ultimately required three men to eject them from the gallery and lodge them in the station-house, on the way to which place, they made the most vigorous attempt to escape, but were ultimately locked up.—The magistrate said that the conduct of the defendants was violent in the extreme, and might have caused mischief in such a place as a theatre; and that the fact of one of them throwing some oyster-shells into the pit, which might have occasioned the death of some person, could not be too severely reprobated.—The defendants pleaded intoxication as the cause of their misconduct.—The magistrate inflicted heavy penalties on the defendants, and in default of payment, committed them.

WANDSWORTH.—On Tuesday, the Rev. S. Aldhouse, late evening preacher at Aldallow's, London-street, City, was brought before Mr. Paynter for re-examination, upon a charge of intermarrying with Hephzibah Roberts, his first wife, Francis Aldhouse, being still alive. The case seems to have excited a very considerable degree of interest; and although this court is some distance from the town, by means of cabs and other conveyances, a great number of respectable people came from town to witness the proceedings. The court during the hearing was densely crowded. Mr. Field, solicitor, of Clapham, appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Bowditch for the defence. The prisoner was first charged at this court on the 3rd instant, and on that occasion certificates, being the actual copy of parish register entries, were given in, proving that in the first instance he married and had solemnized between Stephen Aldhouse and Frances Morse, otherwise Montague, in St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, in 1824, and in the second, that a

Rev. Stephen Aldhouse, clerk in holy orders, and widower, and Hephzibah Roberts, widow, had been married at St. James's Clerkenwell, in the year 1838. The second marriage and identity of the prisoner were proved by Mr. Jones, the father of the second wife. Correspondence that ensued between Mrs. Roberts, the second wife, and Mr. Aldhouse, was produced to afford a presumptive proof of the first wife's existence prior to and ever since the marriage. At the second examination, which took place on the 6th instant, Mr. Lapoid proved the first marriage, and Miss Owen, a lady residing at Hampton, proved the existence of the first wife up to that time. After a protracted examination to prove the foregoing, Mr. Paynter asked Mr Morse if the money Mrs. Aldhouse now enjoyed was settled upon her at the time of her marriage?—Mr. Morse: No, sir, it was left her in the will.—Mr. Paynter here observed the case had now occupied nearly the whole time allotted for his sitting in that court on one day, and although he had hoped to complete it that day, he must, of necessity, put off the remainder of the case to another day.—Mr. Bowditch said he had bail ready for acceptance: Mr. Frederick Aldhouse, brother to the prisoner, and another person.—Mr. Field said he should object to bail being taken. Prisoner: You were kind enough to point out at the last examination to my opponents, when their case was weak, what evidence they should get to strengthen it; may I claim your indulgence for myself, and ask where I can benefit myself? Mr. Paynter: Why, the line of defence is very good that you have adopted. You have only to prove that you were not aware that your wife was alive up to seven years before your marriage with Mrs. Roberts. The further hearing of the case was then adjourned until Tuesday next, when the deposit would be formally taken, and the prisoner will be fully committed for trial.

It is rumoured that Templeton, our first English tenor singer, is in treaty with either of the managers of the patent theatres. Nothing could give us greater pleasure than to hear of his re-appearance here, for, indeed, he is sadly wanted, and will be warmly welcomed.

A letter from Gibraltar, in the Madrid journals of the 5th inst., states that an English war-steamer lying there was laden with 400 barrels of gunpowder, had taken fire, but fortunately it was extinguished before the powder was reached.

REMARKABLE AND UNPRECEDENTED FACT.—RAPIDITY OF STEAM NAVIGATION.—The British and North American royal mail steamer the Columbia sailed from the Clyde on the evening of the 19th ult., and arrived at Boston early on the morning of the 1st inst. The Acadia left Boston on the afternoon of the 1st, and reached the Mersey in the forenoon of the 13th inst., bringing replies to letters dated Liverpool, July 19. The interval between sending the letters and receiving the replies to them was a few hours more than 24 days! This is, we believe, the most rapid conveyance of letters between the Old and New World ever known.—Liverpool Albion.

Melody floats on the evening breeze
When birds are singing in leafy trees;
Sweet is the sound of the silver rill,
When "the moon is watching on the hill,"
And nought is heard in the quiet vale
Save the warbling of the nightingale.
Musical too is the wind-harp's tone,
When zephyr is sighing its chords among;
And dulcet notes from the sweet lute rung
When the minstrel sweeps the golden string
There's melody in the deep blue waves,
That hoarsely murmur in ocean caves;
But no music on earth the soul can move,
Like the voice of affection from those we love.

Fair are the tints which the sweet flowers wear,
When light and warmth are in summer air;
Or when they blossom in mossy glades
And shed their perfume 'mid silent shades,
Beauty is bright on night's spangled vest
When the winds have lulled the day to rest;
And gentle eve, with her starry train,
Brings back the hour for dreams again.
Loveliness glows on the sunny sea,
O'er which the white birds skim merrily,
"Creating the billows like silvery foam,"
And then "wheeling away to their cliff-built home,"
But no beauty on earth the soul can move,
Like the look of affection from those we love.

WOMAN'S AFFECTION.

Sir Robert Barclay, who commanded the British squadron in the battle of Lake Erie, was horribly mutilated by the wounds he received in that action, having lost his right arm and one of his legs. Previously to his leaving England, he was engaged to a young lady, to whom he was most tenderly attached. Feeling acutely, on his return, that he was a mere wreck, he sent a friend to the lady, informing her of his mutilated condition, and generously offering to release her from her engagement. "Tell him," replied the noble girl, "that I will joyfully marry him, if he only has enough of body left to hold his soul."

THE ROMANTIC INNKEEPER.

At Rochabers, Murray, the innkeeper, who retired from business this year, was originally a foundling, and never had a guess of his own history; but all his life he annually received a blank cover containing £50. Now, there is a ready-made novel for you at once! According to all the rules of romance, he must some day find himself out to be, at least, a peer. I wonder what titles and estates will unexpectedly prove his!—Miss Sinclair.

DAY-DREAMS.

A man may be mentally as well as physically intoxicated, and this is the case with your confirmed castle-builder, who, it is no exaggeration to say so, is never sober for a week together. There are, however, some splendid exceptions to this rule. Napoleon, according to Bourrienne, was in early life a castle-builder, so also was Scott; nevertheless, both these great men had the full and unclouded possession of all their faculties, and were not less remarkable for a salient tenacity, than for that undeviating steadiness and energy of purpose which derives fresh stimulus from difficulty, and bears down all opposition. Scott, in particular, never allowed his habits of romantic abstraction to interfere with the every-day duties of life. Thought in him did not overdo action. He was the master, not the slave of his imagination; the magician who commanded the tempest, not the witch who served him.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Stranger! whoe'er thou art, with rev'rence tread!
Lo! these the silent mansions of the dead!
His life of labour o'er, the wearied slave
Here finds at length, sweet quiet in the grave.
View not, with proud disd in, th' unsculptured heap,
Where injured innocence forgets to weep,
Nor idly deem, although no here are found
The solemn aisle and consecrated ground,
The spot less sacred:—o'er the turf-built shrine,
Where virtue sleeps, resides the Power Divine!

A GOOD ONE.

A boy was asked, "Does the leopard change his spots?" "Oh, yes, when he is tired of one spot he goes to another."

If a tree is felled, why has it no right to complain? D'ye give it up? Because it was axed whether it would stand or not.

A THOUGHTFUL HUSBAND.

A married lady, who was in the habit of spending most of her time in the society of her neighbours, happened one day to be taken suddenly ill, and sent her husband in great haste for the physician. The husband ran a short distance, but soon returned, exclaiming, "My dear, where shall I find you when I get back"

RELIGION, ONE OF THE NECESSITIES OF OUR NATURE.

We can hardly exist without it; and certainly not as rational beings ought to exist. To be without God in the world is hardly to be. Take the sun out of the firmament, and what remains but everlasting sterility and hopeless desolation? Take God or the idea of God, the solacing consciousness of an omnipresent deity, out of the human soul, and what is life but a continual dreariness, gone on without joy, and terminating without hope? But, happily for man, the Father of the universe has so constituted human nature that it is full of antagonisms to atheism. Its primary tendencies are not to a chilling scepticism, but to a warm, glowing, animated, and animating belief.—Dr. Fellowes's Lectures.

taken by the mob to prevent the factories being started this morning at the usual time. However, on one of the bells being rung at a little before six o'clock, the mob, which had assembled a short time previously in Chadwick's Orchard, marched towards the North-road, and the first factory they came to was Messrs. Catteral and Co.'s, whose hands they turned out, and then proceeded to Mr. F. Sleddon's, where preparations had been made for resisting the mob. A stout resistance was made, Mr. Sleddon himself being on the spot; but they were overpowered by the immense numbers after some hard blows had been dealt out. Mr. Sleddon was slightly hurt in the affray, and a large number of squares in the factory windows were smashed. The mob then went to the factories at the west end of the town, and such as were at work were compelled to relinquish it. At Mr. Dawson's factory a few squares of glass were broken. By this time the mob had increased most wonderfully, and included a very large proportion of women and children; but its general appearance had a more threatening aspect than at any time during yesterday. When these proceedings were going on, the mayor and magistrates assembled at the Bull Inn, where the town-clerk joined them, and it was determined to proceed to meet the rioters. This was at eight o'clock; and the public functionaries, accompanied by the detachment of the 72nd, went down Fisher-gate, and met the mob near Lune-street. The rioters opened two divisions for the purpose of the military passing through; but the orders were to let no one pass. The mob then proceeded down Lune-street, followed by the military, and when near the Corn Exchange, halted. The Riot Act was then read; and chief-constable Woodford, and Mr. Banister, superintendent of police, endeavoured to persuade the mob to retire, for fear of consequences; and while so engaged, one of the rioters aimed a stone so surely at Captain Woodford, that it felled him to the ground, and then there had the brutality to kick him. Immense bodies of stones were now thrown at the police and soldiers, many of the former being much hurt; and part of the mob having gone up Fox-street, they then had the advantage of stoning the military from both sides. Under these circumstances, orders were given to fire; the military immediately obeyed, and several of the mob fell. This did not appear to have much effect, for one fellow named Lancaster came out in front of the mob, and when in the act of lifting his hand to throw a stone, was singled out by one of the 72nd, who fired, and he fell. This appeared to put a damper on the proceedings of the mob, and they began to separate, the mayor, military, and magistrates coming up the street. It is scarcely known how many have been wounded, but it is supposed from 12 to 15, some of them mortally. Five have been taken to the House of Recovery; and in the course of the morning one of the five had his leg amputated above the knee, the bone being completely splintered by the ball. A lad was shot through the wrist, the ball grazing his side. It is believed his hand must be amputated. One man was shot in the back, where the ball still remains in the bone, and it cannot be extracted. Two are shot through the chest, and one is in an exceedingly dangerous state. There is also one man shot through the bowels, which protrude in a shocking manner, and he is in a most precarious state. The medical gentleman who has been engaged to attend the sufferers states that he thinks four of the wounded will not recover. As may be expected, very considerable excitement prevails. Large posting-bills have been stuck up to announce that the Riot Act has been read, and that people are forbidden to be seen about the streets in groups.

HAYWOOD.

At an early hour on Friday morning, upwards of 3000 persons from Bury entered the town. A meeting was held near St. James's Church, after which the party paraded the streets to see if any were working; the machinery in the whole of the thirty-three cotton mills in the town was at a complete stand. The procession from Bury went towards Rochdale and Bagslate; shops were generally shut up and business at a stand.

TODMORDEN.

After the meeting at Todmorden and Rochdale, it was decided to send delegates to the townships of Colne, Padiham, Burnley, and their vicinities, for the purpose of obtaining the co-operation of the people of those places in the present movement. Delegates were also despatched with a similar object to the different towns in Yorkshire; and we learn by a private letter from Wakefield, that it is the intention of the colliers to make a general strike on Saturday evening. We learn from all our correspondents that at every meeting it has been said by the speakers—"The Anti-Corn-Law League have caused us to make this movement, but it is our own fault if we do not get more than they think; we will have the Charter, and not be deceived by the middle classes on this question as on the Reform Bill."

LEES AND SADDLEWORTH.

On Friday morning, a large meeting of the operatives was held at Lees, at the conclusion of which a procession was formed, which proceeded to a place called Trenches; and here they were joined by a similar procession from Moseley, and a second meeting was held. After several addresses had been delivered, it was resolved that the meeting should again form into procession and proceed to Upper Mills, for the purpose of getting the operatives there to join them. This was done, and the mills in that place having been stopped, and being joined by another party from Staleybridge, another meeting was held in the Market-place. There could not be less than 10,000 persons present, but no breach of the peace occurred.

ROCHDALE.

On Friday morning, at six o'clock, a meeting, consisting of 4000 or 5000 persons, was held on Cronkeyshaw. The meeting was addressed by various operatives, after which a procession was formed, which proceeded to Bacup, where they instantly compelled the hands in the cotton and woollen mills to give up work. The whole of the hands in the cotton and woollen mills, and operatives of every description for miles round, have ceased to work, and business is at a complete stand.

BURY.

On Friday morning a party left the town at an early hour, for the purpose of stopping the establishments in Elton, Tottington and the other out-townships. To secure compliance with their views, the visiting parties adopted the expedient of driving out the plugs of the steam-boilers. They were, in no instance of which we have heard, resisted in their progress.

MACCLESFIELD.

A procession, which left Stockport on Thursday morning, were joined at Poynton and neighbourhood by parties from Oldham, Ashton, Hyde, &c. At Hazlegrove they were joined by numbers of silk-weavers, and at Poynton the colliers were compelled to leave off work, and readily joined the mob. They then proceeded on towards Macclesfield, but before arriving they again separated, one party taking the road to Bollington, on arriving at which place the three mills there situate were immediately stopped, and the hands turned out. At Mr. Swindle's mill the boiler fires were put out, and the boilers emptied. The shopkeepers in the neighbourhood were visited, and gave bread liberally. No outrage was committed. The party then went on to Macclesfield, on their arrival at which place all the mills were stopped by the party that had left them on the way. The silk-weavers had turned out for an advance of wages on the previous evening, but none of the engines were stopped before the arrival of the mob. All the shops and public-houses were closed; but the crowd had bread given them from various chamber windows. The mills have been all stopped. The mob, to the number of 12,000 or 14,000, assembled on Park-green, and were addressed by various speakers, when it was determined to stand out and wait the direction of the conference to be held in Manchester on Wednesday.

BOLTON, FRIDAY, SEVEN O'CLOCK P.M.

About five o'clock a party of colliers, about 100 in number, armed with bludgeons, &c., from the coal-mines in the neighbourhood, entered the town, and immediately went to the mill of Messrs. Lumsmith and Bell, where they made the hands leave their employment.

TUESDAY EVENING.—The mob, which had not hitherto paid Bolton a riotous visit, entered the town this day. They were armed with bludgeons, and immediately proceeded to clear the streets of passengers. They then stopped every factory and workshop in the town. It is supposed they came from Wigan.

STOCKPORT.

There are upwards of 20,000 persons out of employment in this place, who have no resources but those of plunder and beggary. On Saturday fourteen of those who took a conspicuous part in the riot and breaking open of the workhouse were committed to the next Chester assizes for trial. The deluded men will have to remain six months in prison before their cases can be heard. Meetings continue to take place on the Waterloo-road, which are attended by many thousand persons. They are addressed by Doyle, Ellis, and other agitators. In their speeches yesterday they stated that the Tories, the Church, and the bishops, had caused the present state of things, and advised them to go round to all the shopkeepers to solicit alms. On Thursday morning a large body of rioters from Hyde invaded Stockport, and succeeded in turning out the people employed in the mills, hat-manufactories, print-works, &c. They were afterwards reinforced by large bodies from the neighbourhood, and held a meeting of very formidable appearance. Owing, however, to the presence of the Altrincham, Dunham, Massey, Tabley, and Stockport troops of the Cheshire Yeomanry, the peace was fortunately preserved. The more remarkable features of the proceedings in Stockport were the extortion of money from mill-owners as well as shopkeepers, and an attack on the New Union Workhouse, Shaw-heath, where the mob forced an entrance, and immediately commenced to help themselves to bread and money. No fewer than 672 seven pound loaves were taken away, and about £7 in copper. Information of this was conveyed to the authorities, and they hastened to the spot with the constables, yeomanry, and infantry, and captured about forty of the rioters, several of whom, however, were subsequently rescued. This occurred on Wednesday, and Thursday was spent in speechifying, parading Stockport, and planning future movements. On Friday morning the great body of the Stockport rioters started for Macclesfield, expecting to be joined at Poynton by the Ashton and Hyde turn-outs. All business at Stockport and the neighbourhood is effectually stopped. They talk at the district meetings of a conference to be held in Manchester on Wednesday next, at which ulterior proceedings are to be decided on.

BURSLEM, SATURDAY.

During the whole of yesterday and this morning the town has been in a state of great excitement and alarm, in consequence of a second visit of a body of colliers to Burslem. Immediately after the attack on the "lock-up," and the rescue of the prisoners, accompanied with the destruction of property on Saturday night last, a troop of the 1st Dragoons, under the command of Major Jones, was despatched for the protection of the town, and they arrived here on Monday last. Everything, however, remained quiet, and the authorities entertaining no apprehension of further disturbances, the troops were ordered to march for Manchester yesterday morning, and they accordingly left Burslem at eleven o'clock.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.—I mentioned briefly yesterday the loss of three lives at Hanley; it would appear that the fatal affray took place at Burslem. On Tuesday morning, between ten and eleven o'clock, a mob from Leek (about twelve miles distant) entered Burslem, where the only military force in the neighbourhood was stationed, consisting of about fifty of the 1st Dragoons, under the command of Captain Powys. These troops were drawn up in the principal street, to prevent the mob entering the town, and the officer, addressing the rioters, told them they could not pass, and that they had better retire. He was answered by stones and brickbats, some of which struck and hurt the soldiers, who, finding that the mob continued to attack them, at length fired, and, according to accounts, three men, as I yesterday stated, were killed. One of them was the most active of the mob. Five or six others were wounded, and conveyed to the infirmary. There is no doubt, however, that many others were wounded. Thus repulsed at Burslem, the rioters appear to have proceeded to Hanley, where, during the rest of the day, they continued to plunder the shops, including even the pawnbrokers' shops, and the greatest terror prevailed. Persons going from Burslem to Hanley, observed the road on each side lined by some thousands of the turn-outs. Scenes of the most awful character followed. During the night the mob, on their return, visited Shelton Hall, the residence of the Bishop, which the rioters surrounded and destroyed. Having forced an entrance into the house, they set about the work of destruction, demolishing windows and furniture, and finished by setting fire to the premises. After this they visited the various residences before mentioned. The mob which entered Burslem this morning consisted of about 5000 persons, and the Dragoons were drawn up to receive them. The Dragoons cleared the streets. The insurgents are chiefly strangers, and, had it not been for this interference, there would have been no disturbance in the Potteries.

COVENTRY.

SATURDAY EVENING, FIVE O'CLOCK. — Last night delegates arrived here from Lancashire and Staffordshire, and immediately proceeded to the coal-pits near and around Bedworth, to the Charity Wyken, Victoria, and Wheildon pits; in fact, they visited all the pits in this district, and have succeeded in making all the men turn out. There have been no exhibitions of violence, except the cutting of one of the ropes that conduct the baskets down into the pit. All the men are requested to sign a declaration not to work any more until they have attained their object, but I understand the declaration also binds them not to use unlawful means. The men are expected to arrive in Coventry either to-night, or in the course of to-morrow.

STRIKE OF THE COLLIERS AT WHITWICK, NEAR LEICESTER.

The colliers at these coal-pits, which are situated about fourteen or fifteen miles from Leicester, turned out in great numbers on Saturday.

MONDAY NIGHT.—This morning an express arrived at Leicester, for the attendance of the Yeomanry Cavalry at Whitwick, and also of the county police, in consequence of an anticipated rising among the colliers employed in that neighbourhood.

DESTRUCTIVE RIOTS IN THE POTTERIES.

BIRMINGHAM, Tuesday Evening.—Accounts were received in Birmingham to-day of most destructive riots in the Potteries. A meeting took place on the Crown-bank, near Shelton, yesterday morning. The colliers were called together by the Chartists at eight o'clock, for the purpose of enforcing the necessity of standing out until the Charter was granted. The meeting was numerously attended, and the resolutions were carried unanimously. Cooper, the chief of Mr. Sturge's Chartist orators at Nottingham, was the principal spokesman. The work of destruction commenced soon after the termination of the meeting. Immediately after the meeting a body of colliers proceeded to the colliery of Lord Granville, where they found some of the men at work, and, after ducking them, and stopping the engines, and turning out the potters at the different manufactories, they entered the house of Mr. Gibbs, the poor-rate collector, where they took all the rate-books, and completely destroyed them. They next proceeded to the Police-office, which they attacked, cleared the office of all the staff, and released the prisoners. They then proceeded in the direction of Stoke, and entered the Court of Requests, violently assaulted the clerk, who was much injured, completely ransacked his house, and destroyed the whole of his furniture. The whole of the books of the office were torn up; and, after completing this demolition, they proceeded to the Spittles, at Stoke, where they destroyed the whole of the rate books. They went to the Police-office, and seized Superintendent Stonier, who was much hurt in the skirmish. Afterwards they attempted to set fire to the office, but it was put out before any injury was done. They next went to Fenton, and undoubtedly would have proceeded to mischief, but the town was under the protection of the military. There can be no doubt that the Chartist leaders are the instigators of the disturbances. After ten o'clock last night the outrages were renewed to a fearful extent. The mob attacked the house of the Rev. Dr. Bayley, of Lane-end, completely gutted by fire and destroyed the whole furniture. Afterwards, the house of the Rev. Mr. Aitken, of Hanley, was similarly sacrificed, which was completely demolished. Not a particle of timber was left. Mr. Parker, a magistrate, a man of fortune, retired from business and residing at Hanley, was similarly treated. His house was completely gutted. Mr. Rose's (the stipendiary magistrate) house was also destroyed. Persons coming from the Potteries to-day describe the state of things in those neighbourhoods as most alarming. From Burslem to Hanley, a distance of two miles, the crowd of men and women assembled on the roadside was dense, and it was feared that the direst consequences would ensue. The absence of the military, or what would otherwise appear to be the neglect of the authorities, ought to be noticed. On the Monday night it was rumoured that the disaffected in the adjoining counties of Derby and Chester had made Leek a point d'appui, and that there was to be the grand central point of assemblage and march. The troops from the Potteries were consequently marched off, and in their absence, as on Sunday last, the evil-disposed colliers broke out into the commission of the outrages briefly described above. The troops returned from Leek at eight o'clock this morning, and, although the neighbourhood was in a state of great excitement, no further injury was done to property. Most providentially, amidst all this tumult and violence, not a single life was lost. It was rumoured that three men were shot at Hanley this morning by the military, and that the mob contemplated an attack upon the Duke of Sutherland's mansion, Trentham Hall, and also upon that of Mr. Alderman Copeland, in the immediate neighbourhood of Stoke.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT.—The mining districts of South Staffordshire continue quiet. The Wolverhampton races appear to have in a great degree eclipsed the interest of the colliers' strike, and, for the present at least, put a stop to the insurrectionary movement so prevalent during the last week. This morning additional troops passed through Birmingham to the disturbed districts.

WARRINGTON, WEDNESDAY MORNING.

All has remained quiet in this town up to the present. For some days a report has been very general of the intention of the discontented of Manchester and its neighbourhood paying a visit, and, in consequence, preparations on rather an extensive scale have been made for giving them a proper reception.

HALIFAX.

All the mills were stopped here on Monday.

LEEDS, TUESDAY, NOON.

All is yet quiet here, none of the disaffected from the cotton districts having made their appearance.

HUDDERSFIELD.

All the mills were turned off work at Huddersfield on Monday afternoon, a large party having come from Saddleworth, Oldham, &c., to effect that purpose. As the disaffected refused to leave the town, a charge was made upon them by a troop of the 17th Lancers and a body of 400 special constables. Several of the mob were wounded in the affray, but none seriously, and seventeen men and one woman were taken into custody. Amongst the prisoners taken were the ringleaders. The town was in the greatest commotion the whole of the day. The whole of the shops were shut up and no business done. The streets were effectually cleared about seven o'clock in the evening; but it was feared that an attempt would be made during the night to rescue the prisoners. The operatives of the mills stopped are evidently most of them willing to leave their work, and seem to understand, or have confidence in, the movements of the leaders, and to anticipate good from the issue of events. The colliers, in the whole of the West Riding, or nearly so, have struck work.

RIOT AT BLACKBURN.—THE MILITARY ORDERED TO FIRE.—TWO MEN SHOT.

We have just been favoured with a sight of two letters from Blackburn, from which we glean the following particulars:—The first letter is dated last evening, and states that there had been a general turning-out of hands there during the day. On coming before Messrs. Livesey and Hodgett's mill, a stout defence was made, and the crowd was beaten back by the military, consisting of two companies of the 72nd Highlanders. In the affray, Mr. Livesey, jun., was struck on the eye with a stone and received a severe laceration. A great many in the crowd hurled stones at the soldiers, and ultimately the position of the military was one of such peril that the officer deemed it necessary to give the command to fire. The discharge took effect, and the letter states that two persons fell dead on the spot, one being shot through the body. Several persons were also taken away wounded, but the entire number shot was not then known. The people instantly dispersed, and the soldiers succeeded in carrying off their prisoners. Further accounts received this evening from Blackburn state that about 40 prisoners have been taken into custody, and that four other individuals have been mortally wounded. After turning out the hands in the town, the mob proceeded towards Darwen, and turned out the hands there. This morning many of the factories resumed work, and will continue at their labour, unless the intimidating mob returns.

AUGUST 17.—Yesterday morning several of the mills, the hands of which had been turned out the previous day, resumed work, at least with as many hands as could be induced to go in. The shops throughout the town were again opened, and the shutters taken off. This state of things, however, did not long continue, the mob having again approached the town. The number of prisoners taken yesterday was eighty. The persons composing the turn-out mob were principally from the neighbouring towns of Bury, Padiham, Accrington, Burnley, Haslingden, and that district.

THREATENED DISTURBANCES IN DERBY.

On Monday last Derby was inundated with reports that the inhabitants were to be visited by a large number of those misguided men who have been instrumental in causing a general turn-out of the workpeople in Manchester and the neighbouring places. Why they refrained from so doing does not as yet very clearly appear.

ACCOUNTS FROM YORKSHIRE.

At Halifax all the mills are standing but two, and these are under the protection of the magistrates and the military Some rioting has taken place; and five or six of the most active of the mob were apprehended and committed to Wakefield House of Correction.

At Dewsbury, Cooper's-bridge, Brighouse, Elland, Sowerby-bridge, Hebden-bridge, Todmorden, and Rochdale, the thickly-populated manufacturing districts along the course of the railway from Leeds to Manchester, the mills are all stopped, and the workmen congregated in groups along the road-sides and in the streets. All trades are included in the general turn-out, and in some places even the schools are deserted.

CLITHEROE.

The hands in the different cotton-mills at this place were turned out by a large mob, which came principally from the neighbourhood of Burnley. No violence was used, nor was any damage done to property. It is understood that arrangements had been made for defending the extensive printworks of Messrs Thomson and Sons, 300 or 400 of whose workpeople have been sworn in as special constables.

WIGAN, TUESDAY EVENING.

A meeting was held this morning in the Scholes Orchard, at which about 1000 were present, consisting chiefly of the unemployed weavers and colliers of Wigan and the immediate vicinity. Soon after the mob came through the streets, shouting and hooting opposite the Town-hall, and flourishing their weapons in a threatening manner. A disturbance was apprehended, and every shop was closed, the Riot Act read, and the military got in readiness. However, the mob soon marched up Standishgate towards Chorley. The military followed to prevent their returning into town, and an encounter took place a little distance out of town, nine of the mob being apprehended. On their road to Chorley the mob stopped the paper-mills of Mr. T. B. Crompton, in Standish, and compelled the hands to cease from labour. Numerous are the complaints of parties who were disappointed of a dinner by the famished rioters. The Misses Woods, in Queen-street, were compelled to distribute all the hams they had in their possession; and it was rather amusing, if mirth could possibly exist at such a time, to observe the terrified inhabitants of our town distributing the food they had prepared for their own dinners. All business is at a stand. At half-past six o'clock the mob were expected back in the town, but measures will be adopted to prevent an entrance, if it be attempted.

GLASGOW.

At Mile End, near this city, a strike and turn-out took place amongst the power-loom weavers in the extensive factory of Messrs. Walker and Co. Several assaults took place; but the workmen had, with few exceptions, returned to their employment.

RUMOURED OUTBREAK. Various rumours of an unpleasant character were afloat on Tuesday. One report was, that the leaders of the working classes in London and the environs had determined on holding simultaneous meetings in various parts of the metropolis to consider how far, and in what manner, their interests stand affected by the "turn-outs" and suspension of labour in the manufacturing districts. Information to that effect was received at the head office of the metropolitan police in Great Scotland-yard in the course of the forenoon, and also that large and inflammatory bills, headed "Awful State of the Country," had been at an early hour of the morning extensively posted up at the eastern part of the town, calling a meeting of the working classes for this evening on Stepney-green, and a second meeting for next evening on Islington-green. Information of the intended meetings was immediately conveyed by the Commissioners of Police to Sir James Graham, and secret orders were immediately despatched by mounted expresses to every division of police, particularly in the suburbs, to report at five o'clock at Scotland-yard whether any assemblage of persons had taken place in any part of the divisional district, and also to remove as quickly as possible any inflammatory bills that might be already posted on the walls, and that all persons sticking such bills should be immediately taken into custody and conveyed to Bow-street, and the bills sent to the commissioners. During the afternoon the Commissioners of Police were in constant communication with the Home-office, and at six o'clock on Tuesday evening orders were issued to each of the divisions, excepting the H and K divisions, which are the nearest to Stepney-green, for 100 men to be in readiness at the principal station of each division, ready for instant service, should they be required; and at that hour 1600 constables were ready to act at any point where their presence ought be requisite. The battalions of the Guards still in town, the Life Guards, and 8th Hussars at Hounslow, were also ordered within barracks, and those at the Tower were last evening under arms.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. X.

SIR ROBERT H. INGLIS, M.P.

An ill-natured radical, with a turn for sarcasm, would perhaps, after listening to one of the speeches of Sir Robert Inglis, and surveying his rather portly and rubicund person, say that he is both mentally and physically a very fit representative of the "port and prejudice of the monks of Oxford." In so saying, he would prove his acquaintance with the celebrated sneer of Gibbon; but he would not be exactly just to the member for our ancient University. If strong feelings and earnest convictions can be construed into prejudices, there is no doubt but the member for Oxford is liable to the charge of being a prejudiced man; but if those convictions are entertained after earnest inquiry, then they hardly deserve so harsh a title; let us rather call them deeply-rooted opinions, which to no man entertaining them can be charged as a fault. Sir R. Inglis, then, is the representative of the opinions of the high church party. He is in the House of Commons what the bench of bishops is in the House of Lords—the advocate of the views, the interests, and the feelings of the Church of England. He is the organ of a class which is else unrepresented; for a clergyman of the Church of England cannot sit in the house, though the preachers and ministers of other denominations may. He presents the anomaly of a layman possessed of all the feelings and opinions of a priest, and this occasionally draws upon him the sneers or more direct attacks from the opposite party; sometimes even a sly hit from his own side, as when Mr. Gally Knight, during the present session, called him "a monk of the middle ages." But he by no means confines himself to what may be called church questions. He is ready to discuss any of the multifarious subjects that are started in the legislature; an important debate very rarely occurs in which he does not take part. He is a good speaker, possessing great command of language without being "wordy," and is occasionally, rather apt in his replies. No one can observe him without feeling that his language and manners are those of the gentleman and the scholar. The question of Church Extension was exclusively his own till the present session, in the course of which he has given it over into the hands of the Government, with whose policy, of course, he generally coincides. But on some particular points he has differed from it, as on the question of the suspension of the writs for the boroughs charged with political depravity, and subjected to Mr. Roebuck's inquisition.

SIR ROBERT H. INGLIS.

Sir R. Inglis sat for Dundalk from 1824 to 1826; in the latter year he was elected for Ripon, which he represented till 1828. It was at this period that the agitation of the Catholic Question was at its height, and there were evident symptoms that the ministry was wavering in its resistance to the measure. Sir R. Peel at that time represented the University of Oxford, and so great was the dissatisfaction of his constituents at the probable change in his sentiments, that the right hon. baronet accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, and vacated his seat, for the purpose of giving the University an opportunity of expressing their opinion by an election. In the contest which followed, one of the most remarkable perhaps that ever occurred in the annals of electioneering, Sir Robert Inglis was elected, and has continued to sit for the University ever since.

WALMER CASTLE, Wednesday.—The Marquis and Marchioness of Douro arrived from town on Thursday, on a visit to the Duke of Wellington for several weeks, and the castle is expected to be full of company the first week in next month.

WILL OF THE LATE LORD MANNERS.—The will of the above nobleman, whose decease, about six weeks ago, will be recollected, was proved on Monday last in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury The executors are Lord Charles Manners and the Rev. Thos. Manners Sutton, Sub-Dean of Lincoln; his lordship's widow, Lady Manners, being appointed ex executrix. The amount of personal property is sworn at under £250,000.

The two new taxing officers' places for the Court of Chancery, created by the late act as to the Vice-Chancellor's Courts, &c., have been filled up by the appointment of solicitors—namely, Mr Martineau and Mr. B. Follett—at salaries of £2000 a year each. These gentlemen will, as a matter of course, be prohibited from future practice.

We understand that Messrs. Macalister and Robinson, the financial agents of the United States, have left town for the Continent. We believe they will find the capitalists of Paris and Amsterdam, if possible, less disposed than those of London to listen to any overtures at present for an American loan.

THE OVERLAND MAIL FROM INDIA.—In consequence of the delay that is incurred by the transmission of the despatches through France, viâ Marseilles, from India and Egypt, by the new arrangements with the French Post-office department, and the complaints that are continually made by the London journals at their detention by the French Government, the Postmaster General has been for some time negotiating with the Directeur-General des Postes of Austria to have them transmitted viâ Trieste. Should this arrangement be concluded, several days will be saved by this route.

PROPOSED RAILWAY TO MALDON.—The advantage which the Eastern Counties Railway will confer upon the county of Essex, are about to be appreciated by the formation of a branch line of railway from the seaport town of Maldon to the town of Braintree, with a junction at Witham, so affording a rich and populous district the benefits resulting from railway communication.

DEATH IN A VAPOUR BATH.—(From the Journal d'Anvers.)—The proprietors of the French baths at Antwerp recently appeared before the Tribunal of Correctional Police to answer the charge of homicide by imprudence, in having caused the death of an elderly woman in their bath, by not taking proper precautions to prevent accidents. It appeared that on the 6th of June a widow, named Tailleur, about 70 years of age, was conducted to the Bains Français, in the Rue de Temple, by a countryman of hers, a German, for the purpose of having a vapour bath. He gave strict injunctions to the attendant to take great care of her, on account of her great age, and the fact of her being ignorant of the French language. The old lady was placed upon a sort of camp bedstead, which is found in all vapour baths, and left there by the attendant, after being informed by her as to the mode of admitting and turning off the steam. When the attendant returned, however, after the usual period of absence, she found the old lady stretched motionless upon the bedstead. She was, in fact, dead. Medical aid was immediately called, and the surgeons said, that death had been caused by pulmonary and cerebral congestion, produced by the admission of an excessive quantity of steam, which the deceased, in ignorance of the management of the bath, had not been able to shut off. The whole of her left side was scalded and burnt by the steam, and on the left cheek was a severe contusion, which she had received in falling, when, as it is supposed, she attempted to rise from the bedstead to open the bath door. These facts having been deposed to, the court fined each of the two proprietors of the baths in a penalty of 200f., besides ordering them to pay the costs of the suit.

There is now living in this county a man named Ripley, who for the last 80 years (without intermission) has taken out a hawker's licence, and has consequently paid to Government upwards of £200. This patriarchal hawker still travels the country, although he is now at the good age of 103 years. The above fact was related to Mr. Taylor, stamp distributor of this town, by a grandson of the aged Ripley, who exercises the same calling.—Sussex Advertiser.

POSTOONS.—An Austrian officer, named Birago, has invented a new system of throwing pontoons over rivers. It was tried a few days ago in the presence of the King of Wurtemberg on the Neckar, near Louisburg. A bridge, 250 feet in length, was completed in 35 minutes, and 400 pioneers, 100 infantry, a battalion of infantry, a battalion of artillery, and a regiment of cavalry passed over it in succession at accelerated paces.

SCANDINAVIAN NATURALISTS.—On the 16th ult., two steamers arrived at Stockholm, with naturalists from the adjoining regions. "They were," says a letter from Copenhagen, "received with every demonstration of cordial hospitality. They proceeded from this capital to Ystad, and thence, by the steamer, to Ganthiod, thus having the opportunity of seeing the Ystad, and then the town and castle of Calmar. The steamer anchored off Calmar, to enable the passengers to go ashore, and take a view of the old cathedral. The exterior is very imposing, but the interior exhibits many traces of modern repairs and restorations. The neat and pleasantly-situated town of Calmar, and the palace in which Queen Margaret resided, and where she signed the Calmar Union, were also examined with interest. The palace is now in a decayed state, and is used as a prison; the roof of the knights' hall, however, bears evident traces of former splendour. On Saturday evening the travellers passed Skajaergaard, from which place the telegraph communicated to Stockholm in the space of five minutes the intelligence that the steamers were in sight; and early on Sunday morning the travellers enjoyed the magnificent prospect afforded by the entrance into Stockholm. In the afternoon they visited the castle of Rosenthal, which, together with its beautiful surrounding scenery, excited their admiration. On the evening of the following day, the Danish, Swedish, and Norwegian savans assembled in the apartments of Baron Berzelius, in the university, where the foreign visitors had the opportunity of inspecting the valuable collections of the Swedish academy. On Wednesday, the scientific meetings (properly so called) commenced. They lasted six days. On Sunday there was a visit to Gripsholm, where there are many remarkable curiosities. On the Tuesday following, all the members of the meeting dined with his Majesty the King; and Wednesday and Thursday were spent in excursions to Skokloster and Upsala. Of the 319 scientific men assembled at these meetings, there were two from France, one from Griefswalde, two from St. Petersburgh, one from Helsingfors, and fourteen from Norway."

PHRENOLOGY IN GERMANY.—Whatever may be the case in England and in France, it would appear, by an article in the Heidelberg Journal, that phrenology has gained ground in some parts of Germany. We find that Mr. Coombe, of Edinburgh, has been lecturing at Heidelberg with extraordinary effect, and that at the close of his course a unanimous address of thanks was voted to him, and was immediately signed by some of the most eminent men of the place. There is the same enthusiasm for the science, it seems, in many other parts of the Grand Duchy of Baden.

PHRENOLOGY.—On one of the first days of last week, says the Gazette des Tribunaux, L——, an enthusiastic phrenologist, went to the commissary of police of his quarter of the city, and made the following declaration:—"I come, sir, to communicate to you suspicions I entertain with regard to the honesty of the femme-de-chambre of my wife, who has, I am convinced, been guilty of thefts, and I wish you to make the necessary inquiries." The magistrate asked the doctor to specify the circumstances which led to this conviction. "I have more stronger grounds than any such," replied the doctor; "for you must be aware that every day undeniable proofs occur to maintain phrenology among the very first of the positive and real sciences, and I have devoted myself so entirely to its study, that upon the mere inspection of a cranium, I am able, without the possibility of being deceived, to indicate the vices, the virtues, the passions, and the intellectual powers of the person to whom it belongs. Yesterday I caught our damsel dressing her hair at the toilet of her mistress; this was impertinent enough, but my dissatisfaction was increased into serious alarm, when, under her tresses, I saw the boss of robbery most prominently developed." The commissary of police told the worthy phrenologist that, whatever reliance he might place in his acumen and science, he could not, as a magistrate, take any measures against the young woman without a more specific charge. Dr. L. retired, by no means satisfied with the result of his visit. In three days more, however, he returned to the commissary, with a countenance elated with pride. He stated that, confident in the opinion he had formed of his servant, he had prevailed upon his wife that very day, upon his return home to give her undue warning; but, without waiting for the expiration of the week, the girl had taken herself off, carrying with her jewels and other valuable articles, worth at least 1200 francs, besides a handsome purse, containing twenty-seven napoleons. This, however, was not the only triumph the doctor gained from his science; for he added that, from the attentive examination he had frequently made of the forehead and countenance of the young femme-de-chambre, he discovered the most unequivocal signs of the love of family, and therefore he was not the slightest doubt that she had sought an asylum with her mother, her sister, or some other branch of her family. Upon this last prognostic the magistrate had no objection to act, and sent officers to the mother's abode to make the necessary searches and inquiries. Here, in fact, were found not only the thief of mighty boss, but every article stolen still intact. Thus the doctor had the triple satisfaction of establishing the extent of his own science in two irrefragable instances, and at the same time saving his wife from a very considerable loss. It is left for the girl, who is committed for trial, to appeal to her cranioscopic conformation, as indicative of an unconquerable propensity implanted by nature, and therefore as an extenuating circumstance.

NEW BALLOON.—La Presse states, that M. Leinberger, an ingenious mechanic of Nuremberg, is about to construct a balloon of metal, which he expects to guide as he pleases. For this purpose a subscription has been raised sufficient to cover the expenses of such a machine. This steam-balloon, which is in progress of construction, may contain from three to fifty persons, with provisions for fifteen days. Every precaution has been taken to prevent the possibility of accident from fire, explosion, or want of gas, and even should the balloon fall into the sea, its construction is such that it may continue to proceed through the water as rapidly as a steam-boat. As an ordinary balloon can traverse five hundred miles in twenty-four hours, the rapidity of a steam-balloon, whose wheel, similar to an Archimedean screw, will describe at each rotation a space of seven yards, must be considerably greater. Several skilful engineers, who examined this machine, have no doubt of the possibility of completing this new mode of transport, which hereafter will render useless high roads and railroads. The only difficulty will be where to place the custom-houses.

DR. PAYERNE'S PATENT.—Dr. Payerne has been lately making a number of experiments in the diving-bell belonging to the East and West India Dock Company, to prove the practical application of his process, now patented, for supplying life under water without communication with the external air. The Doctor has several times descended in the bell at the West India Import Dock, on one occasion, in the presence of Professor Vignoles, of Trafalgar-square, and accompanied each time by an engineer of the company and some of the divers usually employed in their submarine operations, to the bottom of the dock, about twenty-five feet, the Doctor having succeeded, to the perfect satisfaction of all present, not only in rendering the air contained in the bell pure and respirable for the inmates, but in obtaining the very important advantage of restraining the water from rising in the bell as it descends to a great depth, and thus allowing the workmen to carry on their operations with the greatest facility. The engineers of the company have given the Doctor certificates expressing their perfect satisfaction with the result of these experiments, and have kindly offered every facility for carrying out the invention.—[We are indebted to the directors of the Royal Polytechnic Institution for the introduction of Dr. Payerne to public notice. The fact is one which, amongst many others, redounds highly to their credit.—ED. I. L. N.]

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON AGAIN COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.—The re-appointment of his Grace the Duke of Wellington to the command of the army was announced in Tuesday's Gazette. His Grace was Master-General of the Ordnance from 1818 to 1827, when he succeeded his Royal Highness the Duke of York in the same high office he has been again called on to occupy. On being appointed First Lord of the Treasury in 1828, his Grace resigned the command of the army to Lord Hill, who has continued to fulfil the duties of the office up to the present time. Since 1794, with the exception of a short interval from 1809 to 1811, when Sir David Dundas commanded, this office has had three occupants—His Royal Highness the Duke of York, Lord Hill, and the Duke of Wellington. The latter is now in his 74th year, having been born on the 1st of May, 1769.

EARTHQUAKE AT CAPE HAYTI.—According to accounts from Cape Hayti (St. Domingo) of the 28th June, received at Bremen, another shock of earthquake took place on the 24th, which caused great terror, but no details are given.

One of the German papers gives us the first tidings of a new and most unexpected addition to the powers of the daguerreotype, that of producing natural colour, as well as form and chiaro scuro in all its splendour. The discoverer is a M. Tscarnig, of Munich; and, although we may feel some doubt as to the fact of a reproduction of colour on the plate to the extent asserted, there can be none as to the importance of such an addition to the powers of the Daguerreian process.

THE DYING FLOWER.

(Translated from the German of Ruckert.)

Hope! when spring returns anew,
He will find thee living still,
Autumn winds the leaves may strew,
Yet on trees sweet hope can feel.
In their buds a power unheard
Makes them hope till winter's past,
Till their sap again is stirr'd,
Till their green revives at last.

"Nay, I am no stalwart tree,
Living countless summers o'er,
When the chains of winter flee,
Weaving songs to spring once more.
I am but a flower to bloom,
Waken'd by the kiss of May,
Then to find a snowy tomb,
Where all trace must pass away."

Do not grieve, thou humble thing,
Though thou art a flower indeed;
For to all the plants that spring,
Has been given a living seed.
Death's dark portals may o'er thee break,
Scatt'ring all thy beauties wide;
From the dust thou wilt awake,
To a hundred multiplied.

"Yes, 'tis true, there will be seen,
Others, like me, ween I'm gone,
For the universal queen
Lives;—the single dies alone.
What I have been they may be,
But 'twill be myself no more.
Now's the only time for me;
None hereafter, none before.

"Though the sun, that with its flame
Fills me, may for them be bright,
Still my fate remains the same,
Dooming me to endless night.
Sun, upon yest there even now,
In the future as they be,
Why for me such looks hast thou—
Cold and from a cloudy sky?

"Ah, what trust in thee I placed,
When I woke, kiss'd by thy ray;
When upon thy face I gazed,
Till it stole my life away.
These few moments that I last
From thy pity shall be free,
Every leaf thou closing fast,
I will perish, shunning thee.

"Yet my pride thy power must own,
And its ice in tears must run;
Take my life, when it has flown,
It is thine, eternal sun.
Every trace of grief is driven
From my soul by thy soft fire;
For the blessings thou hast given,
Take my thanks, as I expire.

"Gales, that from the summer skies,
As I trembled, o'er me glanced,
Countless swarms of butterflies,
That around me ever danced;
Hearts that at my fragrance glow'd—
Eyes that at my hue were bright;—
All—yes, all to thee I owed,
Made by thee of scents and light.

"I adorn'd this world of thine,
Though the humble flower as I;
In the fields thou bad'st me shine,
As the stars in fields on high.
Still I breathe a parting breath,
"Tis no sigh—but speaks of love,
And I dart a glance in death,
On the world and heaven above.

"Thou the world's bright heart of fire,
Let me die in radiance drown'd;
Heaven, my verdant charms expire,
Spread thy blue pavilion round.
Breeze of morning, be thou blest,
Welcome, spring, thy glistening skies,
Without grief I sink to rest—
Without hope again to rise."

JOHN OXENFORD.

ANECDOTE OF DUPUYTREN.

(From the Court Gazette.)

In a science which rejects abstract ideas, and will not tolerate anything vague or indiscreet; in a science of facts, Dupuytren was a man of action. In him the genius of invention was less to be admired than his prodigious powers of application. The marvellous facility with which he played with the gravest cases, the fertility of his resources in the most desperately complicated, the promptitude of his glance, the infallibility of his judgment, and the firmness of his hand, made him the first practitioner in a science where practice walks hand in hand with theory.

The human heart in time becomes hardened to suffering; and, it must be confessed, notwithstanding the respect due to so great a name, that Dupuytren, more than any other man, allowed himself to consider life and human things with the most profound and distainful contempt. His disposition was harsh, proud, and despotic; he carried into the world the same rigorous and pitiless inflexibility which made his pupils and subordinates tremble in the hospital. Although he often dismissed patients with a celerity almost brutal, they were every day so numerous that the consultations frequently continued until after nightfall.

One day that they had been prolonged even later than usual, Dupuytren, exhausted by fatigue, was just going to take a little rest, when another visitor, who had arrived a little after the rest, appeared to request his advice.

He was a little old man, whose exact age it would have been difficult to guess. His fresh, plump, rosy face, which appeared as if it had never required the application of a razor, might almost have been called pretty; when younger he might have served as a model for the little cherubim, with their white wings, which, in pictures of the Virgin, are often represented as hovering over her. The wrinkles on his forehead were numerous, but slightly marked; his mouth was small, his nose was a small aquiline finely turned; his feet and hands, like the rest of his frame, were miniatures. In the blue eyes, in all the features, in all the gestures of this little being, appeared simplicity, mildness, and exquisite goodness.

There are some countenances on which the eye rests with satisfaction; it is not thus with the face in question, to which the beholder was irresistibly attracted, after looking for a short time on the calm and peaceful features of the little old man, one would almost feel better from the inspection. He held in his right hand a cane—the little creature was entirely dressed in black; as he bowed he showed his tonsure. He was a priest.

Dupuytren looked fixedly at him with a freezing expression—"What is the matter with you?" said he harshly.

"Sir," replied the priest mildly, "I must first beg your permission to be seated; my poor legs are rather feeble. About two years ago a swelling appeared in my throat; the medical man in my village (I am curé of * * * *, near Nemours) told me at first that it was nothing of importance; however, it increased, and at the end of five months the abscess opened of itself. I kept my bed for a long time without becoming any better, but was obliged to rise occasionally to perform my duty, having no assistance for the service of four villages; and"

"Show me your throat."

"If it is true," continued he, as he prepared to obey, "that my parishioners offered to go to * * * every Sunday to church, but they are much fatigued during the week, and have but that day to rest; and I thought it was not just that everybody should be inconvenienced on my account. The Archbishop spoke of sending me an assistant, and at length my parishioners would insist on my coming to Paris to consult you. I was some little time in making up my mind, for travelling is expensive, and there are a great number of poor in my village; but I was obliged at last to give way, and I took the diligence. Here is the wound, doctor," added he, holding his head aside.

Dupuytren examined it intently. The patient's throat presented a hole nearly an inch in diameter; it was very deep. It was a complicated case—an abscess of one of the maxillary glands, and an aneurism of the carotid artery. The wound was gangrened in several places. The case was so serious that Dupuytren was amazed that the sick man could remain erect. He opened the lips of the wound to their full extent, scrutinized it intently, pressed it on all sides—the patient did not even wince. When he had finished the examination, Dupuytren roughly turned back his head, which he held in his hands, and looking intently at him, said in a tone diabolically cruel, "Well, Mr. Abbé, with such a throat as that, you must die!"

The Abbé took the bandages, and wrapped up his throat without uttering a word, Dupuytren's eyes always fixed on him. When he had finished dressing his wound, the priest took five francs wrapped in paper from his pocket, and placed it on the mantel-piece.

"I am not rich and my parishioners are very poor, doctor," said he with an angelic smile. "Forgive me, if I cannot pay a consultation of Dr. Dupuytren more worthily; I am glad I have come to seek you; I shall at least be prepared for what I must now expect. Perhaps," added he, with extreme mildness, "you might have announced this serious matter with a little more precaution; I am 65, and at that age sometimes one's life is attached to life. But I am not offended with you; you have not surprised me. Indeed, I have long expected it. Farewell, doctor, I shall return and die in the presbytery." He left.

Dupuytren remained pensive. This soul of iron, this powerful genius was crushed like a fragile glass, by a few simple words of an old man, whom he had held sick and suffering in his large hands and whose misery he had sported with. In this weak and tottering frame he had encountered a firmer heart, a more energetic will, than his own; he had, in short, found his master. He darted towards the staircase; the little priest was slowly descending, leaning on the balustrade.

"Mr. Abbé," exclaimed Dupuytren, "will you come back for a minute?"

The Abbé returned.

"There is, perhaps, a means of saving you, if you will undergo an operation."

"Why, with the blessing of God, doctor," said the Abbé, quickly depositing his cane and hat, "I came to Paris for that purpose only. Operate, to be sure as much as you think proper."

"But the endeavour may be useless, and the operation must be long and painful."

"Never mind, doctor, operate; I will endure all. How delighted my poor parishioners will be."

"Well, you must go to the Hotel Dieu, to the Salle Saint Agnes. You will be well attended there; the sisters will not allow you to wan anything. Now I must rest to-night, and to-morrow, or the next day,"—

"I understand, doctor, and am much obliged to you."

Dupuytren then wrote a few words, and gave the paper to the priest, who immediately went to the hospital, where almost all the community attended to instal him in his little couch. Each of the sisters had sisters loaded him with pillows and syrups. The little priest did not know how to thank them sufficiently.

The next day but one five or six hundred pupils, who every day attended the practical lectures of the professor, were scarcely assembled when Dupuytren arrived. He instantly turned towards the priest, followed by his imposing hand, and the operation commenced. Dupuytren cut and slashed with the knife and scissors. His steel forceps probed the depth of the wound, and brought back the fibres, which he twisted, and afterwards tied; then the grating saw removed the carious fragments of the lower jaw. Sponges, repeatedly squeezed, yielded torrents of blood. The operation continued twenty-five minutes

The Abbé did not shrink or even utter a groan when all who surrounded him fell back at the same time breathless with attention and alarm, and Dupuytren said to him, "It is over!" The Abbé was rather pale

Dupuytren himself dressed the wound. "I think everything will go well," said he in a friendly tone; "did you suffer much?"

"I endeavoured to think of other things," replied the priest, in a drowsy tone, and he fell into a sort of lethargic stupor.

Dupuytren examined him for a moment in profound silence, then gently drew the white curtains surrounding his couch, and continued visiting his patients. The priest was saved.

Every morning when Dupuytren arrived at the hospital, by a strange infraction of his established rule, he passed by the first beds, and commenced by visiting the Abbé, and when he was slowly recovering, and enabled daily to take a little exercise, Dupuytren, after his general visit, returned, passed the priest's arm under his own, and accommodating his step to the invalid's, took a few turns round the room with him.

To those who knew the careless harshness with which the doctor treated his patients, this change of conduct appeared inexplicable.

When the Abbé was well enough to bear the fatigue of travelling, he took leave of the sisters and the doctor, and returned to his parishioners.

Some months afterwards, Dupuytren, one morning, on entering the Salle St. Agnes, at the Hotel Dieu, saw the Abbé, who had for some time awaited his arrival, advancing to meet him. He still wore his little black robes, but they were covered with dust, his buckled shoes were quite white; he had a large wicker basket under his arm well secured with packthread, from which a few pieces of straw here and there escaped. Dupuytren gave him the kindest reception, and after having ascertained that the operation had been followed by no danger, he inquired the reason of his visit to Paris.

"Sir," replied the Abbé, "this is the anniversary of the day on which you performed the operation which restored me. I would not allow the 6th of May to pass without coming to see you, and I thought I would at the same time bring you a little present. Here are two fine pullets from my poultry yard, and some pears from my garden—you can scarcely find any like them in Paris. But you will promise me to taste them?"

Dupuytren shook his hand cordially. He much wished the good old man to dine with him; he, however, refused, although it would have afforded him much pleasure to accept the invitation: his time was precious, he was obliged to return immediately to * * *

The next two years, on the 6th of May, Dupuytren again saw the little priest, accompanied by his basket and his pullets. The doctor showed much emotion on receiving these visits.

About this time he had the first attacks of the disorder to which all his science (immense as it was) gave way. He went to Italy, by the recommendation of the whole body of physicians, but without experiencing in himself any hope of being saved by the voyage. When he returned to Fgnes, in the month of March, 1834, his case appeared rather better; but this improvement was only apparent, and Dupuytren knew it well. He felt that his days were numbered, and saw his last hour approaching. As the fatal period approached his disposition became still more morose. Perhaps these sorrowful moments, this moral solitude, this isolation, which, from his former harshness and cruelty to others, he had so surely prepared for himself, and which left him, so to speak, alone with death, gave him a solemn warning.

He suddenly called his adopted son, who was watching close by, and dictated the following—

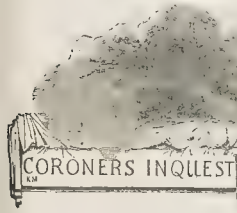
"To Mr. Curé, of the parish of * * near Nemours.

"My dear Abbé,—The doctor, in his turn, wants your assistance. Come quickly (perhaps you may even be too late) to

"Your friend. DUPUYTREN."

The little priest hastened to attend the summons. He was a long while alone with Dupuytren. No one knows what passed between them; but when the Abbe left the dying man's apartment, although his eyes were humid, an expression of holy joy beamed in his countenance.

On the 8th of February, 1835, Dupuytren expired. The day of the funeral, the sky, from the first of the morning, was covered with grey clouds A drizzling rain, mingled with sleet chilled the immense and silent crowd, which filled the Place St. Germain L'Auxerrois, and the vast crowd of the Maison Mortuaire. The church of St. Eustache could scarcely contain the cortege. After the funeral service, the coffin was supported by his pupils to the cemetery, and the little priest followed the convoy in tears.



MORTALITY IN THE PENITENTIARY.—On Monday evening an inquest was held by Mr. Higgs, at the Penitentiary, Millbank, on the body of William Williams, aged 29, an inmate of the above prison.—The Rev. Daniel Nihill, governor of the prison, said that the deceased was received there on the 14th June, 1840, from the Warrior hulk, having been convicted on the 7th of May preceding, at Beaumaris, of sheep-stealing, and sentenced to ten years' transportation, but which had been subsequently commuted to imprisonment, to expire on the 6th of October, 1843.—Dr. Bayley, physician to the Penitentiary, said the deceased was affected during the last spring with dysentery, but got the better of it. On the 24th ult., however, he was again seized, and continued in a very lingering state until Sunday last, the 14th inst., when death ensued.—A Juror: What is the cause of dysentery?—Dr. Bayley said, during the spring months there was a great deal of dysentery in that prison, arising from the overflow of the immediate neighbourhood by the heavy rains and the river. A Juror: What, the prison then is so damp?—Dr. Bayley: No, it is not the prison, but the immediate neighbourhood. The witness further stated, that the average number in the prison was 760. The deaths since Christmas amounted to fifteen, and not twenty-eight, as had been erroneously stated in the House of Commons. Fourteen had been pardoned on medical grounds, five of whom had been sent to Bethlehem Hospital, one out of the five being affected with epilepsy, which was almost sure to lead to insanity. A Juror inquired what was done with prisoners when they became permanently sick.—Dr. Bayley: When life is endangered by imprisonment, or where prisoners are likely to be in the infirmary the entire time of their sentence, they were pardoned. A Juror: You don't discharge them till they are pretty well done for!—The jury ultimately returned a verdict of "Natural death."

EXTRAORDINARY ANTIPATHY OF THE IRISH TO CORONERS' INQUESTS AND POST MORTEM EXAMINATIONS. On Wednesday an inquest was held by Mr. Wakley, M.P., at the University College Hospital, on the body of Patrick Newman, aged 35. Mr. Quain, the surgeon, stated that the deceased was quite insensible when brought in, and continued, although bled, in that state, until Monday morning, when he expired. Mr. Quain added that he had not made a post mortem examination, nor should he have liked to attempt it, for six or seven of the deceased's relations, who were in attendance awaiting the deceased's death, the moment that event was announced to them, rushed into the ward where the body lay, and would, had they not been opposed force to force, have at once carried it off, in order to prevent either an inquest or an examination. The Coroner said the abhorrence of the Irish to either inquests or post mortem examinations was most extraordinary. A short time since he had held an inquest on the body of an Irishwoman, in whose case he deemed it necessary to have a post mortem examination, but he was met with the most violent resistance on the part of the husband. On questioning him as to the reason of his objecting, he expressed his sincere and fervent conviction that the moment a knife was placed into the body of his deceased wife she would speak. A verdict having been recorded, the deceased's brother exclaimed, "Thank your honourable worships," rushed out of the inquest-room, and in less than two minutes the mortal remains of poor Patrick Newman were upon the shoulders of his relatives on the road to have his "wake."

SNAKE CHARMING AT CAIRO.—A snake having been seen in the upper room of the house of a friend of mine, he sent for one of these men, and I happened to be there when three of them arrived. They were dressed in the usual clothes of the lower classes—viz., a red cap and turban, an inner and outer tunic, in this case without a belt and shoes; each carried a leather bag and wand. They were searched and admitted into a lower chamber, where it was proposed they should make their first essay. One of the men advancing from the crowd of servants and people collected (among whom were two Englishmen besides myself,) and brandishing his wand, tapped gently the woodwork in the chamber, and then placing himself in the middle of the room, gave a long whistle, and in a loud voice and musical cadence said—"In the name of GOD, the highest, the most perfect," and several other sentences which I could not catch, in which, however, the name of Solomon the son of David occurred, terminating the chant by commanding the snakes, if above, to come down—if below, to come up to him. After using the same form of incantation two or three times without success, he went into another apartment on the same floor, repeating the like till he was satisfied that no snakes were to be found. He was then conducted into the upper chamber, where a snake had been seen; the same formula was repeated several times, while, at his request, the doors of adjoining rooms were opened when advancing; he made a thrust with his wand behind a door, and then, starting back, baring his arm and brandishing his wand, thrust it again behind the door, dragging out with seeming caution, at the end of his wand a snake of about four feet long, which, when he had advanced to the middle of the room, with violent and grotesque gesture, he seized by the neck, to the great dismay of the bystanders, who retreated as best they could, to the doors and walls, leaving him ample space for his manœuvres. Being assured at length of the perfect control he seemed to possess over the enemy, we gradually advanced, while he, with the sleeve of his tunic, drew from the mouth of the snake a number of small teeth, which he forbade us to touch, picking them out from his sleeve with great caution. All now was hubbub and confusion; the crowd had pressed round the man, when something was said in disparagement of the performance, and the man, to our utter astonishment, bit off the head of the snake, and while answering the reproach, and chewing the head, took another bite, much to the disgust of our host, who put an end to the repast by removing to the house of a person in the vicinity. The company followed, and witnessed the catching of several snakes; in every case, however, the snake was taken from behind the door of an inner room, the man filling up the entrance and frightening away all the witnesses by the suddenness of his movements. We were then taken to the top of the house; then, as a climax, and to remove all suspicion of his having snakes secreted in his dress, the performer divested himself of his habiliments and entered a small dark chamber on the roof, in a state of primitive innocence, bringing out with him one of the largest snakes that had been caught. Nevertheless, this also failed to convince some of the company, who, with the three Saadi, were invited to the house of an Armenian gentleman, who caused them to be searched in the street before entering. Having arrived in the court-yard, a black servant of our host submitted to the process of being rendered invulnerable A serpent was put round his neck and made to bite the lobe of his left ear, and after repeating certain words the boy was considered sufficiently initiated to be intrusted with several snakes, which at last were handed about, the company having become familiar with those objects of terror; and the little teeth which, at first it was dangerous to remove, even from the sleeve of the tunic, were taken out of many a finger with no worse consequences than the loss of a drop or two of blood, which usually flowed on sucking the wound. Two small snakes were taken out of the house of an Armenian gentleman, and three or four others from an adjoining house, and it was proposed that all the snakes should be put in the middle of the court, while the Saadi should place himself in an adjoining room to call them to him after the approved form. This ingenious test was violently opposed by all three of the Saadi, and, during the argument, which was confused and noisy, the snakes were caught up and carried off, and the whole company dispersed. N.B. The snakes were all of one kind, except the two small ones found in the house of the Armenian. None of them had the appearance of venomous serpents, the head not flat, joined to the body without any apparent neck, long tail and pointed termination.—Foreign and Colonial Quarterly Review.

A TAVERN ROOM.—It was one of those unaccountable little rooms which are never seen anywhere but in a tavern, and are supposed to have got into taverns by reason of the facilities afforded to the architect for getting drunk while engaged in their construction. It had more corners in it than the brain of an obstinate man; was full of mud closets, in which nothing could be put that was not specially invented and made for that purpose; had mysterious shelvings and bulkheads, and indications of staircases in the ceiling, and was elaborately provided with a bell that rung in the room itself, about two feet from the handle, and had no connection whatever with any other part of the establishment. It was a little below the pavement, and abutted close upon it: so that passengers grated against the window panes with their buttons, and scraped it with their baskets; and fearful boys suddenly coming between a thoughtful guest and the light, derided him, or put out their tongues as if he were a physician; or made white robes on the ends of their noses by flattening the same against the glass, and vanished awfully like spectres.—Martin Chuzzlewit.

NAPOLEON'S HEART.—The Globe tells the following strange story:—"When Bonaparte died at St. Helena, it is well known that his heart was extracted with the design of being preserved. The British physician who had the charge of that wondrous organ had deposited it in a silver basin, among water, and retired to rest, leaving two tapers burning beside it in his chamber. He often confesses to his friends, while narrating the particulars, he felt nervously anxious as the custodier of such a charge, and, though he reclined, did not sleep. While lying thus awake, he heard, during the silence of the night, first a rustling noise, then a plunge among the water in the basin, and then the sound of an object falling with a rebound on the floor—all occurring with the quickness of thought. Dr. A sprang from his bed, and the cause of the intrusion on his repose was soon explained. It was an enormous rat, dragging the heart of Buonaparte to its hole. A few moments more, and that which before had been too vast in its ambition to be satisfied with the sovereignty of continental Europe, would have been found even in a more degrading positon than the dust of Cæsar stopping a beer-barrel—it would have been devoured as the supper of a rat."

DREAMS.—And how can we certainly distinguish between our dreams and our waking thoughts? What criterion is there by which we may surely know, whether we are awake or asleep? It is true, as soon as we awake out of sleep, we know we have been in a dream, and are now awake. But how shall we know that a dream is such, while we continue therein? What is a dream? To give a gross and superficial, not a philosophical account of it, —it is a series of persons and things presented to our mind in sleep, which have no being but in our own imagination. A dream, therefore, is a kind of digression from our real life. It seems to be an echo of what was said or done when we were awake. Or, may we say, a dream is a fragment of life, broken off at both ends, not connected, either with the past that goes before, or with that which follows after? And is there any better way of distinguishing our dreams from our waking thoughts, than by this very circumstance? It is a kind of parenthesis, inserted in life, as that is in a discourse, which goes on equally well either with or without it. By this, then we may intallibly know a dream; by its being broken off at both ends; by its having no proper connexion with the real things which either precede or follow it.—John Wesley.

BELGIAN CHASSE.—With this she entered into a detail of the laws of the hunting field, which more than once threw me into fits of laughter. It seemed, then, that the code decided that each horseman who followed the hounds should not be left to the wilfulness of the horse, or the aspirings of his ambition, as to the place he occupied in the chase. It was no momentary superiority of skill or steed—no display of jockeyship—no blood that decided this momentous question. No, that was arranged on principles far less vacillating and more permanent, at the commencement of the hunting season, by which it was laid down as a rule certain, that the grand maitre was always to ride first. His pace might be fast or it might be slow, but his place was there. After him came the maitres, the people in scarlet, who, in right of paying double subscription, were thus costumed and thus privileged; whilst the aspirants in green followed last, their smaller contribution only permitting them to see so much of the sport as their respectful distance opened to them; and thus that indiscriminate rush, so observable in our hunting fields, was admirably avoided and provided against. It was no headlong piece of reckless daring: no impetuous dash of bold horsemanship; on the contrary, it was a decorous and stately canter, not after hounds, but after an elderly gentleman in a red coat and a brass tube, who was taking a quiet airing, in the pleasing delusion that he was hunting an animal unknown. Woe unto the man who forgot his place in the procession; you might as well walk into dinner before your host, under the pretence that you were a more nimble pedestrian. Besides this, there were subordinate rules to no end—certain notes in the cor de chasse were royalties of the grand maitre; the maitres possessed others as their privileges, which no aspirant dare venture on. There were quavers for one, and semiquavers for the other; and, in fact, a most complicated system of legislation comprehended every incident, and, I believe, every accident, of the sport, so much that I can't trust my memory as to whether the wretched aspirants were not limited to tumbling in one particular direction, which, if so, must have been somewhat of a tyranny, seeing that they were but men, and Belgians.—Dublin University Magazine.

ANECDOTE OF A DOG.—One day an uncle of ours came to the house, brought a large dog with him, and stayed to dinner. Gerald dined at the same table, and the dog stood behind his chair seeming to watch where his best chance lay. He was one of the most beautiful specimens of the greyhound tribe, being of a mouse colour, with the lofty stature, slender head and limbs, flowing outline, and piercing vision, that give to that species its full perfection. On this occasion he took a dishonourable advantage of these personal qualities, for when Gerald lifted his arm a little from his side, he popped his head through the opening and the plate was cleared. A second supply met with the same fate, and this was repeated two or three times in succession, the dog coming in unobserved every time the parlour door was opened. At length the quantity the little fellow was consuming seemed to attract my mother's attention. Having supplied him once again, she cast her eyes a few minutes afterwards towards the side table, and the state of affairs there set the whole table in a roar. Gerald had this time watched his interests much more closely, and when his aggressor thrust his head again through the narrow defile, he closed his arm upon it and kept it fast locked. When my mother looked over she saw him very contentedly prosecuting his dinner with the huge animal's head under his arm, his left hand being, however, a little limited in its motions by the necessity of keeping his prisoner close. The dog did not struggle nor attempt to get away, the agreeable prospect before him probably compensating for his temporary loss of liberty; but he seemed to follow with his eyes the point of the fork in the very important semicircles it was carving between his keeper's plate and his lips.—Gerald Griffin.

HOW TO SEE LONDON TO ADVANTAGE.—The difficulty of selecting points of view whence we may form a correct estimate of the grandeur of London, is great; views of the bird's-eye sort, from the Monument, St. Paul's, or the Duke of York's column, are by no means satisfactory, save in giving an idea of the vastness of its extent, and the quantity of ground it covers. What with the smoke, contending with haze and fog; what with the great height, by which the streets appear narrowed into alleys, the passengers diminished to the size of ants, appearing to crawl along the surface, and the great brick-red desert of tiles and chimney-pots, these monumental prospects are by no means satisfactory. One of the finest views in London, is three paces in advance of Anderton's hotel, Fleet-street, looking towards St. Paul's, whose expansive bulk, swelling against the sky, is surprisingly contrasted with the needle-like spire of St. Martin's, Ludgate. If the architect of the latter had intended his structure to serve as a foil to the former, as well as to display, by contrast, the lightness and elegance of his own work, he could not have employed his talent to more advantage. A point at Charing Cross, nearly opposite Macintosh's caoutchouc emporium, affords another tolerably general point of view, embracing many objects of interest. There are many others, but by far the finest is from the third arch of Waterloo Bridge, on the Surrey side. Beyond all doubt, this presents the most magnificent coup d' œil in London. You stand in the centre of the chord of an arch, formed by the great bend, or London reach, as we may call it, of the river; before you, forming the central point of view, rises the façade of Somerset House; Westminster and Blackfriars bridges are the colonnades connecting the wings of the city, as it were, with your centre; citywards, towers and spires, outnumbering the pinnacles of the Escurial, or the monarchs of Muscovian Kremlin, lifting their heads above the herd of habitations around, lead you to conclude that the cockneys must be the most religious people upon earth; you count two-and-thirty steeples, of all sorts and sizes, without including the pinnacles of the Tower, dimly seen among the forest of floating pines, which do duty for plantations.—Bentley's Miscellany.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.—The difficulty of applying rules to the pronunciation of our language may be illustrated in two lines, where the combination of the letters ough is pronounced no less than seven different ways—as o, uf, of, up, ou, and ock:

"Though the tough cough and hiccough plough me through, O'er life's dark lough my course I still pursue."

SELF-MADE MEN.—Columbus was a weaver. Franklin was a journeyman printer. Masceillau, as well as Fletcher, arose amidst the humblest vocations. Niebuhr was a peasant. Sextus V., was employed in keeping swine. Rollin was the son of a cutler. Fergusson and Burns, Scottish poets, were shepherds. Æsop was a slave. Homer was a beggar. Daniel Defoe was apprenticed to a hosier. Demosthenes was the son of a cutler. Hogarth an engraver of pewter pots. Virgil was the son of a baker. Gay was an apprentice to a silk-mercer. Ben Jonson was a bricklayer. Porson was the son of a parish clerk. Prideaux was employed to sweep Exeter College. Akenside was the son of a butcher. Pope was the son of a merchant. Cervantes was a common soldier. Gifford and Bloomfield were shoemakers. Howard was apprenticed to a grocer. Halley was the son of a soap-boiler. Richard Arkwright was a barber for a number of years.

FLORICULTURE.

THE CAMELLIA.

This evergreen was first introduced to the notice of English cultivators in 1740. It came from China. Two of the varieties known to us are celebrated tea plants - Camellia bohea, and Camellia viridis; but the Camellia japonica is the popular ornamental shrub, very few of the other species being grown by us except as botanical curiosities. The root is the tenderest part of the plant, and this is generally protected in the winter by a covering of straw, which is also wrapped round the stem of the shrub, and affords a necessary protection against the frost and cold. The character of the soil for planting in depends greatly on the age of the plant: for seedlings or young cuttings, a rich loog mould, retaining the turf adhering to it, and adding thereto a little white sand, is pronounced by an experienced cultivator to be the best; as the plant becomes older some light turfy loam is mixed with the peat, which is increased till the loam and peat are of equal quantities. Camellias, while in a growing state, require plenty of water, but the leaves must not be wetted while the sun is shining, as this causes them to appear spotted and stained; imperfections in the glass of a greenhouse will produce the like effect. All the species may be propagated by cuttings taken off at the base of a leaf or at a joint; these should be planted under a glass in the soil previously described. The observations of last week are referred to.

The public who have been in the habit of passing across Waterloo and Southwark bridges for the last few years have observed a man of the name of Austen stand with a large cage, containing cats, owls, rats, rabbits, and a variety of other animals and birds living together in a state of perfect harmony. This curious exhibition has caused persons of all ranks and grades to stop and look at the collection, which has at length been witnessed by her Majesty, Prince Albert, and suite. In the course of last week a noble earl, connected with the Royal household, saw the exhibition, and he desired Austen to bring his collection to Buckingham Palace at seven o'clock on Thursday evening. Accordingly the cage was conveyed to the Palace, when it was ordered to be carried up stairs. The menagerie was, however, too large even to be got in at the door, upon which it had to be taken into one of the lower rooms of the Palace, and when everything was ready her Majesty and her Royal Consort and suite entered the room and remained three quarters of an hour witnessing the affection, if such a term may be used, which existed between animals and birds of natures so opposite. The Queen in particular expressed her astonishment and gratification at a sight so novel and unique.

LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—The receipts upon the London and Birmingham Railway amounted last week to the extraordinary sum of £20,672.—a sum hitherto unequalled upon any railway in the world during the same length of time.

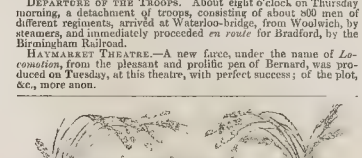
DRAINING TILES.—In the list of patents sealed last month is a singular one, viz., to "Lady Ann Vavasour, of Melbourne Hall, Yorkshire, for the improvements of machinery in draining land.—Sealed July 7. Six months for enrolment."

SINGULAR ACCIDENT AT BLACKFRIARS-BRIDGE.—About nine o'clock on Monday night the following singular accident, but which we regret to state, is likely to be attended with loss of life, occurred on the east side of Blackfriars-bridge.—It appears that one of the iron steamboats, the Dart, was proceeding down the river towards London-bridge, but having to land some passengers at the Blackfriars pier, she came under the second arch on the City side. Within the last few days an escape of gas had taken place in the pipes which supply the eastern side of the bridge with gas; and for the purpose of directing the attention of the workmen, as well as to act as a caution to the steamboats passing and repassing, a wisp of straw was attached to the pipes. The Dart, unfortunately, in the search, came immediately under the wisp, which became entangled in the funnel, and before those on board were aware of the danger, some of the iron pipes gave way, and fell. An old gentleman was struck by a portion of the pipe, and, we understand, was found to be so dangerously injured, as to render it essential that he should be instantly removed to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. The pipe continued its course, and, falling down the cabin steps, forced its way through the bottom of the Dart, which immediately began to fill. The passengers were of course landed at Blackfriars, and the Dart at once made fast, where she remains filled with water. During the night the bridge presented a singular appearance from a number of men being at work in repairing the pipes, being lighted by several large flambeaux.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE GREENWICH RAILWAY.—On Wednesday evening an inquiry took place at Guy's Hospital, before Mr. Payne, touching the death of John Kenney, aged 30, a labourer, employed on this railway. The railway is undergoing some repair, and several workmen are employed during the night for the purpose. Between nine and ten on Tuesday night, deceased was proceeding to his work, and had ascended the ladder to the parapet over the arch, near Bermondsey-street. He had scarcely reached the top, when, by some means, he overbalanced himself, and fell with great violence to the ground, a height of about 40 feet. He was immediately picked up, and conveyed to this hospital. He died on Wednesday morning. Verdict—"Accidental death."

DEPARTURE OF THE TROOPS.—About eight o'clock on Thursday morning, a detachment of troops, consisting of about 800 men of different regiments, arrived at Waterloo-bridge, from Woolwich, by steamers, and immediately proceeded en route for Bradford, by the Birmingham Railroad.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—A new farce, under the name of Laconation, from the pleasant and prolific pen of Bernard, was produced on Tuesday, at this theatre, with perfect success; of the plot, &c., more anon.



THE MARKETS

CORN EXCHANGE.—We have received a very moderate supply of English Wheat up to our market since Monday, it not having exceeded 2840 quarters, yet the demand for all descriptions has ruled excessively heavy. Old parcels have gone off at late rates, but new sorts have fallen 1s per quarter. Upwards of 31,000 quarters of Foreign Wheat have come to hand, while duty has been paid on upwards of 1,300,000 quarters of that grain, which has fallen in value 1s per quarter. Barley and Malt have proved a mere drug; but Oats and Beans have fully maintained their quotations. In other articles exceedingly little business has been transacted at late currencies.

THE RECENT OUTBREAKS.

The semi-revolutionary movements that have been spreading so much alarm over all parts of the kingdom, are now happily subsiding into peace; the law has vindicated its majesty, and order and tranquillity are once more beginning to fold their wings over the land. It is in the truest spirit of satisfaction that we congratulate our readers upon this fast-approaching result. We gazed with a pitying and profound grief upon the sad catastrophe of madness to which the working-classes had been incited, and saw in the sudden exercise of their wild, unsettled, and lawless power, a picture of horror that could only recoil on themselves. If they were starving, we knew that food would not come to them because they quitted its fountain, labour, and pushed starvation to its last extreme. If they sought the maintenance of "Peace, law, and order," with which they mottoed their banners, and thought to impress the country with an imposing display of compact and gigantic moral force, we knew that "peace, law, and order," were not to be maintained in the ranks of sedition, and that there could be no morality in that force which exercised itself with brutal violence to stop the progress of manufacture, and to coerce those who would not have abandoned work at their own will. If Jack Cadeism, or the revolutionary spirit of undisguised turbulence, had assumed a mischievous mastery over their passions, then we knew that in the outbreak of a servile war, in which only the poorer orders swelled the insurrection, the military and civil force would be fearfully too strong for the populace, and the blood that streamed in the struggle would be from their own bosoms and beside their own hearths. If they were deluded by any species of political agitation—by the insidious brawling of Chartism, or the more tempting and treacherous plausibility of the Anti-Corn-law League—then we knew how wofully the deception would punish those whom it deceived, and how the trusting labourer would suffer under the exasperation which his poverty had led him but too readily to court. Lastly, if wrong and wretchedness and sorrow were the appalling springs of the frightful mischiefs that were threatened, then we knew how little they were to be alleviated by revolt, but rather how sadly their relief is retarded by it, and their smarting misery increased.

In all aspects, in every phase of contemplation, the disturbances were alike to be lamented and condemned: they had no wisdom in them; no foresight, no heroism; nothing to dignify or exalt; but everything to debase, to humble, and to afflict. Every man, not a wretch in spirit, must thank Heaven that they have subsided, and breathe an aspiration that no such lawless combinations of cruelty with folly may ever again sully the character of our labourers, or break loose upon the English soil.

We rejoice, too, that the restoration to tranquillity has been purchased at so little cost of life and blood, and that two serviceable truths have been also taught by its progress to the community:—first, that Anti-Corn-law Leagueism, with all the influence of a reduction of wages within its grasp, and with all the careful organization by which its plans of action have been imbued and condensed, has no power to revolutionize a country like this, for the purpose of forcing any particular measure down the national throat; and, secondly, that Chartism has, per se, no political power in the state, that it is only the whistling of a wind in the forest, that waves the branches, but cannot stir the trees; that it has no bone, no sinew, no muscle, no marrow—in a word, not one single emblem of giantude or element of strength. This we gather clearly from all the results of the late melancholy infatuation of the popular mind.

But now we come, with the return of peace, or at least the immediate prospect of it, to the consideration of the paramount question which all the movement has involved—we mean the real distresses of the people and the real causes of their distress. To discover, to grapple with, and to remedy these—hic labor, hoc opus est. It has been well said by a contemporary, that "if any man rest satisfied with the mere cessation of the disturbances, and the vague hope that nothing so disagreeable will occur again, or at all events not in his time, such a man may be safely charged with ignorance or apathy, or both." It concerns not only the security of the public, but the national honour, that the true cause of such a general movement of the manufacturing populace as we have recently seen, should be carefully looked into; and if it be found that it arose from the actual discomfort of the people, owing to the pinching poverty and the absence of such means as are needful for the decent sustenance of humble life in England, then some bold and effectual step should be taken to remedy so great, so solemn, so truly disastrous an evil.

And this has been our great contention on the part of the poor—this we put in terms of glowing earnestness before Parliament closed its doors upon the people—this we wrote for, hoped for, prayed for, and that with heart and soul. Nor are we without trust, that what has occurred will have the strongest moral influence upon our rulers, and that, as soon as anxious wisdom and philosophy can devise the balm that should lull the spirit and be poured into the bosom of poverty, legislation will at once commence its active functions, and the Government diffuse something like a smile of cheerfulness over the shadowy features of that squalid want which, if bad to contemplate, must be worse to bear. The noises of agitation may be comparatively hushed; the barb of sedition may be blunted or seethed in corrosion; the golden harvest may shake its waving wealth before the anti-corn-law leaguer, even though its sign of plenty should dim the gladness of his eye; the shouting for the Charter may well be tolerated among the other harmless "Cries of London;" but in the restored repose of the moment, in the confidence of the popular mind, the poor must not for an instant be forgotten now. Their misery is that blot upon our social condition which humanity demands to see removed; their welfare is that contentful picture which gentle Christianity is all alert to paint; their grievances are what patriotism comes armed to redress; their happiness is the keystone to the happiness of all the rest of the community—to the greatness, the freedom, the peace, and prosperity of all our English realm.

The task of going to the very core of the distresses that have pressed them down, and of seeking some speedy alleviation for them, should go home to the business and bosom of Government like an arrow into the bull's-eye. No evasion, no hesitation, no delay. We know that the poverty of this country has become a great national question, its causes not easily probed—its evils not easily remedied—its cravings not easily fed. But it is because it has grown into a mighty Upas tree that therefore we should sap its poison, and wither its branches, and pluck it down! And those Ministers will indeed be happy who shall but half accomplish the task: their fame and the gratitude of the country will be in proportion to the difficulties with which they have to cope—the clashing interests that shall be set up to thwart them—the disappointments that shall obstruct their progress, and the dangers that shall gather upon their way. We implore Sir Robert Peel and his colleagues to turn all their energies of statesmanship to this rewarding bourn. Let them go fearlessly down into the depths of all the evil—let them sacrifice prejudice, and even opinion, to the starving need—let them generously and dauntlessly strangle the New Poor-law at a grasp, as it lies, like some deformed offspring of tyranny, rocking in its cradle of crime—let them legislate in mercy for the grievance of the moment, but in wisdom against the future ill—let them, in a word, lift up the hearts of the lowly in condition, and the oppressed in want, and not only shall the voice of England, but the hand of Heaven, shed blessings upon them and upon their sway.

MEETING OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA AND KING OF PRUSSIA AT ST. PETERSBURG.

THE KING OF PRUSSIA AT ST. PETERSBURG.

An event of no ordinary kind is the subject of the above engraving, which depicts most faithfully the late visit of the King of Prussia to the metropolis of the Emperor of Russia. A most secret affair has this meeting been, and a considerable air of mystery has pervaded the entire movements of both monarchs. None of their own papers have dared to report it. But the English press is Argus-eyed, and we are enabled not only to report this secret and important meeting, but also to give a vivid representation of the review in front of the Winter Palace, at St. Petersburgh, the great feature of the visit.

This Palace, which appears to the left in our view, is the largest royal residence in Europe, and is said to be capable of lodging the enormous number of eleven thousand persons! It is a classic construction, in a very pure and grand style of architecture, but has no peculiar national feature, and this is the case with all the public buildings and general residences of this capital. He who comes here expecting to find something national and characteristic in the general appearance of the houses will be completely disappointed. But the absence of a Russian look may be accounted for in the fact, that not only the palaces, but all the streets were built by foreigners, chiefly Italian architects.

The utmost uniformity is preserved in the arrangement and buildings of this city. No man dare follow his own plan as to the outside of his house, whatever he may do within. The plasterer's trowel and painter's brush are set to work every year all over the city, an imperial Ukase enforcing the repairing and beautifying of each house upon its inhabitants, and no excuse received for the inconvenience or annoyance that such regulation may give. By this means the foot-ways or pavements were formed, that now give an air of cleanliness and comfort which were formerly strangers to this city. The Emperor's visit to England, more than 20 years ago, convinced him of their utility; and upon his return to St. Petersburg, where few persons could walk for the rough stones and deep mire, he issued an Ukase enjoining every proprietor of a house to lay the footpaths in its front with slabs, and thus form a pavement. "Obedience or Siberia" was the word, and, at all risks, inconvenience, or expense, there was no remedy but to obey.

Our view comprehends the Church of Isaac, a structure of much elegance, and in the Italian style. The bridge, an exceedingly plain wooden construction, is in front; the central object being the colossal statue of Peter the Great, one of the modern wonders of the world.

In this place, the very focus of the grandeur of St. Petersburg, some of the many reviews took place for the amusement of his Majesty of Prussia. But what does it all mean? It is perhaps very natural for his Prussian Majesty to visit St. Petersburg, the Empress being his sister; but why is the visit so very mysterious, and so very military? Day after day, for three weeks, have soldiers been paraded before the eyes of the Prussian King, and the clang of the military music, and all the "pomp, pride, and circumstance of glorious war," the one-absorbing passion of absolute monarchy, revelled in most luxuriously. It is the delight of Nicholas to surprise; for that alone he lives, and for that he would almost sacrifice life. It is a part of his policy to surprise his people by encountering difficulties of every kind, which his iron frame enables him to do with impunity: inspecting his fleet, and going out to sea in storms that would make most folks tremble; flying here and there in the face of every danger; accomplishing journeys, and doing all kinds of things that nobody else would do. His people hold up their hands at the narrative of such dare-devil exploits, and exclaim, "Eto stranno—It is strauge—Nicholas is a wonder." And the Imperial Autocrat is repaid in the awe with which he is regarded by them; for by his activity he has brought himself to be looked upon as a demi-god, and they cannot conceive of any difficulty that he would not be well able to surmount. The advantages which this admiration gives him in accomplishing his measures, and in keeping down the most distant attempt at revolt, are incalculably great. There is deep policy in all this; he is just the sovereign for the people he rules, and has succeeded in obtaining the love and the fear of his people, a conjunction of feeling very essential to himself and his plans.

Was the great military display then made before the Majesty of Prussia part and parcel of "the system" of the Autocrat? Is it a quiet display of power that it would be obviously dangerous to offend? or is it intended to convince all whom it may concern that the "bleak north" is in every way as important and as deserving of royal visits and proper consideration as "our own little island?" If we show gold plate, and snug, but splendid, dinner halls, and all that render peaceful life glorious and beautiful, an equally impressive display may be furnished in St. Petersburg of much that would render an offence given to such a power a rather uncomfortable thing to the offender. Demi-savage Russian soldiers paraded by the thousand before one's eyes are, we fancy, no pleasant things to contemplate; and what mind could fail in being perfectly convinced both of their numbers and their efficiency, if they were regularly brought forward, with drums beating and colours flying, for three mortal weeks. Very delightful, no doubt, it is to his Majesty of Russia, as it is to most military monarchs, to feel that the power rests with him of depopulating by the sword much of God's beautiful world when an occasion serves, for it cannot always be exerted even as sovereigns wish. Much may they delight in armed camps, for

> "——— The amiable vice,
> Has no munificence and drowned in state,
> Loves to be lead. Assumes the name of glorious war,
> And through the admiring crowd,
> Under'd, the ornamented murderers move!"

It is not to be wondered at that the King of Prussia, escaping from all this, returned home at the beginning of last week, and immediately barred himself in the Sans-Souci Palace, where once the wit of Voltaire and the policy of Frederick the Great found resting-places and relaxation. The name is certainly propitious. Is the head of his Majesty also sans souci, or do cares beset it since this secret visit? But it is dangerous to touch the crowned heads of Europe; and we leave his Majesty no doubt entirely absorbed in the splendid baptismal salver intended for his godson, our young Prince of Wales. May nothing less peaceful disturb him; and the arts of peace find a patronage where the art of war has reigned for centuries—we mean in the minds of the rulers of kingdoms.

The following singular statement of a private correspondent, dated Frankfort-on-the-Maine, August 15, we copy from a weekly contemporary of the highest respectability. We are disposed to regard it with doubt, but still feel bound to give it as we have received it:—

"DIABOLICAL PLOT OF THE RUSSIAN NOBLES TO MURDER THEIR EMPEROR AND THE KING OF PRUSSIA.—All England will be startled and horrified at this announcement. It is but too true! It comes from a source which defies contradiction; and I beg that, in any comments made upon it in your columns, not the slightest doubt or question may be raised as to the correctness of the information which your correspondent has received. The grand day of the nuptial jubilee at St. Petersburg had nearly proved a day of deep and dreadful mourning. Under Divine Providence, the terrible calamity was averted only by the wonderful presence of mind of the King of Prussia; and in this how visible has been the protecting interposition of the Almighty! From the very first moment that the Emperor of Russia resolved upon promulgating the Ukase which has redeemed millions of slaves from the chains of their tyrants, the nobles became enraged against him to the utmost pitch of exasperation, and entered into a dark and widely-spread conspiracy to take his life upon the very first convenient opportunity that might present itself. Believing that the emancipation of the serfs had been earnestly suggested and recommended to the Emperor by the King of Prussia, they determined that the latter great and good monarch should perish at the same moment with their sovereign. With the fixed and fell purpose of carrying their atrocious project into execution, they waited with impatience for the hour which was to bring both monarchs together amidst the acclamations of hundreds of thousands. In the meantime the Emperor received private information of their diabolical design, but concealing it from his illustrious brother-in-law, he ordered that the chiefs of the conspiracy should be instantly seized and sent off to Siberia. His orders were promptly executed; but this only served to increase the number of murderous villains who had previously doomed him to death, and decided that he ought never to have been permitted to live unless as the passive instrument of their will. Looking forward to the 25th of July (O. S.) as their idea of March, they prepared to muster in overwhelming numbers on that day, caring not whether they deluged the streets of St. Petersburgh with blood, provided they shed the blood of their intended victims. The signal for slaughter was to be given at a late hour of the day, when all their forces should have assembled. Meanwhile the Emperor, being accurately informed of all their proceedings and machinations throughout his European dominions, adopted every possible precaution to guard against danger so awfully imminent. He ordered to the capital all those troops on whose fidelity he thought he could most rely, and removed to a considerable distance those whom he distrusted. He quadrupled the number of his body guards, selecting this augmentation from corps of tried and devoted loyalty. By this time the King of Prussia was on his way to St. Petersburg; and scarcely had his Majesty landed on the shores of the Neva, when he could perceive, from his reception, the envenomed feelings of prejudice and hatred which the nobles had excited against him. Hastening on to the palace of Peterhof with all possible speed, he resolved to get back to his own country with as little delay as decency would permit, being impatiently anxious to escape from a rude, barbarous, and inhospitable land. There is no doubt whatever that, fearing the worst, he was prepared to be continually upon his guard. The interchange of domestic and affectionate regards, between him and the members of the imperial family, was short and abrupt on this account. But it was deemed politic that, at any risks, a public demonstration of family union and family happiness should be made upon a scale of unprecedented grandeur. The Prussian Monarch, however, was immovably resolved that the time which his part in the pageant was to occupy should not exceed one short hour! Leaving the Palace of Peterhof amidst compact masses of faithful guards, both cavalry and infantry, their Imperial and Royal Majesties arrived in the great square of St. Petersburg at a much earlier hour than those who were intent upon their destruction were led to expect. The admirable foresight of the King of Prussia thus disconcerted all the plans of the conspirators; for while they thought the grand scenes of the day were only about to commence, they were nearly all over. The monarchs embraced each other in the midst of the grand square with evident emotion —the troops presenting arms, and peals of artillery resounding in all directions, as well from the land side as from the shipping in the Neva. The guards were then put through some few evolutions, but in no instance so as to interfere with the compactness of their lines, and immediately afterwards their Majesties returned in safety to Peterhof, which was in all respects converted into a strong garrison, while every spot of ground around it was covered with the Imperial Guards, and the stanchest troops of the line occupied all the principal streets of St. Petersburg. In the meantime, as the hour for giving the signal approached, the conspirators were seen advancing in separate detachments towards the spot where they were to act, a vast united host; but, the force opposed to them being overwhelming, they were obliged to disperse in various directions; not, however, before they gave convincing proofs that among the Russian nobles and their adherents are to be found thousands of the most ferocious and bloodthirsty savages in the universe.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—PARIS, August 20.—The regency question has given rise to a very animated debate, in which figure the most distinguished men of whom the Chamber of Deputies can boast. The objections against the law are of a twofold character. First, that the regency ought of right to devolve upon the mother of the minor. Secondly, that the law which appoints the Duke of Nemours Regent ought to stop there, and not proceed to supply the vacancy which would arise in case of his death. Then there is the general and sweeping protest against the competency of the Chamber to discuss the Regency Bill; while, in the speeches of some orators, all these objections, special as well as general, become mixed together. To the first class of objections, M. Guizot has replied in effect that formerly, when the monarchy rested upon an aristocracy, and when the Queen was surrounded by a brilliant court, that then a regency might, with comparative safety, be entrusted to a female hands; but that at present, when Government rests upon a democratic basis of which she is a character, the task becomes, for a woman, too rude. Although the minister urged, with his usual power, many striking views of the subject, yet the main argument seemed to turn upon the altered state of society since 1830. The second objection appears to have afforded the strongest handle against the proposed regency. Some pedantic Legitimists and quibbling Republicans call for a National Assembly to elect the Regent; the former find precedents somewhere about the time of King Clovis, while the latter declaim upon the sovereignty of the people. The good sense of the Chamber has, in this instance, proved a match for both. The leaders of all parties, the Republican alone excepted, feel that the safety of the three only recognised powers of the state to pass a Regency Bill. Indeed, after the abolition of the hereditary rights of the peerage, it is somewhat late to raise an objection of this kind.

The journey of the King and Royal family to the Chateau d'Eu had been postponed for a day or two in consequence of a slight indisposition of the Duchess of Orleans. The rupture between the left centre and left side of the Chamber of Deputies, in the grand split between MM. Thiers and Odillon Barrot, the leaders of the dynastic Opposition Liberals, and will continue during the recess to supply French journalists with ample themes for their leading articles. M. Thiers was to leave Paris with his family, on Saturday night, for Switzerland, Baden, and Prussia—at least his passports were made out for those countries. The Regency Bill was presented to the Chamber of Peers on Saturday afternoon by Marshal Soult. After reading the exposé, which was similar to that read in the Deputies, the standing committees were summoned for yesterday (Tuesday), to hear the Commission. The bill is expected to be voted to-morrow, or Friday at the latest.

The Quotidienne states, from Bar-le-Du, that Marshal Duke de Reggio is dangerously ill.

"Admiral Hugon's squadron," says a letter from Toulon, "has again sailed from the islands of the Hyères, for Corsica."

SPAIN.—The Spanish news continues to be of the most uninteresting nature. We look in vain over the Madrid journals of the 15th, and Barcelona papers of the 16th, for facts worthy of some notice. The Bayonne Phare des Pyrenees of the 18th announces that the Infante Don Francisco de Paulo and family were to leave St. Sebastian on the 21st, for Bilboa.

SIMON BOLIVAR.—The Madrid journals publish the text of a law promulgated at the Caraccas, in virtue of which the mortal remains of Simon Bolivar, the chief of the independence of South America, are to be removed from Santa Maria, where they lie at present, to the metropolitan church of Caraccas. The anniversary of the funeral is to be henceforward a day of public mourning, and the statue of Bolivar is to occupy an honourable place in the Parliament House.

PORTUGAL.—LISBON, Monday, Aug. 15.—The Cortes will be prorogued for some months, when the debate on the address is concluded in the Chamber of Deputies, and a financial vote of confidence taken. The reconstruction of the ministry will then be completed. The crisis, however, may still prove fatal to the present government. No apprehension whatever is entertained in well-informed quarters, of aggression on the part of Spain, though the quidnuncs have made much fuss about "wars and rumours of wars." The arrangements for the effective levying of the decima, or tax of 10 per cent. upon property, have now assumed a tangible shape, and the tax will be immediately levied upon all English residents in any shape connected with business, as well as upon the French and Spanish, and the subjects of all other nations whose exemption ceased with the ratification of the commercial treaty with England. The recognition of the present dynasty of Portugal by Russia, which gratifying intelligence has just reached the Government here in an official shape, concurs with a variety of other circumstances to afford a cheering prospect for the future. It is understood that a Russian minister will arrive here speedily. Within less than 12 months the diplomatic relations of the country have been strengthened by the accession of Austria, Sardinia, Prussia, and Russia. The Calcutta, her Majesty's line-of-battle ship (84) arrived here in the course of the week from Gibraltar, and set out after 24 hours' stay for Portsmouth. This being the feast of Nostra Senhora de Pena, vast crowds are repairing to Cintra, where a very splendid fanaco will take place on the beautiful Serra this evening. All the ministers and principal officers of state proceeded this morning to the ancient Moorish Palace, where her Most Faithful Majesty now holds her court.

The principal theme of our Portuguese correspondent's letter is the efforts of the Spanish minister—efforts fortunately frustrated by the exertions of our authorities—to get out a slaver belonging to a Spaniard named Vincent, which had been taken at Mozambique two years ago under the Portuguese flag and sent to Lisbon. This vessel was then called the Gloria, but General Marinho, who seized her, gave her his own name. The efforts of the owner, backed by the Spanish authorities, prevailed in obtaining her release, and she was fitted up at Lisbon for another expedition, intending to go first to Cadiz, and then to the coast of Africa; she was made over to a Portuguese, but subsequently obtained Spanish papers, and took the name "Grande Amalie." However, on the repeated remonstrances of the British authorities, the voyage has been stopped. She had seven carronades on board, besides staves for 30 water pipes. Some of the Portuguese subordinate authorities were supposed to be implicated in this business, and a strict inquiry was to be instituted.—Morning paper.

FRANKFORT RIOTS.—Several of the workmen at Frankfort, who were condemned last year to several years of imprisonment for a political association, have just received a remission of the remainder of their sentence.

The German Journal of Frankfort states that M. Isaac Hariwig d'Esais, a Jew, who died lately at Hamburgh, leaving no children, has bequeathed his fortune, amounting to 800,000f. banco (about 2,000,000f.) to charitable establishments.

GOTHA, Aug. 12.—A dreadful fire broke out yesterday in the village of Tambach; the flames were driven by the wind, and spread with such rapidity, that all exertions to check them were in vain. Of 320 houses, 142 were burned, besides the church and the buildings attached to it. By this calamity 1400 persons have lost their all.

BRUSSELS, Aug. 18.—The Prince of Leiningen has just arrived at Brussels. The Prince and Princess of Saxe Gotha, coming from Ostend, arrived this day at the Palais of Brussels. Their Majesties the King and Queen, in deep affliction for the death of the Duke of Orleans, do not yet receive visits, but will on Wednesday next. After dinner to Brussels, to see his nephew and niece. Yesterday the Minister of War reviewed all the troops of the garrison. It was observed that many soldiers were taken ill in consequence of the excessive heat. The Indépendance publishes the following news, which is not without importance:—"A letter from Valparaiso, of the 24th of April, which has been received here, speaks of the assembling in that port of a pretty considerable French fleet, the destination of which has hitherto been known, but which is supposed to be to take possession of some islands in the Pacific Ocean, to establish there the sovereignty of France. It will be remembered that about a year and a half ago England did something of the same kind; the object of this expedition, therefore, would be to counterbalance the preponderance which England endeavours to obtain in those seas."

PRUSSIA.—The Prussian State Gazette announces that the town of Mockein, near Magdeburgh, has been reduced to ashes. Not more than fifteen houses were left standing, and upwards of one hundred families were left without shelter, and reduced to the utmost misery.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—Intelligence from Port Natal reached Graham's Town on Saturday afternoon, that a collision had taken place between the Boers and the troops, in which the latter had been defeated with considerable loss. We should mention, that on the prior Thursday, a despatch had been received by the Lieutenant-Governor from Captain Smith, announcing his safe arrival at Natal. We understand that the Dutch appeared to have been taken by surprise at the appearance of the troops. They had, however, posted several inflammatory notices addressed to the people, which Captain Smith took the liberty of removing, and substituting in their stead the governor's proclamation. He also hauled down the Natal pennant, and substituted in its place the British flag. So mistrustful, however, was he of the intentions of the Boers, that the parties he sent out to cut wood and procure water were accompanied by an armed escort. They were provided with provisions but for two or three days, though luckily these were supplied by the "Pilot," which had been sent round from the Cape for that purpose. The particulars of the conflict, as far as we have been enabled to gather them, are these:—It appears that the Boers had succeeded in capturing a number of oxen, which had been turned out to graze; Capt. Smith allowed them a certain time to restore the cattle, but they did not comply with his demand, resolved to attack their encampment by night. For this purpose he took about half his force, and two 6-pounders, and commenced his march about eleven o'clock at night. The encampment of the Boers is distant from the encampment of the troops about two miles in a westerly direction. The road, as it approaches the fortifications of the Dutch, has mangrove trees on one side, and water on the other. It comprehends, in short, a portion of the bight of the Bay of Natal. The troops had proceeded unmolested to a place called Kangela, which is within some 600 yards from the Boers' camp, when on a sudden a murderous fire of musketry was opened upon them from behind the trees; not a enemy was to be seen. The flashes were the only indication of the proximity of a foe. The troops returned the fire, and the engagement lasted three quarters of an hour. Lieut. Wyatt, a young artillery officer of much promise, was amongst the foremost who fell. He was shot through the head. Captain Lonsdale, of the 27th, was wounded in the arm and leg, though, we are happy to say, not dangerously; also, Lieut. Tunnard, of the 27th. Of the oxen drawing the guns, some, we believe, were killed, and some ran away; so that the field-pieces were obliged to be abandoned, and fell into the hands of the enemy. Captain Smith then retired to his fortifications, and the Boers, as we hear, under the impression that they had annihilated the whole of the troops, subsequently made an attack upon the British camp, when they were repulsed, with the loss, it is supposed, of a considerable number of their companions; a quantity of horses and guns were afterwards found upon the spot, belonging to the slain. A Dane, it is said, betrayed the intentions of Captain Smith to the Boers, and thus enabled them to waylay their opponents.—Cape Frontier Times, June 18.

UNITED STATES, CANADA, &c.—COWES, Monday Night.—His Belgian Majesty's steam-ship British Queen, has just arrived from New York, having made the passage in 15 days. She left New York on the 7th instant, to which date inclusive she brings letters and papers. Her intelligence is highly favourable. The American papers say but little on the claim

The north-western boundary, it is thought, will not be entered into at present, as the necessary surveys have not been completed, and will take a long time ere they are so. It is understood in New York that the questions are to be submitted to the Senate separately. This is not the case—the whole of the questions will be first arranged, and then submitted to the Senate simultaneously, as forming a complete treaty; and it is fully expected that, as a whole, they will not meet with any opposition, as the majority of the Senate are under stood to be predisposed to terminate the matter amicably if possible. Amongst the passengers who have come over by the British Queen, are Mr. Silas, Mr. Stilwell, United States Marshal for the district of New York, who has left Washington as a special messenger, but on matters no way connected with Lord Ashburton's mission although it is supposed to the contrary in New York. He has proceeded to Antwerp and Paris, and will then visit England. The Tariff-bill has passed the Senate by a majority of three, but it is expected that the President will veto it. The Warspite, 50, Captain Lord John Hay, was still at New York. The following are extracts from the New York papers :—

THE TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.—It gives us great pleasure to announce that everything connected with this important affair is now in a fair way to be speedily and amicably settled. The last of the British Commissioners from Maine passed through this city yesterday, on his way home from Washington. He states that all the details of the treaty, as we have before given them, have been agreed to, and signed by all the parties interested; and nothing remains but the ratification of the treaty by the Senate, which is expected now to take place in a very few days. This is a good sign. And in addition to the above, we learn that Governor Kent, of Maine, who is still in Washington, has written letters home, expressing his full conviction that the boundary treaty will be confirmed by the United States Senate.

BALTIMORE, Aug. 6.—From gentlemen who arrived from Washington last evening, I learn that there are rumours that Lord Ashburton has determined upon leaving the city in a few days, preparatory for his return to Europe, and that the boundary difficulties between the two nations had been positively and amicably settled. A decline of 50 cents per bbl. has taken place in flour during the past week. The market is now well-stored, and Howard-street standard brands can be had at 5 dollars 50 per bbl.; City Mill, too, has fallen to 5 dol. 87½; Susquehanna, 5 dol. 62½; inspections of the week are 10,059 barrels, and 324 half barrels, besides 92 barrels rye flour, and 259 corn meal. Wheat is coming in plentifully, and rules from 1 dol. to 1 dol. 15, accading to quality. Beef cattle in demand, and sales were made at 4 to 5 dollars per 100lbs. Whiskey in bbls. 26 cents, in bbls 26 cents.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.—NEW YORK, Sunday, Aug. 7.—Upon this subject there is not much that can be said to send out by the British Queen for the information of our numerous European readers. We are without a tariff, without a currency, without credit, and should be better off if, for a few months, we were without a Congress. The Tariff Bill has passed both houses; and as it still contains the distribution clause, the President will veto it. Still the Attorney-General thinks that the present law is sufficient to enable the Government to collect the revenues under it. In the meantime all duties are paid under protest. Congress will adjourn in a delicious row in two or three weeks, perhaps in less time. We hope so; but not before the Senate passes the treaty with Great Britain. In the meantime all the interested parties are satisfied with the treaty, and Lord Ashburton is preparing to return home. A few miserable politicians and office-beggars are trying to form a third political party, but it will not succeed. The cotton and corn crops are abundant, and Heaven is smiling on the industrious and deserving. In the meantime Satan takes care of his own in Wall-street, and is stirring up the elements of strife in Congress.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 8.—Thousands of working men are out of employ in this city and its vicinity. As connected with the subject of employment in this country, a stronger commentary cannot be adduced than the fact that three packets which have left New York for Europe, within the last few days, have carried back again to their homes nearly 500 emigrants who had recently arrived. The Andromache left New York on Thursday for Liverpool, with 220 returned emigrants. This city (long designated as the city of "brotherly love") has been called upon to put down a most infuriated and destructive riot, excited by a procession of negro blacks, who imprudently, but not unadvisedly, displayed certain banners, intended to be descriptive of the horrors of slavery. This display, it was supposed, had been suggested by the abolitionists, and was considered as an insult to those who admired and sustained on this subject the institutions of the south. As these institutions are guaranteed by the constitution of the United States, the indignity offered was almost universal; and the feeling of indignation and resentment was co-extensive. It is true the great majority of those who took an active part in the riots were of the labouring class of citizens; but they were countenanced, if not cheered on, by many in more elevated stations of life. It is believed that there is not a city in the Union where the blacks have received more kindness and support than in Philadelphia. A large proportion of the population are of the sect of Quakers, and for more than half a century slavery has not been felt in that city. It might fairly have been presumed, that if there was a spot in the United States where such an exhibition might be permitted peaceably to pass on, that was the spot. And yet, what has this display produced in the city of "brotherly love?" Nothing but riot, bloodshed, and great destruction of property. Innocent women and children driven from their quiet homes, and hunted from street to street, and place to place, like beasts of prey.

CANADA.—All is quiet and happy in this part of the world. Lady Bagot has given a grand drawing-room in Quebec. A great number of distinguished ladies and gentlemen were presented to her. Her dress was remarkable for a large display of jewels in her tiara and stomacher.

FIVE DAYS LATER FROM AMERICA.—LIVERPOOL, Wednesday.—By a very speedy voyage of the Great Western steamer, commanded by Captain Hoskins, we have been put into possession of New York journals to the 13th instant, inclusive. They contain some rather important intelligence, as they further corroborate the favourable advices regarding the settlement of the heretofore disputed questions between Great Britain and the United States. We further learn that a messenger from Lord Ashburton has arrived by this steamer, and that he is the bearer of the foregoing favourable news. The Revenue Bill has passed the House by a small number, but the President had thought proper to veto the measure, by which act he had incurred the displeasure of a great portion of the community of the United States. We have no other items of political intelligence of importance by this arrival. Cotton had met a moderate demand since the departure of the last steamer, and prices had been steadily supported. Flour was rather dull, without any material variation in price.

PROVINCIAL.

STIRLING, AUG. 18.—THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND.—In the prospect of this event, Messrs. Wilson, Bannockburn, have received orders to prepare a large quantity of tartan for the Breadalbane and Drummond Highlanders

THE OPENING OF ERITH PIER.—The opening of the new pier, which took place on Monday, was very gaily attended, and, on the whole, highly auspicious. The pier is a neat little erection, well calculated for the convenience of those who may wish to take a summer noon's ramble upon this side of Gravesend.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.—Our readers will learn with pleasure that Dr. Howley is recovering, though gradually, from his recent rather severe indisposition.

DEATH OF LORD GRAY.—Lord Gray expired on Saturday last at Edinburgh. The late Francis Gray, Lord Gray of Gray, county Perfar, in the peerage of Scotland, was fourth son of John, twelfth Lord Gray. His lordship was born on the 1st of September, 1765, and was, consequently, within a few days of completing his seventy-seventh year. On the death of his brother William John, fourteenth Lord Gray, in December, 1807, he succeeded to the family honours and estates. He leaves issue, the Hon. John Gray, born on the 12th of May, 1798 (now Lord Gray), who married on the 23rd July, 1833, Miss Mary Anne Ainslie, daughter of the late Lieut.-Colonel C. P. Ainslie; the Hon. Madelina Gray, born on the 11th of November, 1795; and the Hon. Jane Anne, born on the 24th of July, 1806, and married on the 17th of April, 1834, Captain C. P. Ainslie, Royal Dragoons. The deceased Lord was for many years one of the Scotch representative peers, but at the last election of peers his lordship retired in favour of Lord Rollo.

LONDON AND DOVER RAILWAY.—The line from Tonbridge to Headcorn, a distance of eight miles, is opened. This opening brings the line into proximity with Staplehurst, which is within seven miles of Maidstone, to which a branch line is intended to be made, and the whole length to Dover will be completed by the end of next year. Besides the great passenger traffic, which amounts to more than £1000 a week, the company will carry on a large traffic in hops and other agricultural produce.

THE HOPS.—We have scarcely ever seen a greater distinction in the quality of hops grown on good lands, than we have this year. From the excessive drought, the flea has made very extensive ravages, and it is impossible to form an idea of the extent of growth. The duty is under our former quotation, £150,000. We have heard of odds being taken against £150,000 Twenty-four hours' rain at this crisis would wonderfully increase the quotations.

SHOCK OF AN EARTHQUAKE.—On Monday last, between six and seven o'clock, the shock of an earthquake was sensably felt in the neighbourhood of Bangor, North Wales. The earthquake was felt at the same hour in every part of the county of Anglesey, but, from what information has come to hand, it appears that the south-eastern portion of the island was chiefly visited.

ALARMING FIRE AT SALISBURY.—At eight o'clock on Saturday evening a very alarming fire broke out in the extensive premises belonging to Messrs. Roe and Co., at Fain's Hill, Salisbury. At twenty minutes past nine the roof of the building fell in and illuminated the whole city.

BRISTOL.—ACRAMAN'S BANKRUPTCY.—On Saturday a meeting was held under this flat at the Commercial-rooms, when Mr. W. E. Acraman was examined by Mr. Wynne Williams, of London, at considerable length, as to the circumstances under which a deed of gift was executed by the elder ACRAMAN, in favour of his son, of certain pictures and effects, of the value of about £15,000, and the commissioners seemed inclined to determine against the validity of the deed, but deferred giving a final judgment on the case, as in all probability the question would have to be determined by the Court of Review.

THE MURDER AT SWANSEA.—On Wednesday week the coroner's inquest was resumed at the Town-hall, and evidence brought forward, which seems to show that the barbarous outrage was premeditated. By the evidence of a young man, it appears that he, together with the five murderers, were drinking at a public-house called the Rising Sun, and that they left about twelve o'clock on Monday night. Soon after, he stated, the whole six met again at the house of Davies, one of the men implicated, but he denied that they met there by appointment. It would appear that Davies, at whose house they met, was the instigator of the whole affair, simply because the deceased and some other Irishmen had undertaken to work under price. After a very lengthened inquiry, the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against the five prisoners—William Davies, William Thomas, David Rees, John Evans, and John Lewis, all natives of Swansea and the neighbourhood. They heard the verdict with the greatest indifference. The name of the unfortunate deceased was John Bowling.

MYSTERIOUS SUICIDE ON THE EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY. At a late hour on Saturday night Mr. Baker, the coroner, held an inquest at the Coborn Arms, Coborn-road, Bow, on the body of Wm. Weir, a farrier, aged 42 John O'Brien, constable of the Eastern Counties Railway Police, said that on Saturday morning, about four o'clock, whilst on a ballast engine going from the Shoreditch termipus of the Eastern Counties Railway to Stratford, he discovered, near the Old Ford-road, Bow, the deceased apparently in a sitting posture against the railings of a gentleman's garden, abutting on the railway. He wondered what he could be doing there, and stopped the engine. On going back to the spot he found the deceased strangled by a rope attached to some hooks fixed on the top of the palings. There was not sufficient height for him to stand up and hang himself, and it appears as if he must have reduced himself to a sitting posture in order to effect such a purpose. He was a married man, but was at variance with his wife, (who was in excellent circumstances) and did not live with her. Verdict—"That the deceased was found dead apparently by hanging, but whether by his own act or that of any other person or persons there was no evidence to shew."

FATAL ACCIDENT FROM LIGHTNING.—In the appalling thunderstorm which occurred on Wednesday week, a poor woman, the wife of a miner, John Ward, of Birdwell, was in the house with her six children, during its progress. The whole household was in extreme alarm, and she had just commended her children to the keeping of Heaven, when a most vivid flash of lightning, followed by an instantaneous and awful crash occured; the lightning burst through the roof, darted down the walls, shattering the works of a clock to atoms, and laid the poor woman a corpse on the floor, leaving her terrified household uninjured. Leeds Mercury.

THE OAK.

BY BARRY CORNWALL.

The owl to her mate is calling;
The river his hoarse song sings;
But the oak is marked for falling,
That has stood for a hundred springs.
Hark! a blow, and a dull sound follows;
A second—he lays his head;
A third—and the wood's dark hollows
Now know that their king is dead.

His arms from their trunk are riven;
His body all barked and squared;
And he's now, like a felon, driven
In chains to the stone-yard:
He's sawn through the middle, and turned
For the ribs of a frigate free;
And he's caulked, and pitched, and burned;
And now he's fit for sea!

Oh! now—with his wings outspread,
Like a ghost (if a ghost may be),
He will triumph again, though dead,
And be dreaded in every sea:
The lightning will blaze about,
And wrap him in flaming pride;
And the thunder-loud cannon will shout,
In the fight from the bold broadside.

And when he has fought, and won,
And been honoured from shore to shore,
And his journey on earth is done—
Why—what can he ask for more?
There is nought that a king can claim,
Or a poet, or warrior bold,
Save a rhyme and a short-lived name,
And to mix with common mould!

PORTRAIT OF SIR ROBERT PEEL.—By the time the presentation of petitions is concluded it may be half-past five o'clock, the hour at which the Prime Minister usually enters the house. You observe that tall man, one arm on his breast, the other stretched under the skirts of his blue frock-coat, walking briskly up the floor of the house, without stop or stay. Now he bows gracefully to the Speaker, and takes his seat in the centre of the Treasury Bench, next to the Home Secretary. He looks round, and seems care-worn and exhausted, as if the official duties of the day were sufficient for him, without being in addition harnessed to those of the senatorial night. He is what most women and some men would call a handsome man; his features are regular, his complexion clear, his hair fair; dressed neither above nor under the good taste of a gentleman. If you did not know him, you might imagine him a wealthy merchant, a prosperous manufacturer, or banker; his expression and manner approach more nearly that of one of the highest commercial men than any other; that man is the Prime Minister of England. Yes, there he sits, the Premier, and we cannot help having a good stare at him. Not that he is more or less remarkable in point of physical stature than the generality of men. he is evidently neither an Irish giant nor Tom Thumb the Great; nor is there anything particularly statesmanlike in his air, manner, or expression. He is a prepossessing looking man, with a letter-of-recommendation face, and there's an end on't. He looks one of those men you would select in a stage-coach, or on the deck of a steamer, for advances towards a traveling acquaintanceship, satisfied beforehand that you would meet with a favourable reception. But when one contemplates the man's position when you come to consider how much is in his power for good or evil how much depends upon him—what a large small human family looks to him as to some presiding genius, upon whose will depend the alteration of public prosperity or distress—when you think of the weighty interests intrusted to his vigilance and care—when you recollect that, placed as he is, war may be proclaimed from those steps, and that arm, no longer than another man's, can reach the Antipodes in mercy, vengeance, or justice—when you remember that to him, simple as he sits there, is delegated the patronage of the Crown of Great Britain and Ireland, and that the fates and fortunes of the aspiring intellect of England, in every way in which it can be exhibited as connected with public life, are more or less in his hands—that a smile from that man is fortune, and his frown condemnation from expected honours and coveted rewards—I say, whether you regard the weight of his responsibility, the depth of his care, or the height of his power, you cannot behold the Chief Minister of England without some emotion, with which you are unaffected in contemplating any private man, of a station however exalted.—The Prime Minister swells beyond the circumference of ordinary mortals. He is not a man; he is a body politic. We do not behold a Right Honourable Baronet; he is before our eyes a great quivering abstraction. In royalty we regard the pride and pomp; but in him we see the circumstance of executive authority. Yet, great as he is, high as he is, above us as he is placed, he is, after all, the creature of the Crown, the humble servant of the law; the power that gave him power is yet more powerful than he; he is but as one of the genii, who in his turn is obliged to obey the spirits that obey him; he is tenant of power only at will; he holds all that his magnificent pavilion bestows upon him, and enables him to bestow upon others, of the people of this country. Recollecting that the power of a Premier is but the power of the public will, devolved upon one man, exercised by one man for the time being, we have a greater interest in him; he is nearer us, and all that concerns him is our concern. Bentley's Miscellany.

HOW TO BEAT A WIFE. The editor of an American paper has found a way to beat his wife in the kindest and most considerate manner. He has her mesmerised, and then flogs the operator like vengeance. As feeling, taste, &c., are transferred, she catches a licking, and the world won't call the husband a brute.

THE RIOTS IN THE COUNTRY.

DISTURBANCES IN THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.

MANCHESTER.

SATURDAY.—To-day the soldiers have had a little exercise and excursion, but of the most harmless description; and, on the whole, we think they would scarcely have had better sport if they had been invited to a fox-hunt. For several days a large tract of land about three miles from Manchester, between the Bolton and Bury roads, called Kersall-moor, has been the general rendezvous of the disaffected, who have from thence sallied forth to the neighbouring works to turn out the hands, but in many cases have been defeated. On Friday an attack was made on the works in the neighbourhood, and everything was arranged for a brush. Gentlemen on horseback were scouring the country to ascertain from what quarter the turn-outs would march, in order to give the proper warning, but although kept in suspense, the establishments were not molested that day. About ten o'clock this morning, the colliers mustered at the usual place, and some delegates from the distant works harangued them on the subject of the great distress that existed among their body, but advised them to persist in their refusal to work, and to endeavour to prevent others from working, until the masters had acceded to their demands. Chartism was denounced, and it was urged that they should confine themselves to the question of wages. They then broke up from the Moor, and passed on to some works near Clifton, a few miles distant, in order to act on the suggestions of the delegates. In the meantime, a messenger had been dispatched to Manchester, to apprise the authorities of their proceedings and intentions; and we have no doubt a couple of cyphers, as usual, were added to the right side of the actual number of the mob. Determined to act with spirit and effect, the two generals, Sir Thomas Arbuthnot and Sir William Warre, and staff, Colonel Wemyss, and Messrs. Wankley and Wood, county magistrates, with Captain Burke and two companies of the 1st Dragoons, two field-pieces of the Royal Horse Artillery, and two companies of the Grenadier Guards, accompanied by 50 of the police force and two omnibuses, left Manchester at noon for the locality of the rioters. They proceeded out of the Regent's-road, in the direction of Pendleton, and were guided in the track of the rioters, and came in sight of them in a field close to the Bury high-road, when the generals and staff, with 10 dragoons, immediately started off in advance. One look at the red coats was quite sufficient: no fox ever showed a greater desire for the security of his person than did these gentry on breaking cover; nor did ever a guerilla band take so many roads to safety. At the words "gallop! charge!" the colliers gave leg-bail, setting off in all directions—scampering over hedges, climbing gates, running through banks, leaping ditches, swimming the canal, and wading the river. But the dragoons were on them, and there was no chance of escape, and less disposition to resist. The generals and staff pursued a party to the Bury and Bolton Canal, across which a barge was laid, with a plank to communicate with the opposite bank; but in the scrambling to get over, the plank gave way, and about a dozen were immersed in the water. The dragoons made for a bridge at a little distance, and were in time to cut off their escape, and to capture nine, two of whom were so exhausted by the sousing they had in the canal, that they could not walk. They were handed over to the police, who handcuffed them, and conducted them to an omnibus. The staff then forded the river Irwell, and proceeded to Henley, thence to Wardfield Church, got out on the Bury new road, and rode up to a tract of moss or bog. Here they found four men, who, on being questioned, said they were pigeon flying to Oldham, but the general, suspicious of their veracity, ordered them into custody. During this time the remainder of the detachments had not been idle. Dividing themselves, they made a wide circuit, sweeping round in fine style, and driving, as it were, the mob into dozens, making them prisoners, and handing them to the police. They had to ride some distance to get through at a gate or a gap, to follow the terrified turn-outs; but they leaped the hedges after the runaways, and immediately secured them. One or two of the dragoons got stuck in the moss, and with difficulty extricated their horses. Many of the colliers took to earth and burrowed in holes and pits, but they were found out; and a few laid down in the potato fields among the potato tops, but, like the ostriches, they only hid their heads. The prisoners were all collected together by the activity of the Grenadiers and police, and were secured in the omnibuses, many of them hatless, shoeless, and almost breathless. In the course of their excursion the staff went to Compton's works. The men were called out, and the general gave them a lecture, giving them to understand that, if disorderly, he should do his duty; but, if they continued to work, they should be protected. The detachment returned to Manchester about four o'clock, having fifty-seven prisoners, whom they safely lodged in the New Bailey. One or two such examples as this, and intimidation will soon be at an end. There was no one the least hurt in the capture.

MONDAY EVENING.—Affairs in this town have been very peaceable during the day, although the return to labour has not been near so general as was anticipated. At two o'clock information was received at the town-hall that a very large assemblage of persons was taking place in the ground near the Tinker's Gardens, St. George's road. It was considered by the authorities prudent to disperse the meeting, which was done with but a slight resistance. Affairs in the out-districts of Lancashire remain in a tranquil state.

TUESDAY MORNING, Eleven o'Clock.—Everything is going on as satisfactorily as the best lover of peace and order can desire. The workmen who resumed employment yesterday were not interrupted, and several more of the mills have returned to work to-day.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.—Things preserve their tranquillity to-day, the hands returning willingly to employment. The only attempt to disturb the peace of yesterday was the effort of some hands to turn out the workpeople of Messrs. Kennedy's mill, in which they were only partially successful.

A few meetings were held in different parts of the town yesterday, but none of any account to disturb the peace. One, of the power-loom weavers, of about 400 or 500, was held in Travis-street, who resolved to remain out another fortnight, whatever privations they might submit to, or until they got the wages of 1839. The pensioners, who have been sworn in and acting as special constables, have all been discharged, but it has been thought advisable not at present to reduce the number of special constables who are in constant attendance at the Town-hall and other stations.

Intelligence was received at nine o'clock this morning, from Oldham, that a large meeting of factory people and colliers was held at 7 o'clock, when they were addressed by several speakers. They then dispersed into groups of about 200 each, one of which made an attack upon a mill near the church, breaking in the doors and windows. They were assailed by the police, who were, however, driven back, one being seriously injured in the head by a blow from a stone, and another having several of his ribs broken. The town was completely under mob law, and the authorities had sent to Ashton for military aid. The original meeting consisted of nearly 4000 persons.

Yesterday morning, about twelve o'clock, Mr. J. F. Foster, chairman of the quarter sessions, took his seat along with the stipendiary magistrate, Mr. D. Maude, at the New Bailey Court-house, for the purpose of pursuing the further examination of the prisoners charged with taking part in the present movement.

Several were examined and committed for trial.

BLACKBURN, PRESTON, BOLTON, WIGAN, &c.

THURSDAY.—Accounts from these places, and various other small manufacturing towns, all concur in stating that the public peace is not likely at present to be broken again, but the resumption of work is by no means general, in many cases the men still demanding the wages they had two years ago, and from which they state reductions have been made to the extent of at least 15 per cent.

STOCKPORT.

The masters, mill-owners, &c., opened their works generally on Tuesday, in deference to public opinion, but there appeared to be no disposition on the part of the workmen to resume their labour, and sufficient hands did not return to work the mills, so that they were again in many places closed. In the course of the morning, however, some apprehension was caused in the town in consequence of a large meeting assembling at a village called Godley, about three miles from Stockport, in the open air. The fears of the inhabitants are now, however, abated, and it is the general opinion that a few days will see work again resumed. This morning (Wednesday) all is peaceable, and some of the special constables are discharged.

BURSLEM.

MONDAY.—All is perfectly quiet. Several of the porcelain manufactories have resumed work this morning, and nothing need be feared for the future. At Hanley a large meeting has been held, and an address of condolence has been forwarded to the Rev. Mr. Aitken, on the destruction of his house and property by the rioters.

DUDLEY.

SUNDAY.—All quiet, and the magistrates are determined, as in Birmingham, to allow no begging and no public assemblages of the people.

WEDNESDAY.—At present all is quiet; but on Monday evening, either for malice or amusement, a ridiculous attempt was made to blow up a portion of the castle ruins. This was done by introducing several pounds of gunpowder into the hollow part of the foundation of the guard-room. The combustion displaced a stone or two, injured the adjacent trees, and made a deuced noise. The affair naturally excited some alarm in the neighbourhood until the circumstance was explained.

STAFFORD.

AUGUST 21.—From about 30 to 40 prisoners have, for several evenings together, been brought, per train, from Whatmore to Stafford, as persons concerned in the riots of the late week; and 60 more are still in custody not yet heard before the magistrates. The number in the county gaol is already between 600 and 700, including other cases. Some of the Chartists have, not inappropriately, been stowed in the county asylum—a palpable case of monomania. Last night 39 were brought (30 males and 9 females); several of the former not more than 12 years of age, all young, and all assuming a sort of dare-devil manner. The women were mostly youthful, several of delicate and decent appearance; they are chiefly committed for pilfering plate and other things at the burnt houses, one of them asserting that she only took them with a view to restore them to the plundered parties. Each night these captives are met at the station-house by a detachment of the Wolverhampton Yeomanry Cavalry, doing duty here, and a posse of special constables; they are thus escorted to the county prison. The Wolverhampton troop are now the only military here; the specials and a small band of pensioners are doing daily duty, mustering and drilling within the newly-extended area of the county gaol, which is beginning to assume the shape and capacity of a fortress, having projecting towers at the angles to command the flanks; while the lodges at the entrance is mounted with ordnance under the direction of Captain St. George, of the artillery. It would be injustice not to notice the admirable and soldier-like appearance and conduct of the Wolverhampton troop. Though yesterday and to-day have been a sort of lull in the insurrectionary storm, we have many indications of a menacing under current of action, which cannot be mistaken as to its intents, however short it may prove of further extensive mischief. Straggling parties have been passing through this town and its suburbs for the last two or three nights, and others early in the evenings; their general direction being for the south, where the colliers are nearly all out. Lord Talbot's men at the Preston mines have been sworn in as special constables; but how far this will secure them from the influence of the mob movement, if continued, it is difficult to say. The price of coal at Wolverhampton has risen 10s. to 12s. per ton; selling now at £1 10s. per ton; a severe and oppressive tax on the middle classes, inns, &c., even at this period of the year, especially as coming in aggravation of the present ruinous increase of the poor-rate. The country round Wolverhampton, extending to Dudley, &c., is looked forward to with some suspicion, as the theatre of violence for the beginning of the week. The Chartists in this town express great confidence in the pending results; and there can be no doubt that a wide system of communication is kept up between the different places where the political select chiefly reside.

WEDNESDAY.—The number of prisoners in the county gaol last night was 693, among whom is Richards, the notorious Chartist leader from Hanley. Lord Sandon has remained in town for the last two or three days assisting the authorities.

LEICESTER.

FRIDAY.—Large bodies of men, women, and children are walking about the streets; the police have orders not to allow any one to stand still; a slight resistance has been made in one or two instances, but the parties were soon overpowered. Daniel Ashwell has been taken to the station-house charged with exciting the mob. The mob, finding the military and civil force brought against them too powerful, say, that since they "cannot do anything with sticks and stones, they will serve out their oppressors some other way." This expression, we regret to state, appears to convey an intention to return to the "Swing" system, as, at this hour (9 P.M.), an alarm of fire has been given, which proves to have occurred in a rick of hay, the property of Mr. Haines, hosier, standing in a field belonging to the corporation, adjoining the road from Leicester to Lutterworth. The mob had held a meeting near the place not more than an hour before, and there is too much reason to fear that the stack has been intentionally set on fire. The engines were quickly on the spot; the rick was, however, entirely destroyed.

Twenty minutes past ten.—Mr. Goodyer, with eleven of the county police, have left the town by the railway train for Loughborough, where a large meeting of Chartists is being held. In the early part of the day the latter had paraded the streets, and entered the factories of Mr. Cartwright and Mr. Warner, and compelled the hands to turn-out. In the afternoon a body of them proceeded to Sheepshed and Hathem, and entered the houses of all the framework-knitters, for the purpose of causing them to leave their work; many refused, but in each instance a part of their frames was taken away, so that they were obliged to discontinue their labour. Hayfields, the policeman who was attacked by the mob last Friday, and has since been reported, but we are happy to state, falsely, to have died from the injuries inflicted, was surrounded by a large party of men, who groaned and used threats towards him. Mr. Phillipps, a local magistrate, sent for a body of special constables, who succeeded in dispersing the crowd. Mr. Dawson and the Rev. J. Dudley, two other magistrates, attended at the house of Hayfields, to take his depositions relative to the attack made upon him and his house on the 12th instant. Warrants have been issued against six of the parties concerned. At Moira the men are erecting barricades near the bath and colliery.

AUGUST 20, six p.m.—An express arrived at the county office at eleven a.m. from Mr. Goodyer, the chief constable for the county, stating that he found Loughborough in such a state of disorganization, that he thought it imprudent to leave. A large meeting of the Chartists was addressed last night by a man named John Skerrington, a leader amongst the body, and one of the delegates to London in 1839, to obtain an interview with the then Prime Minister, who used language of so exciting a nature, as to cause the magistrates to read the Riot Act, and issue a warrant for his apprehension. This morning Mr. Goodyer went to his house and executed the warrant, after which he was taken before Messrs. Phillipps and Dawson and the Rev. J. Dudley. Evidence was adduced to show that the conduct of the prisoner was of such a description as to cause or lead to a breach of the peace. He was called upon to enter into his own recognizance of £50, and find two sureties in £25 each, to answer for his future good behaviour for six months; and, in default, committed to the common gaol. To prevent any attempt at rescue, he was placed in a fly between two policemen, with Mr. Goodyer on the outside, escorted by an officer and eight privates of the 3rd Dragoon Guards. Upon their arrival at Leicester, the greatest excitement prevailed, but no interruption, farther than hissing and groaning, was offered. At Ashley Woulds and neighbourhood the state of excitement is such, that the magistrates have given orders for all stragglers and beggars to be apprehended and committed for three months as vagrants, as it appears several men from the Potteries are about in disguise, endeavouring to persuade the colliers to remain out. Apprehensions are entertained at the Moira collieries that a body of the Staffordshire men will come up and compel them to leave their work, which they, with those working at the Bagworth and Swadlincote pits, are unwilling to do. A bill has just been issued, offering a reward of £15 for the discovery of the perpetrators of a malicious act, viz., the killing of one sheep and sticking of another, belonging to Mr. Wood, a member of the yeomanry. There is too much reason to fear that this is only the beginning of a series of similar outrages.

SUNDAY, August 21.—Since six o'clock yesterday evening nothing has occurred to disturb the public tranquillity in the town. Information was received at the county-office by the eight o'clock p.m. train, that the colliers at the Snibston pits had made an amicable arrangement with their employers, the result of which was that the men would return to work on Monday. A meeting of the colliers at Whitwick is to be held to-morrow (Monday), when it is expected they also will return to work.

HALIFAX.

This town has been the scene of much rioting during the last week, which has only been quelled by the soldiers clearing the streets at the point of the bayonet. The magistrates had taken every precaution to preserve the peace, by ordering a troop of Lancers and Hussars from Leeds, in addition to which they had the assistance of a part of the 61st Regiment of Infantry, and a considerable number of special constables. The concourse of people, which has been computed at not less than from 15,000 to 20,000, came from the neighbourhood of Bradford, Hebden-bridge, Todmorden, and there were some women who even walked from Oldham, and appeared quite hearty in their novel undertaking. There were at least 5000 from Hebden-bridge; and they entered the town singing the hundredth psalm, the women forming the middle portion of the procession. On the arrival of the procession from the neighbourhood of Bradford, at about eleven o'clock, the Riot Act was read by George Pollard, Esq., and it was read again on the arrival of the Todmorden men. The mob, numbering from 12,000 to 15,000 persons, some of them most ferocious looking, directed their course first at the mill of Messrs. John Akroyd and Son, the Shed-mill, at Haley-hill. They entered the weaving place of Messrs. Akroyd. The number of men and women who marched up to Mr. Akroyd's mill could not be less than 10,000, covering, as they did, the whole line of road from the North-bridge to Haley-hill. They arrived at this mill shortly after twelve, and the work-people being at dinner, the turn-outs were saved the trouble of clearing the premises, but two of their number demanded an interview with Mr. Ackroyd, at which they insisted that the plugs should be drawn out of the boilers. Mr. Akroyd, thinking probably that opposition would be unavailing, not only agreed to this modest request, but he also permitted one of his workmen to assist the deputation in their labour of mischief.

SATURDAY EVENING.—Our accounts from the neighbouring districts go to show that the insurrection is nearly at an end. The police and military are everywhere capturing many rioters. This town has resumed its wonted appearance; business has been still further resumed, and all promises fairly for the whole of the mills recommencing on Monday. Three more rioters have been captured by the authorities of Northowram. The following public notice has just been issued to the mill-owners of Halifax and the neighbourhood:—"The magistrates earnestly exhort those mill-owners who have not already set their mills to work to do so immediately, and to furnish their workmen with arms; also to give them instructions to apprehend all persons that are seen skulking about their premises, and instantly to seize any man who may bring an order to turn out their people; and should any one attempt to touch the plugs of their boilers, and the party should be too numerous to be apprehended, then to give such person or persons notice, that if he or they do not instantly desist, the consequences will be fatal, as they had received orders from their masters which they were determined to enforce, to protect their property at all hazards."

SUNDAY. We are evidently becoming much excited here, and it is doubtful how long peace may be preserved. Yesterday morning large placards of a stirring character were posted through the town, announcing a great meeting to take place on Monday, on a piece of waste ground near the Asylum. The police pulled the bills down wherever they could do so, and, from amongst other places, they pulled one from the wall of the Christian Chartist Church, Newhall-street, and took one or two men into custody for carrying boards about the streets with the same bill. The parties were conveyed to the office of Mr. Burgess, chief constable of police, and in a short time after Mr. C. Sturge attended to give bail for the men. Mr. O'Neil also attended to complain of the police for having torn the bills from his chapel; when a consultation ensued between the commissioner and some other of the authorities, and the parties were discharged forthwith, with a caution not to go about the streets with the bills. In a short time after four neatly-attired women, two very young and rather handsome, and two middle-aged women, belonging to the Christian Chartist body, came out into the streets, each carrying a board with the objectionable placard. They walked up Newstreet, and into Paradise-street, where they, with a man, who was in front of them, were taken up by the police, and conveyed to the station in Crooked-lane. They were soon after removed to the police-station, where, after a consultation of the magistrates, they were discharged, with a promise that they would not appear again in the streets with the placards. The remainder of the day and night passed over quietly, although in the utmost uncertainty. There was a great number of persons walking about the streets until a late hour. This morning a meeting of Chartists was to have been held near the Vulcan Foundry, but the police prevented the assemblage. No violence occurred on either side. The authorities have issued a caution in reference to a great meeting announced for to-morrow. It will not be allowed to take place. The intelligence from Dudley is not favourable. Precautions have been deemed necessary there, and the magistrates have issued notice of preventing all public meetings.

MONDAY, Ten o'Clock, P.M. Notwithstanding the injunction of the magistrates to the contrary, and the dispersion of the morning assembly, small meetings have been held in various parts of the town; but there is an overwhelming military force, and the authorities have been sitting throughout the day. An effort was made by the physical force Chartists to hold a meeting near the railway station to-night. It was attended by about 400 persons, but was effectually dispersed by three policemen.

LANCASTER.

TUESDAY EVENING.—The town has been quiet all day, but the hands in the mills, with two exceptions, still remain out; there appears to be no attempt to resume work. All is uncertainty.

WIGAN.

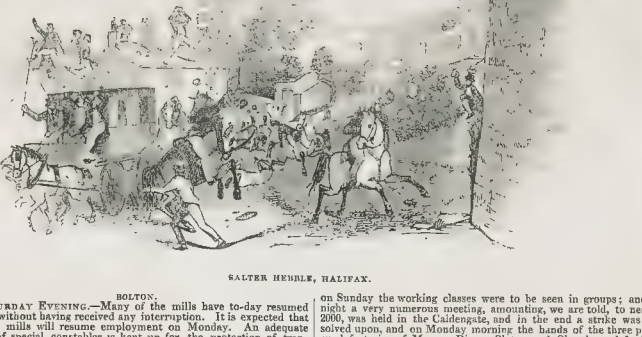
MONDAY EVENING.—A meeting of the mill-owners was held on the evening of Saturday, to decide upon the point whether the mills were to start this morning or not. Nearly all were present, and many coal proprietors and agents also in attendance, ready to conform to the decision of the mill-owners. It was unanimously agreed upon to commence work, as the town presented such a satisfactory appearance of quietness. Accordingly, the gigantic chimneys were seen to emit at an early hour the dense volumes of smoke which proclaim that all around is in active operation.

ASHTON.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.—A mob assembled at Mr. Wanklyn's mill this morning, shortly after the military left for Oldham, and attempted to turn out the hands, but they were dispersed by a troop of Dragoons.

WESTBROMWICH AND OLDBURY.

WEDNESDAY.—Several of the pits resumed work yesterday, and this morning the example has again been followed; but we regret to say that successful efforts have been used by a large mob from the neighbourhood to stop the works, and in many instances the workmen have been sadly injured.



SALTER HEBBLE, HALIFAX.

BOLTON.

SATURDAY EVENING.—Many of the mills have to-day resumed work, without having received any interruption. It is expected that all the mills will resume employment on Monday. An adequate force of special constables is kept up for the protection of tranquility.

LEIGH.

FRIDAY EVENING.—The town remains tolerably peaceable, being protected by a party of the 60th Rifles.

ASHBY.

We learn from a correspondent in the neighbourhood of Ashby, that the colliers in that locality are all at work, and have never struck or shown any symptoms whatever of discontent: but, on the contrary, they all voluntarily came forward to be sworn in as constables, and have behaved all through the business most nobly.

YORK.

SATURDAY.—About one hundred of the rioters at Leeds, Bradford, Halifax, and other places in the West Riding, are already lodged in York Castle. There having been some apprehension of an attempt to rescue them, a detachment of the 32d Foot arrived here this morning. A squadron of the Yorkshire Hussars are also now on their march from Leeds to this city, and will arrive in the course of the night. The grand jury will re-assemble on Friday next, when it is expected that bills of indictment against all the rioters will be presented, so that they may be immediately tried. There has, however, been some talk of a special commission. A considerable number of the prisoners are boys and lads under twenty. Notice has been given of a Chartist meeting to be held on Knavesmire-common, about a mile and a half from this city, to-morrow Sunday), at which Cooper, and some other well-known Chartists, were expected to attend. A warrant has been issued for the apprehension of Cooper, so that it is not likely he will make his appearance on the occasion. Up to this hour, half-past eleven, P.M., the city is perfectly tranquil.

NEWCASTLE.

MONDAY EVENING. The occurrence of an accidental fire last night at a farm house, near Audley, has given birth to a series of the most ridiculous and unfounded rumours with reference to the state of things in this neighbourhood. Everything remains quiet and peaceable. The authorities are still engaged in apprehending prisoners, of whom not less than 170 have already been committed for trial or imprisonment. Among this number is Richards, the notorious Hanley Chartist, and several others of the firebrand agitators are being actively pursued.

CARLISLE.

MONDAY. Up to Saturday morning, very little sympathy was shown by any of the operatives in this neighbourhood with the movement in the disturbed districts; but it was then whispered that the spinners, who can readily earn from 16s. to 18s. per week, had determined to ask for an advance of wages. They did so, and were met by a firm refusal from their employers. During Saturday some excitement prevailed in the lower districts of the town, and in the evening meetings were held for the purpose of considering what should be done; and there we understand the question of a general strike was freely discussed, but the operatives were certainly not unanimous, and the three principal leaders of the Chartists here were pronounced traitors by many, because they would not countenance it. All day on Sunday the working classes were to be seen in groups; and at night a very numerous meeting, amounting, we are told, to nearly 2000, was held in the Caldengate, and in the end a strike was resolved upon, and on Monday morning the hands of the three principal factories of Messrs. Dixon, Slater, and Chambers, left their work, and despatched numerous deputations to the other mills in the neighbourhood to give them an intimation of what they had done. In the meantime the magistrates had been busily engaged in taking the requisite steps for preserving the peace of the town. Upwards of 140 special constables have been already sworn in, and a requisition was sent to Colonel Goldie commanding two companies of the 66th, stationed in the Castle, that the military might be placed at the disposal of the civil power. The number of soldiers in the garrison is about 140, with a few artillerymen, but no guns capable of being moved. The whole body of the operatives here, likely to be influenced by this movement, is between 4000 and 5000. A deputation from Dumfries has been in the town, to know what the Carlisle people determined on; they say the operatives at Dumfries will follow their example.

TUESDAY.—The measures adopted by the magistrates have proved perfectly sufficient to maintain the public peace here. Last night the yeomanry arrived in the town, under the command of Colonel Hasell, of Dalemain. As they came in they were received by the populace with groans, and they were even slightly pelted, but they soon retired to their quarters, and the night passed off quietly. The intended meeting was held, but, owing to the secession of the Chartist leaders, there were no speakers, and, in fact, the mob is entirely without a leader.

This morning some intelligence arrived from Dalston, which induced the magistrates to despatch some troops there, accompanied by W. Wilde, Esq., an active and intelligent magistrate; but, fortunately, all appearance of riot had disappeared, and they again returned to the city.

At Wigton, a considerable town, about eleven miles from here, with a large manufacturing population, there was considerable excitement all yesterday, especially at night; so much so, that the authorities there have sent for troops, and a detachment of yeomanry, with some foot soldiers of the 66th, have been sent this afternoon.

Carlisle is perfectly quiet now, but large gangs of operatives have been round the neighbouring towns begging. As if they are entirely without money, the strike cannot continue many days without an outbreak; but nothing serious is expected.

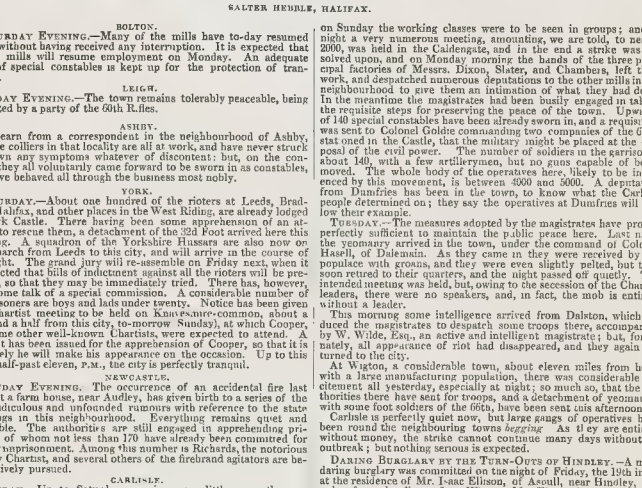
DARING BURGLARY BY THE TURN-OUTS OF HINDLEY.—A most daring burglary was committed on the night of Friday, the 19th inst., at the residence of Mr. Isaac Ellison, of Asoull, near Hindley, and only a few miles distant from Wigan. Mr. Ellison is steward to Sir R. H. Leigh, of Hindley Hall, and was selected as being the most likely to have in his possession a sum of money, for the payment of Sir Robert's labourers on the following day, as will appear from the following particulars:—About nine o'clock, or a little after, on Friday evening, Mr. Ellison, his wife, the servant, and a young man named Henry Hilton, who lodged with them, went to bed, all appearing safe and quiet. Henry Hilton was awoke about 12 o'clock, and on looking out to see what was the cause of the noise he heard, saw a body of men, about 14 in number, armed, approaching the house. He immediately went to apprise Mr. Ellison of the fact, and took his gun, which was loaded. He opened the window and called to the

HILTON.

WEDNESDAY.—Several of the pits resumed work yesterday, but this morning the men were visited by a mob of ruffians, who either prevented their descending the shaft, or in cases where they had actually commenced work, the poor fellows were drawn up and either ducked or beaten.

HYDE.

Only one mill, that of Messrs. Sidebottom and R. Ashton, commenced work on Monday morning, and this had to close again from want of hands. A few weavers who went to work, finding, as they stated, notices on the cloth, that all pieces woven from that time would be paid a halfpenny per piece less than before the commencement of the turn-out, immediately left the mill. All is quiet here.



SCENE AT NORTH-BRIDGE, HALIFAX.

men that he would fire on them if they did not immediately leave the premises. One of them cried out in answer, "If thou does, we'll murder thee;" and immediately a pistol was discharged at him. Hilton then went to another window, and shouted out "Murder" at the top of his voice, on which he was pelted with stones. Mrs. Ellison also did the same, but the alarm was ineffectual. They attempted then to burst open the house-door with crowbars, but it proved too strong for them, and they were consequently in the house," and the back kitchen window, by which an entrance was effected. Some of the villians immediately went upstairs to Mr. Ellison's bed-room, and a gun was presented to his head, whilst one of the party held a pistol pointed at Mrs. Ellison. Both were straightway blindfolded, and their hands were tied together by handkerchiefs. One of the leaders then demanded £100, saying, if it was not given them they would set the house on fire, and the hay-stack as well. Mr. Ellison replied, "That he had not so much money in the house," and the question was asked Mrs Ellison "Where is all the money?" She answered that "it was at the hall" (meaning Sir R. H. Leigh's). One of the villains on this said to some of the others, as if in earnest, "Oh! we'll be there next Wednesday night." They then began to be rough, and ransacked all the boxes and drawers. In one they found near £5; and not being satisfied, asked for the remainder of Mr. Ellison's money, and on being told, more was taken out of his pocket. The young man who lodged with Mr. Ellison was thrown down on the bed, and one of the party stationed over him with a pistol, threatening to shoot him if he stirred. His money was demanded; and on his informing them that 9s. was all he had, they insisted upon having it, and took it from his trousers pocket. The servant girl hid herself under the bed, and was not observed by the burglars. Her box, however, was broken open, and about £1 4s. taken from it, and nearly all her clothing. After remaining in the house some time the villians took their departure, but not without almost killing the house dog, which they used in a most brutal manner. On examining into the extent of the injury sustained, it was discovered that very few places in the house remained that had not been searched and plundered by the wretches who had visited it. Nearly all the victuals had been taken, a gallon of rum, a quantity of wine and brandy, a fowling piece, a pistol, a copper powder-flask and bullet-bag, twelve pairs of men's stockings, and a large quantity of valuable clothing of every description. A reward of £50 has been offered "to any person who will give such information as shall lead to the conviction of the burglars." Nine persons have been apprehended and remanded till to-morrow, and our police are making vigilant inquiry into the matter.

NOTTINGHAM.

MONDAY AFTERNOON.—During the forenoon of this day, an assemblage of several hundreds of operatives, who have not resumed work, took place, on Bulwell Forest and its fields adjoining north of the town, and towards twelve o'clock proceeded on the Arnold-road, to meet a large force coming in that direction; at Sherwood, three miles from the town, 2000 men from Arnold were met and joined by the Nottingham mob. At this juncture they were surprised by the appearance of the magistrates, Mr. W. Taylor, and others, with a strong military force from the barracks; a general flight over hedge and ditch immediately occurred, but two of the ringleaders (Lilly, and a little fellow, a tailor by trade), were captured. At the bottom of Gallows-hill, one mile from the town, the dragoons filed off for the barracks, leaving their prisoners in charge of the civil power. The two men, handcuffed together, walked quietly along, guarded by Slaney, a constable, on foot, and two inspectors of the police (Codd and Potten) on horseback. On reaching the town, a vast crowd assembled, and on passing the Plough and Harrow Inn, which adjoins Charlotte-street, a cry of "Rescue!" was raised. Slaney instantly dragged his two prisoners to the inn door, and the inspectors kept off the mob, although assailed by a shower of stones, brickbats, &c., till the men were safely lodged within, and the door secured. The horsemen, being furiously assailed new excitement among her people, may "Ould Ireland" be her destination, and

"May we be there to see."

The intelligence from America has this week been most gratifying. It would seem to imply the settlement of the Boundary Question. This result indicates also the success of Lord Ashburton's special mission to the United States; and proves the policy of selecting a man whose commercial influence would, in a trading country, give more weight to his name and arguments than the highest character for diplomacy and political intrigue. If the Boundary Question be really set at rest, a boon is gained, let the cost have been ever so concessional; presuming always, as we safely may, that national honour has been neither compromised nor exposed. The Boundary Question was the "bone" to pick between this country and the United States, which kept open a profitable quarrel to one party; because, in a disastrous moment, it could always be inflated into a ready excuse for war; and, at the same time, paralysed the diplomacy of another in regard to abstract questions, which never could be independently treated until that one was closed. If, as we hear, it be closed now, Great Britain has gained more than she can possibly have lost by taking forest in one quarter and giving river in another. In plain terms, however, we are told that the concessions have been mutual, and made in an amicable spirit—and thus we rejoice that the quarrel has become like a military chest of which there are two keys; and which one responsible officer cannot open without the aid and presence of another.

We give, in other columns, illustrations and an account of the consecration of five new colonial bishops, in Westminster Abbey. We approve highly of the sense of piety and decorum which dictated the solemnization of this imposing ceremony. We think that no truly sacred mission ought to have its responsibilities entered upon without care, and dread, and trust: care to do right; dread to do wrong; and trust in that Almighty power which is supreme to reward the one and to avert the other. We believe that all sacred duties should be sacredly enjoined: that a church should not be opened like a ledger, nor a mission rushed at, even with enthusiasm, like a speculation of merchandise or pelf. Solemn aspirations should elevate, solemn influences surround the shepherd who goes to call his fold to God; and, be his religion what it may, wear his soul the mantle of pomp or simplicity, there must still be a strength and purpose in the dedication to his holy calling, which memory shrines and hallows, and conscience treasures as her ammunition against after-sin. In this conviction, applying it to general life, we would preserve a religious marriage ceremony, and hold fast the obligation of an oath. But in the Church, above all, we would foster the impressive observance of a sacred duty, and let no man who is chosen as a high servant of the Lord go without his consecration to Heaven.

It will be seen that the ceremony we have to celebrate took place in a fitting locality—the fine old Abbey of Westminster; and although we much regret that illness should have occasioned the absence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, yet we can well sympathise with the "brotherhood of piety," if we may so call it, which must have existed between the bishops consecrating and the bishops consecrated. These fervently exhorting with the voice, and those humby receiving the spirit of the God who watched them all.

We are, however, necessarily led to a consideration of the question of duty; to a hope that the noviciate prelates may not be found wanting in their after career; to a regret that the sphere of the usefulness and piety of all bishops is not far more widely and efficiently extended. We should like to see a better rule of promotion in the Church; intellect triumphing over interest; industry over "the ease which never fasts," and the genius of the poor and lowly oftener reaching the goal of the ambition of the rich and proud. We say this in a spirit which we hope is not more independent than charitable, and which, we are sure, is quite as generous as just.

There have occurred two police cases during the present week which will be found much abbreviated in another part of our paper, but which we cannot pass without a remark. In one instance, a half-drunken man is treated with violent brutality by a constable of what, if these outrages be permitted, will soon become a detested and unconstitutional force. In the other, a mounted officer strikes a sober and harmless lad senseless to the ground.

Both cases presented aspects of so dangerous a complexion that the question of life and death remained uncertain; and although the disfigured man survives, and the beaten boy recovered from the serious illness which his hurts occasioned, yet the turn of a straw might have fixed the charge of murder, or manslaughter at the least, upon either of their cowardly assailants. The policeman whose atrocity was wreaked upon the senseless drunkard is likely to pay the penalty of his crime, but the mounted officer who felled the inoffensive boy is undiscovered. In the first example we shall be content to see justice take its course; in the second, we have only to hope that the police commissioners will unmask the offender. No protection is required here. Both cases are purely civil, and totally unconnected with outbreak or riot. But peace and human life require to be respected, and as the police form that distinct force which the nation pays for their protection, the violation of their civil obligation by the members of that force is what society ought most to deprecate, and a free community to regard with most jealous and observant eye.

COLLIERS' WAGES.—It may not be unimportant to state, now that the colliers in this neighbourhood have professedly struck —in common with other workmen—for the Charter and an advance of wages, that for some years they have been receiving, 4s. a day for a full day's work of eight hours. This rate of wages, we were credibly informed, is full eight per cent. higher than was paid in 1835-6, and what tells still more to the disadvantage of the master, coals are selling lower now than they were then.—Leeds Mercury.

Saturday Evening.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY.—Her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, walked to Adelaide Lodge this morning, and returned to the Castle in a pony phaeton.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND.—We understand that her Majesty will embark at Woolwich Dockyard for Scotland on Monday, at the early hour of seven o'clock in the morning; and that arrangements have been made for that time in order to take advantage of the tide. It is, we are also informed, the express wish of her Majesty and her illustrious Consort, that her visit to the north should be conducted with as little public ceremony as it is possible to observe consistent with the dignity of the royal personages.—Standard.

PRINCE ALBERT'S BIRTHDAY.—Yesterday (Friday) being the anniversary of the Birthday of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, when his Royal Highness completed his 23rd year, having been born August 26th, 1819 the morning was ushered in by peals from the various churches in the metropolis, and in the royal parishes of St. Margaret, Westminster, and Kensington, royal standards were hoisted on the church steeples. The day was also kept as a holiday at the public offices, and at one o'clock the Park and Tower guns were fired. In the evening there were numerous illuminations at the west end of the town, &c.

THE DUKE OF SAXE COBURG GOTHA.—It is expected his Serene Highness will embark in the Black Eagle on Sunday, at Woolwich, for a passage to Ostend.

VISIT OF THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE TO WYNYARD.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, accompanied by Baron Brunow, the Russian Ambassador, arrived at Stockton-upon-Tees on Monday, at one o'clock, by a special train from Darlington, en route to Wynyard, on a visit to the Marquis and Marchioness of Londonderry.

The Duke of Wellington arrived at Apsley House on Wednesday evening, from Walmer Castle, and after transacting business as Commander-in-Chief, his grace left town on Thursday, at four p.m., on a visit to her Majesty and Prince Albert, at Windsor Castle, where a sumptuous entertainment will be given by the Queen to-day, in honour of the twenty-third anniversary of his Royal Highness's natal day.

Sir James Graham returned to town this morning (Friday) from a visit to her Majesty at Windsor Castle. The right hon. baronet afterwards transacted business at the Home Office.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—The marriages of Lord Prudhoe, brother of the Duke of Northumberland, with the Lady Eleanor, eldest daughter of Earl Grosvenor, and that of Lord Parker, eldest son of the Earl of Macclesfield, with the Lady Mary, second daughter of the Earl Grosvenor, were solemnised at St. George's, Hanover-square, on Thursday

DEATH OF LORD VIVIAN.—Woolwich, Aug. 25.—Intelligence was received last night that Lord Vivian had died in Germany This brave and gallant officer, on being appointed Master-General of the Ordnance, on the 19th of May, 1835, performed the duties of his office with great zeal and ability. His lordship continued Master-General until the accession of the present Government to power, in September, 1841, when he retired, having previously been raised to the Peerage by the Government of which he was a member. Lord Vivian was born on the 28th July, 1775 and entered the army as an Ensign on the 31st of July, 1793, and served in Flanders and Holland, under the Duke of York, from June, 1794, until the return of the army in 1795. He was severely wounded in carrying the Bridge of Croix d'Orade near Toulouse, and served at the battle of Waterloo. His lordship's death causes a vacancy in the 1st Royal Dragoons, of which regiment he was colonel. The deceased lord was married in 1804, and is succeeded by his son, Major Vivian, M.P for Bodmin.

THE WEST INDIA MAILS.—The arrangements between the Lords of the Admiralty and Lord Lowther, the Postmaster-General, respecting the transmission of the West India Mails twice a month, by sailing packets, are now finally concluded. Twelve 10 gun brigs are now fitting out as packets, for the purpose of conveying the Madeira, Jamaica, (and all the West India Islands,) Panama, New Orleans, British Guiana, Surinam, and Mexico mails which will be made up at the General Post-office, St. Martin's-le-Grand, on the 1st and 15th of every month, and forwarded via Falmouth

THE ROYAL ALBERT.—WOOLWICH, Friday.—The anniversary of Prince Albert's birth was selected for laying the keel of the Royal Albert, and from an early hour the town presented an unusual appearance of gaiety. The platforms on either side the slip were filled with ladies and gentlemen. The band of the Royal Marines was stationed on the west platform; and on the signal being given to raise the massive timbers on the stocks, "Rule Britannia" was played in excellent style. The first joist having been placed in the proper position, its companion timber was hauled up, and everything being arranged in the most satisfactory manner by Mr. Lang and assistants, Miss Collier (daughter of Sir Francis Collier, governor of the Dockyard) was led forward to perform the usual ceremony of striking with a hammer the points where the dowels and keys are mane to meet; the band playing the national anthem and the air resounding with the cheers of those assembled. A brief notice of this vessel, which was ordered to be laid down in March last, may not be uninteresting. Its size is intended to exceed that of any other ship in the navy. The following are the exact dimensions and measurement of tonnage:—Length of gun-deck, 220 feet; extreme breadth, 60 feet 10 in.; depth in hold, 25 feet; tons burden, 3394; number of guns 120. The Royal Albert will be 15 feet longer than the Trafalgar, 5 feet wider, and her burden 700 tons greater. She is to be constructed on a new principle, combining increased strength and safety with improved sailing qualities. The preparations for Her Majesty's embarkation on Monday are nearly completed, and Sir Francis Collier left his official residence for the Admiralty at an early hour this morning, in order to make a report of the final arrangements. The time at present appointed for embarking is seven a.m., so that those who wish to obtain a glance of the passage down the river must be "up and stirring" at an early hour. Her Majesty will be accompanied on the voyage by the Prince. Captain Stopford, and the Dolphin, Captain Onslow; and the following government steamers:—Shearwater, Captain Wishaw; Salamander, Captain Hamond; Fearless Captain Bullock; Radamanthus, Lieutenant Lane; Lightning, Lieutenant Snell; Hooker, tug boat.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—The last masquerade (at all events the last one for some nights) took place on Thursday evening in these grounds, and, considering how very unfavourable the weather was up to the time of opening the doors, was much better attended than could have been expected. There were more characters in costume than on the previous nights, and there was more animation in the scene. The illumination, fireworks, &c., and the exhibition in the rotunda, were all on the usual scale of excellence; indeed, the whole was well conducted and satisfactory.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE. This theatre opens for the season on Saturday next, with Bellini's opera of Norma Miss Adelaide Kemble taking her usual character, and a new two-act comedy, by Douglas Jerrold, called Gertrude's Cherries, or Waterloo in 1835

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—On Friday the children of the British and Foreign School, amounting to between 800 and 900 boys, were permitted to visit these gardens

AN EXTRAORDINARY FACT.—To show the state of uncertainty that prevails in the wine trade, in reference to a remiss on of duty on port wine, the bill of entry of Friday morning was destitute of this article as having been duty paid—a circumstance unprecedented in the trade.

THE DISTURBED DISTRICTS.—The general impression as regards the outbreak in various places, is that the "strike" has done its worst, and that (although with some exceptions) the deluded work-people will return to their usual employments. In Manchester many of those who had been induced to resume their work have again turned out, and although they have committed no new outrage, appear to be rather intractable. At Preston, Oldham, Stockport, and the towns and villages in the neighbourhood of Manchester, a manifest disposition has been displayed by the operatives to return to their work. The same accounts are coming in from other towns.

DISTURBANCES IN THE PROVINCES.—A special commission is on the eve of being issued for the trial of the rioters apprehended during the late disturbances in the manufacturing districts The last occasion of a commission being issued was for the trial of Frost and his companions, in the winter of 1840. Lord Chief Justice Tindal, Mr. Justice Williams, and Mr. Sergeant Ludlow, were the judges then selected. The character of the recent outbreak being of so much more general a nature, there is every reason to believe that a great number will be appointed.

We hear that White of Birmingham, O'Neill of Dudley, Cooper of Leicester, three leading Chartists, have been arrested.

The commissioners of the new model prison, at Pentonville, have appointed Mr. R. Hoskins governor, at a salary of £400 per annum, and the Rev. Mr. Ralph chaplain, at a salary of £300.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—FRIDAY.—Nicholas Suisse, the valet of the late Marquis of Hertford, was again indicted for stealing and embezzling certain inscriptions or rentes in the French Funds, to the value of upwards of £90,000 sterling Mr. Kelly opened the case for the prosecution, and, after vindicating the conduct of the prosecutors, proceeded at great length to detail the facts connected with the charge preferred against the prisoner, and the circumstances of suspicion in which he was placed by the possession of this large amount of property. The facts of this prosecution have already been so fully reported, it is unnecessary to repeat them. Mr. Justice Williams intimated that the portion of evidence detailed by the learned counsel, which were admissible, were not sufficient to prove the case against the prisoner; and Mr. Kelly said he certainly could not carry his case any further than he had opened; and after the intimation which he had rece ved from his lordship, he would not attempt to press the case any farther. The jury accordingly returned a verdict of "Not Guilty." The prisoner was then arraigned upon another indictment; but upon Mr. Kelly saying that it was not the intention to offer any evidence on this case, the prisoner was again acquitted, and at once restored to his liberty.

Ellen Renson, otherwise Gwynn, was convicted of feloniously uttering, at Hammersmith, in the month of August, two pieces of base coin, well knowing the same to be counterfeit. Sentence, ten years' transportation.

William Horton, a genteelly-dressed young man, was convicted of stealing a bank-note value £200 ditto £50, and another for £10, and gold and silver coin to the amount of £4 1s. 8d., the property of Messrs Pugh and Vincent, to whom he was clerk and servant. The Judge postponed his judgment, but intimated that it would be transportation.

John Edward, alias Baker, was convicted of a similar offence, and transported for fourteen years.

Thomas Cooper was convicted of a similar offence, and sentenced to ten years' transportation.

James Whattle and George White, two soldiers, were convicted of assaulting John Hoare on the Queen's highway, and stealing a watch and other property, of the value of £4. From the evidence, it appeared that the prosecutor, who was a gardener, residing near Plumstead, in Kent, was going, on the 3rd of August, between 12 and 1 o'clock, towards his cottage, when he was met by two men, who knocked him down, and took from him his watch and other property. The blow rendered him insensible, and when his senses returned, he missed the articles he had mentioned. They were clearly traced to the prisoners, and the jury found them guilty. Sentence of death passed, to be commuted to transportation for life.

Thomas Clements, a seafaring man, aged 36, was charged with the wilful murder of Bridget Clements, alias Holloway. The prisoner was found guilty of manslaughter, and sentenced to two years' hard labour at the Maidstone House of Correction.

Sarah Stroud, aged 25, was found guilty of murdering her infant child, and sentenced to be executed on Monday next, Mr. Baron Rolfe holding out to her no hopes of mercy.

POLICE.—Captain Philip Partridge, of the brig Yarrow, of Liverpool, was brought up for re-examination at the Thames police office, charged with the wilful murder of three Spaniards and a Moor, between Benin and Teneriffe, in the latter part of last year. The investigation was postponed for a week. The case will be ultimately sent before a jury.

Charles William Stringer Fitzgerald, who was charged with attempting to extort money from Mr. H. Churchill, and who was remanded from Monday last, was fully committed to take his trial.

DUBLIN, August 24. No less than 87 persons were brought before the mag strates of College-street police-office in the course of yesterday, charged with being drunk and disorderly at that annual scene of profligacy—Donnybrook Fair. Indeed, notwithstanding the boast of the Mathewites, drunkenness and debauchery were never more rife than during the present week.

MURDERS IN IRELAND.—Three revolting murders have within the last fortnight been committed in Ireland, viz., of Thomas Long, at Limerick, stoned to death; of a wood-ranger, named Honean, in Clare; and of a man named Mercer, in Tyrone.

FOREIGN.—PARIS.—All the Royal Family left Paris last night for Eu. The Duke de Chartres, second son of the Duchess of Orleans, was slightly indisposed, as well as his mother, and it was thought by the physician that a residence at Eu, with excursions to the sea-side, would restore them to perfect health. We hear nothing new in politics.

BELGIUM.—The following is the account of the traffic on the iron railway between Cologne and Aix-la-Chapelle, in the first seven months of this year:—Passengers, 172,103; Goods, 271,360 cwt. Receipt, for passengers 108,998 dollars, for goods 25 712 dollars; total 134,790 dollars. The exportation of cattle from Belgium to England has commenced. The Belgian sloop Union has just sailed from Ostend with forty-six oxen on board.

GERMANY.—A letter from Cologne, of the 23rd instant, announces that the King of Prussia, accompanied by the Emperor of Austria, the Kings of Hanover, Bavaria, Wurtemburg, the Grand Dukes of Baden and Nassau, and twenty of the reigning princes of Germany, will review on the 5th of September the splendid host of the Rhine, 66,000 strong; consisting of the 7th and 8th corps of the Prussian army. The Duke of Wellington has received a pressing invitation from the King of Prussia to be present; and several British officers have obtained leave to attend the military spectacle.

HUNGARY.—A Transylvanian journal gives a disastrous account of the fire at Bereck. This journal says: "In less than one hour 275 houses and 434 farm-buildings were reduced to ashes with all their contents, and 18 persons were burnt to death."

CIRCASSIA. The Russians have suffered in their late encounters with the Circassians. Eight pieces of artillery had been captured from General Grabbe's army, but were retaken, except two pieces, with a loss, however, of 1600 Russian men and officers. This attack on the Russian camp was made on the 13th of June.

CONSECRATION OF THE COLONIAL BISHOPS.

The impressive and solemn ceremony of consecrating the five newly appointed Colonial Bishops, took place on Wednesday morning in Westminster Abbey. The doors of this magnificent and sacred edifice were opened for those who had obtained tickets of admission at ten o'clock at which moment all the entrances to the Abbey were locked. A few minutes before eleven o'clock the overture to Esther was admirably performed.

Precisely at eleven o'clock, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Rochester, and Chichester, entered the choir at the west door, and proceeded to the altar. The right rev. prelates were followed by Dr. Coleridge, late Bishop of Barbadoes, and the newly-appointed bishops, viz., Archdeacon Parry, Bishop of Barbadoes; Archdeacon Austen, Bishop of Guiana; Dr. Davies, Bishop of Antigua; Dr. Tomlinson, Bishop of Malta and Gibraltar; and Dr. Nixson, Bishop of Van Diemen's Land.

The Queen's Advocate (Sir John Dodson) was in attendance, attired in his scarlet robes of office. The learned gentleman took his seat on the left of the new bishops.

The right rev. bishops, and the other dignitaries of the church, having taken the respective seats appropriated to them, the morning service of the church commenced. The prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Lupton, and the lessons of the day by the Rev. Mr. Waters. The communion service by the Bishop of London.

The following is the order and programme of this interesting and important ceremony, for which we are indebted to the courtesy of Dr. Webber, Dean of Ripon;—The Chapter of Westminster received the newly appointed bishops in the Jerusalem Chamber.

The Archbishop of Canterbury being indisposed, a commission empowering the Bishops of London, Winchester, and Rochester to act for his Grace had been granted, and those right rev. prelates, with the Bishop of Chichester, and the late Bishop of Barbadoes (Dr. Coleridge), assembled shortly after ten o'clock in the Jerusalem Chamber, where they were joined by the newly appointed Colonial Bishops, and afterwards moved in the following order from the chamber into the choir of the Abbey:—

Beadle.
Almsmen.
Choristers.
Gentlemen of the Choir.
Minor Canons.
Receiver of the Chapter of Westminster (Mr. Gell).
Chapter Clerk of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster (Mr. Vincent.)
Canons' Verger.
Canons.
Dean's Verger.
Sub-Dean (Lord John Thynne).
The Colonial Bishops.
The late Bishop of Barbadoes.
The Bishop of Chichester.
The Commissioners of the Archbishop of Canterbury, viz., the Bishop of Rochester, the Bishop of Winchester, and the Bishop of London, with their attendants.

The procession thus formed moved up the centre aisle, and on entering the choir, the different members passed to their respective places; the Canons and Sub-Dean of Westminster drawing aside until the bishops had passed them, to take their places within the altar rail of the Sacrarium. The Canons and Sub-Dean then passed into their accustomed places. The Morning Service then commenced; at its conclusion, the Sub-Dean and Canons proceeded to their respective places within the altar rail. The Communion Service then began, which was read by the Bishop of London and the assistant bishop. The Nicene Creed having been sung, the preacher, Bishop Coleridge, was conducted to the pulpit, when the right rev. prelate delivered a most eloquent and appropriate sermon from Isaiah, ch. 43 verses 5 and 6:—"Fear not for I am with thee. I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west; I will say to the north, Give up, and to the south, Keep not back; bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth."

After the sermon was concluded, the five Colonial Bishops, who, until then, had been seated on the north side of the Sacrarium, opposite the assembled clergy in their robes, were conducted to St. Edward's chapel, when they put on their rochets; and on their return to the choir, they placed themselves before the three bishops, the commissioners of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Queen's mandate having been read, and the accustomed forms administered, the Consecration Service was performed, the right rev. commissioners being seated in front by the altar. When this part of the service was concluded the Colonial Bishops again retired to put on the rest of their robes, and on their return, knelt at the altar, when the Bishop of London began the "Veni Creator," which Hymn the choir immediately took up and sung to the conclusion. The Consecration service having been concluded, the five Colonial Bishops passed to their places among the other bishops on the south, within the altar rail.

That part of the congregation who did not partake of the Lord's Supper then left the Abbey, and the Communion Service was proceeded with in the usual form and ceremony. A collection was afterwards made, the amount of which the Dean and Chapter of Westminster intend to apply to the uses of the Colonial Fund.

THE CONSECRATION.

At the conclusion of the Communion Service the Chapter of Westminster conducted the bishops back to the Jerusalem Chamber.

The Sermon occupied nearly an hour in delivery, and during that part in which the Rev. Doctor pointed out the important duties of the ministerial office, the newly-created prelates were much affected. The preacher then in forcible and eloquent language impressed upon those whom he addressed, the great truth that the universality of the Redeemer's kingdom ought to be the great object of all Christians, particularly Christian ministers.

The ceremony occupied nearly four hours.

ADELAIDE LODGE.

Our readers will remember having frequently perused in our Court News accounts of her Majesty's visits to Adelaide Lodge, Windsor Park; we here present a beautiful engraving of this favourite locality. Her Majesty's custom is to visit Adelaide Lodge in the morning, and breakfast there. The visits of the Court to Virginia Water usually occur in the evening, when a fête is generally given, a representation of which will be found below:—

VIRGINIA WATER.

THE ROYAL GEORGE YACHT.

This beautiful model of a man-of-war vessel is undergoing a complete renovation, and a number of hands are employed without intermission to have her finished for the reception of her Majesty. Dr. Reid, the inventor of the most approved mode of ventilation, was on board on Monday and Tuesday personally superintending the laying of pipes for the free ventilation of the vessel. The royal bed has been removed to London, and a new one, expressly made for her Majesty, will be substituted. The interior of the state cabin is superb, beautifully carved in the most prominent parts, and richly gilt, having a most pleasing effect. It is lighted by five windows in the stern, and two on each side of smaller dimensions, of the finest plate glass. Round the whole of the interior are placed ottomans and sofas, the latter convertible into beds, and by richly gilt rods, appearing at first supports for picture frames, curtains of graceful drapery are made to surround them. Near the stern windows is a beautiful brass stove, of a most elegant pattern, in the form of a handsome covered vase, the smoke descending behind the grate, and finding egress at some distant part of the vessel. In recesses are neatly fitted shelves for book-cases. The floor is covered with rich Brussels carpet of a very chaste pattern, and in the centre stands a splendidly-finished round mahogany table. The royal bed-room is in keeping with the rich appearance of the state-cabin, the floor covered with the same Brussels carpet, and very light and airy in its form, and in every respect adapted for the comfort of her Majesty during the voyage. It is entered from the right of the state-cabin by a spacious door in character with the dimensions of all the other parts of this model of elegant ship-building. The dining-room is also very handsome, but not so highly ornamented as the other cabins, and conveys an idea of the comforts which a small select party of royal and noble guests could enjoy gliding along on the surface of the seas that surround our beloved island. The panels of the doors of the state-cabin are filled with mirrors, but her Majesty's excellent taste and judgment appear to dislike them, and they have been ordered to be covered, so that the privacy of the state-cabin will be preserved, and not have every movement of the forms of the occupants presented to the eye in all quarters. The deck of the vessel is kept beautiful and clean, and being filled in the seams with a white, yet permanently hard composition, will not soil the most delicate shoe. At present, while the work of renovation is going on, the deck is covered with canvass. The binnacle compass is covered in the form of a lantern, and surmounted by a royal crown. On the exterior of the stern is a beautifully carved royal arms, richly gilt; and altogether the Royal George yacht is a vessel of which we have reason to be proud, and it is to be hoped her Majesty will be so delighted with her voyage as to order this fine pleasure vessel to be kept at Woolwich for her Majesty's use.

THE ROYAL GEORGE YACHT.

Bound, white wing'd Vessel! o'er thy kindred sea;
Plunge, like a palfry, through the dancing waters!
The soft caressing ocean circles thee,
As though thou wert the dearest of his daughters!

Are the waves conscious,—that they so do glow,
And crest their sunny foam upon your path?
Why are their murmurs musical and low,
As though some charm had lulled the soul of wrath?

Look at your banners!—why, the winds have wiles
That curl them into beauty! and your sails
Are Zephyr's cheeks, that, dimpled into smiles,
Catch the sweet odour of his fav'ring gales!

See the Sun's gold!—how it doth sheet thy deck,
And through thy gleaming rigging flit and shine!
The elements all love thee, and no wreck
Have they proud Bark, for beauty such as thine!

For thou art treasure laden! Heaven above
Doth compass thee with its protection bright—
A glowing world of loveliness and love
Though bearest with thee on thy path of light.

Thou art the Ocean-palace of our Queen,
And so more rich than its most jewelled cave;
The blue-eyed Empress of our Isles of green
Is throned by thee on her exulting wave.

The billows play around her in her pride,
And clap their watery hands—and sparkle joy
Britannia, clasped by Neptune as his bride,
Flings bliss around that will not bear alloy!

So, full of happiness, she takes her way,
Our young Victoria, for old Scotia's shore
Bless her by starry night, by glorious day,
On isle or billow bless her evermore!

CROSBY HALL.

It is with unalloyed pleasure we have to record the resuscitation of that fine old building, Crosby Hall, and its appropriation to a purpose so truly in keeping with its character as an historical memorial, namely, the dissemination of literature and science. Of Crosby place we may well say with one of our fine old poets:—

"We do love these ancient ruins,
We never tread them but we set our foot
Upon some reverende historie."

Completed in 1472, this ancient fabric, by a rare exception to the fate of most buildings of the same date in the metropolis, remains to us a beautiful specimen of the domestic architecture of the time. Periods have passed away during its existence, and often, in immediate connexion with its history, successively marked by the strife of faction and the fury of civil war, the sternness of bigotry, and the wildness of fanaticism, the oppression of misrule, and the order and security of settled government. Within its walls have resided many famous in arts and arms, the wealthy, the learned, and the great. A few spirited individuals, with a degree of taste and good feeling which does them credit, have saved this memorial of civic splendour and o fthe olden time, from decay and demolition, rescued it from meaner uses, and will thus transmit it unimpaired for the admiration of posterity. Thus an edifice which has long remained a reproach to the neighbourhood, and even to the metropolis itself, again becomes an object of interest from its associations, and a theatre of usefulness from its application.

On Friday the 5th inst., the great hall, which in the days of its glory, as figured below, was used as the feasting chamber of the building, having undergone repairs and alterations in harmony with its original and costly style of architecture, to fit it for its present purposes, the lecture-room of the institution was thrown open to the members, on which occasion the Rev. Charles Mackenzie, A.M., the vicar of the parish, delivered a lecture on its history and antiquities, and as they must needs prove interesting, we make no apology for briefly subjoining its historical associations.

Crosby Place derives its name from Sir John Crosby, its reputed builder, an Alderman of London during the reign of Edward IV. It would appear that he was a citizen of some distinction, since he held the offices of sheriff-warden of the Grocers' company, and the mayoralty of the staple of Calais. After Sir John's death, in 1475, we find it the dwelling-place of the Duke of Gloster, afterwards Richard III., and the well known passage in Shakspeare will occur to all our readers, where, after his successful wooing of the Lady Anne, he thus addresses her:—

"That it may please you leave these sad designs
To him that hath more cause to be a mourner,
And presently repair to Crosby House,
Where I will with all expedient duty see you."

Richard's residence here at the time of his marriage, however, appears doubtful; but a much more important event unquestionably did take place within its walls. It was in the hall of Crosby-place that he determined on the deposition of Edward V.; and it was here that all his plans were concocted for his own elevation to the vacant throne. After the death of Richard it was purchased by Bartholomew Read, Mayor of London, 1501—2, whose desire evidently was to possess a house befitting the splendour he had determined should signalize his mayoralty. The next possessor of Crosby-place was Sir John Rest, who held the office of mayor, in 1516, and by him it appears to have been sold, though at what time is uncertain, to the illustrious, the erudite, the conscientious Sir Thomas More. In 1523 More sold Crosby-place to Antonia Bonvisi, a merchant of Lucca, who subsequently leased it to William Roper, the husband of More's favourite daughter, Margaret. In the reign of Edward VI. Roper was driven abroad by religious persecution, and Crosby-place was forfeited, and granted by the Crown to Sir Thomas D'Arcy, who, on the accession of Mary, likewise suffered from religious persecution, which had now changed sides, and Bonvisi and Roper returned and regained the estate. In 1594 Sir John Spencer purchased it, and there kept his mayoralty with great splendour. Ambassadors were entertained here on several occasions with great grandeur; among whom the most noted was no less important a person than M. de Rosney, afterwards Duke of Sully. The remaining possessors may be briefly named:—Lord Compton, the husband of Spencer's daughter, during whose residence another distinguished tenant graced the house; this was the Countess of Pembroke, sister to Sir Philip Sydney, whom Ben Jonson has celebrated in one of the prettiest epitaphs in our language. Spencer, Earl of Northampton, comes next, and was succeeded by Sir John Langham, sheriff in 1642, during whose occupation it is said to have been used as a prison for royalists. His son, Sir Stephen Langham, succeeded him, and it was during his tenancy that a fire occurred, by which it was much injured. In 1672, the hall was converted into a Presbyterian meeting-house, and so remained for nearly a century, after which it was degraded into a packer's warehouse, until the spirit and energy of the present managers of the Literary Institution, formerly held at Salvador House, have raised it from its ruins, restored it to its pristine beauty, and appropriated it to a more worthy purpose.

The portions of the building now in use are the Council Room—now the Reading Room, and the Great Hall—at present the Lecture Room. The noble proportions of this latter apartment, as well as the surpassing beauty of the roof, built not less than three hundred and sixty years ago, will be more evident to our readers from an attentive examination of the engraving of the hall than from any written description that we could give them. We pass on, therefore, to notice such other of its chief features as the engraving does not or cannot convey. And first as to its dimensions. It is 54 feet long, 27½ broad, and 40 feet high. The breadth of the oriel window is 10 feet 10 inches, and its height the height of the hall. The window is richly decorated with a series of armorial bearings, the tasteful and munificent present of Thomas Willement, Esq., and which, though of so recent an origin, have all the appearance of ancient works of art. We see among them the arms of St. Helen's Priory, the earliest proprietor of the place; of Sir John Crosby, the builder; of the City of London, so many of whose eminent citizens have made the hall ring again with the sounds of festive hospitality; of Richard, the "crook-backed tyrant," whose few days' residence here will preserve the name of Crosby Place when the last vestige of its architectural glories shall have disappeared; and of Henry's murdered Chancellor, Sir Thomas More, the wise, learned, amiable, and witty author of the "Utopia." The remainder comprise the arms and badges of Richard's Queen, and of the House of York, Sir Thomas d'Arcy, William Bond and his company, and the "rich Spencer" and his company. The other windows of the hall are similarly decorated, those on the same side containing the arms of various subscribers to the expences of the restoration, and those on the opposite, among others, of Sir John Rest, the Duke of Sully, Lord Compton, and the present owner, W. P. Williams Freeman, Esq.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—Yesterday the Queen, Prince Albert, and the Duke of Saxe Coburg, took their accustomed early walk in the forenoon. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken out as usual. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Prince, and the Duke of Saxe Coburg, rode out in a carriage and four to Bagshot, to visit the Duchess of Gloucester. Baron de Nieumann and Sir R. Peel arrived in the evening. The Duchess of Kent, Lady C. Dundas, Sir G. Cooper and Mr. and Mrs. Anson, joined the royal dinner circle in the evening. This morning, the Queen and Prince Albert and the Duke of Saxe Coburg attended divine service at the Chapel Royal, St. George's. The Rev. C. W. Knyvett chanted the first part of the service, the Dean and the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Stopford officiated at the communion service. Mr. Stopford preached a sermon from 6th v. 11th c. of Paul to the Hebrews, "Without faith it is impossible to please God." The royal party was attended by the Duchess of Norfolk, Hon. Misses Pearel and Murray, Lord Byron, Earl of Liverpool, Sir R. Peel, Earl of Aberdeen, Baron Gruben, Captain Meynell, Colonel Buckley, and Colonel Wylde. Very extensive preparations are in progress for celebrating Prince Albert's birthday, on Friday (20th) with more than usual splendour and magnificence. The festivities a d rejoicings will be upon a princely scale of grandeur at the Castle; a numerous and distinguished party of visitors have received invitations to be present at the banquet, which will take place in the evening in St. George's Hall; and every arrangement has been determined upon to give due effect to the rejoicings and exultations upon this auspicious occasion. The annual grand show of the Windsor and Eton Royal Horticultural Society, postponed for the 3rd of September, will take place in the royal grounds, at Frogmore, by permission of the Duchess of Kent, under the patronage of her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager, and the Duchesses of Kent and Gloucester.

Her Majesty, who was most graciously pleased to stand sponsor to the infant daughter of Madame Van de Weyer, presented her with a magnificent and richly-wrought silver gilt cup, accompanied by a knife, fork, and spoon, of corresponding taste. The cup is lofty in form, nearly resembling those handed down to us by Cellini, characteristic of the cinque cento age. The lower portion of the cup is adorned with subjects of angels, guardians of infancy; the body, with two scriptural subjects, beautifully executed in bas-relief —one, Simon beholding the infant Saviour; and the other, Christ blessing the little children. The cover is surmounted with the figure of St. John the Baptist, in full relief.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked to Adelaide Cottage this morning, and returned through the Home Park. The Prince of Wales and Princess Royal have been taken their usual airings, accompanied by the Domenge Lyttelton.

Sir Robert Peel, after having an audience of the Queen, returned to town shortly before four o'clock.

The Marquis of Douro has arrived to succeed Lord Byron as the Lord in Waiting on her Majesty.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND.—Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, who commands the Royal George Yacht, has returned from a trip, by water, along the eastern coast of England, which his lordship undertook for the purpose of determining upon the most direct and favourable course to proceed with his royal and illustrious charge from the Nore to Scotland. Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to accept of the offers of several of the Scottish Nobility, to furnish their own carriages for the use of the Court during the sojourn "across the border." It is stated that her Majesty's stay in Scotland will not extend beyond Tuesday or Wednesday, the 13th or 14th proximo. The return of the Court (her Majesty proceeding from Scotland to Woolwich in the royal yacht) to Buckingham Palace, may be looked forward to on or about Saturday, the 17th, and early in the following week her Majesty will leave town for Windsor Castle. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal will remain at the Castle during the absence of their illustrious parents from Windsor, attended by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, the precepteress to the Princess Royal. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent will also remain, during the absence of the Court from Windsor, at Frogmore House, and pay daily visits to the royal infants.

ARRIVAL OF THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE AT YORK.—YORK, Saturday night.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge arrived here by the half-past seven o'clock train on his way to Wynyard Park, the seat of the Marquis of Londonderry. His Royal Highness proceeded to the Black Swan Hotel, where shortly afterwards the Sheriff and Robert Davies, Esq., town clerk, waited upon him to ascertain when it would be convenient for his Royal Highness to receive an address of congratulation which had been agreed upon by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Councillors of the city of York, when his Royal Highness was pleased to name Monday morning, at half-past nine. His Royal Highness Prince George arrived from Leeds, where he had been stationed with his regiment, the 17th Lancers, about eight o'clock, on a visit to his illustrious father. The Royal party purpose attending the morning and afternoon service at the Minster to-morrow, and afterwards dining with Mr. Alderman George Hudson; the Lord Mayor, in consequence of a recent domestic affliction, being obliged to forego the honour of receiving them at the Mansion House. His Royal Highness will leave by a special train, on Monday, for Darlington, on his way to Wynyard Park.

Sir James Graham remained at the Home Office until a late hour on Friday night. Sir James was visited by Sir Robert Peel. His Serene Highness the Prince of Leiningen, Sir Augustus Clifford and family, Sir Francis Palsgrave, Dr. Phillimore, Mr. Hilliard, United States Charge d'Affaires at the Hague, and many other passengers, left the St. Katherine's wharf, Tower, on Tuesday morning by the Princess Victoria steamer, for Antwerp and the Rhine. The same Company's ship Broges arrived at the wharf after a passage of only thirteen hours. Prince Doria of Rome came passenger by her.

Lord Auckland, the late Governor-General of India, and the Hon. Misses Eden, arrived in town early on Tuesday morning from Portsmouth.

The Queen will hold a Privy Council on Saturday afternoon at Windsor Castle, at half-past two o'clock.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager has transmitted a donation of £20, in liquidation of the deficiency in the sum provided for the erection of St. Andrew's Church, Northampton.

BROCKET HALL, HERTS.—Viscount Melbourne arrived here on Wednesday from South-street, and next week are expected to arrive Lord and Lady Beauvale, Baroness Malmesbury, Lord and Lady Palmerston, the Hon. W. F. Cowper, &c. His Lordship has not been on the Continent since the prorogation, and the report of his having arrived at Coblentz, on the Rhine, is, therefore, untrue. His Lordship was probably mistaken for his late colleague in office, the Marquis of Lansdowne, who has been visiting Lord and Lady Leveson at their chateau, near Hermsheim, en route to Vienna, for the Autumn.

The friends of the late Major Rennell will be gratified to hear that his eloge was pronounced last week at the Institute in Paris by the Baron Walckenaer, who is so eminently qualified to appreciate the character of that celebrated man.

WINDSOR AND ETON LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert has just transmitted to Mr. J. W. S. Potter, the honorary secretary, through the medium of Mr. Anson, the Prince's private secretary, the liberal donation of fifty guineas in aid of the building fund.

The Duke of Hamilton left town last week for Holyrood House, Edinburgh, in order to inspect the arrangements at that palace at present in progress for the reception of her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert. The noble Duke is hereditary keeper of Holyrood.

The Earl of Rosebery and Sir John Boileau have each given £100 n aid of the fund for the erection of a public monument to the memory of the late Earl of Leicester. Lord Hastings has subscribed £50. The subscription already amounts to £4000

WOOLWICH, Aug 21.—The following has just been issued for the instruction of the inspectors and police having charge of the dockyard gate:—"NOTICE.—No person will be admitted into the dockyard on the day that her Majesty embarks, except officers in full uniform.—By order of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CHARTIST MEETING ON KENNINGTON COMMON.—On Monday evening a meeting of the Chartists was held on Kennington Common, pursuant to announcement by large placards which had been posted on various parts of the metropolis. The meeting was advertised to take place at six o'clock, but long before that hour they began to assemble. There did not, however, appear to be any union amongst them, and the greater portion amused themselves in various ways. There were none of the leaders on the Common, at least they did not show themselves. About a quarter-past six o'clock a man of the name of Logan, a lecturer on phrenology at the Adelaide Gallery of Economy, commenced an address to about 50 persons, and recommended that the meeting should be adjourned till Wednesday next, as in consequence of the notices issued by Mr. Hall, the chief magistrate of Bow-street, and Mr. Mayne, of the metropolitan police, he wished to act within the law. The man was followed by a Mr. Clancy, of the "Dublin Association," who objected to any adjournment, and which would only give an opportunity to the troops and police to refresh themselves, and proceeded in a violent strain to animadvert upon the infringement of the people's liberty, and of their determination to carry the charter. At this moment the police made their appearance, consisting of about a dozen mounted on horseback, and about 800 of the L, Y, R, P, and M divisions, under superintendents Mallalieu, M'Lean, Grunsell, and Murray. There were now about 4000 or 5000 persons on the Common, and the police made a general charge, and commenced driving the people away, and in less than half an hour the whole of the Common was completely cleared. Not an individual was suffered to remain in the roads, and at every avenue leading to the Common strong bodies of the police were placed to prevent persons congregating. The police, whilst in discharge of their duty, were hooted and pelted by the mob; but, although several persons were knocked down in attempting to escape from the police, we did not hear of any very serious accident. The whole of the police force remained on the Common and neighbourhood till long after dark. We understand there was a detachment of troops in the neighbourhood ready to act if there was occasion; but their services were not required, the mob dispersing pretty quietly.

ATTEMPTED CHARTIST MEETING AT PADDINGTON.—The attempt to hold a Chartist meeting at Paddington on Monday evening proved a complete failure, in consequence of the admirable arrangements of the police authorities. In the course of the morning large placards, signed by Mr. Mayne, the Police Commissioner, were stuck up throughout the neighbourhood. They were headed, "Regulations of the Police for preventing obstructions of the thoroughfares at the Great Western Railway, Paddington, and in the neighbourhood thereof," and they stated that no carriage, van, or other vehicle, would be allowed to stand in any of the thoroughfares or on the waste ground, and that all persons refusing to move and depart when ordered by a police constable to do so, would be liable to be taken into custody, and punished under the provisions of the Police Act. It is computed by competent judges, that upwards of 10,000 persons were present during the evening, yet the only attempt to commence the meeting was made about seven o'clock, by a sickly young man, in a green Newmarket coat, who, on seeing the police approach, instantly took to his heels, but was overtaken and secured. About half an hour afterwards a shoemaker named Menden, who called himself "A Chartist —an out-and-out Chartist—one who did not care a —— for the police," bawled out a motion for an adjournment of the meeting to Kennington-common; but the people immediately adjourned the remainder of his harangue to the station-house, whither they conveyed him. At the station-house in Hermitage-street, Paddington-green, seventeen persons were in custody for throwing stones, &c., and assaulting the police, and one man on a charge of stabbing a policeman

ATTEMPTED CHARTIST ASSEMBLAGE ON CLERKENWELL-GREEN.—On Monday night, about half-past eight o'clock, a body of Chartists, to the number of about 200, taking advantage of the absence of the police at Kennington-common, Paddington, and other parts of the metropolis, began to assemble, notwithstanding the presence of Inspector Penny and several of the police of the G division, on Clerkenwell-green, for the purpose of holding an open-air meeting. The procession was headed by a van, which had already taken up its position on the Green, when Inspector Penny informed them that no meeting would be permitted to be held. In defiance, however, the chair was taken, and the chairman commenced addressing the meeting, which gradually began to augment in numbers. Information was immediately despatched to the station-house of the G division, in the Bagnigge-wells-road, where upwards of one hundred men were in reserve, and who in a few minutes made their appearance at the entrance of the Green under the orders of Mr. Superintendent Massey and Inspector Barton. Their appearance became the signal for general confusion. The speaker and those in the van decamped in an instant, and the van, which had the horse harnessed to it, soon disappeared. The mob, however, were more reluctant to do so, but forming themselves into small groups, continued to groan at and harass the police by assembling in various parts. Shortly before nine o'clock, a man named King commenced addressing a mob from the step of his own door on the Green, and on his refusal to go into his house and desist, he was taken into custody by Inspector Penny. The mass of people, amongst whom were a large number of thieves and pickpockets, began to increase every minute, and at this period, in various parts of the Green, there could not have been less than from 1500 to 2000 persons. The police were assailed with the most frightful yelling, and as they were taking their prisoner to the station-house, several stones and other missiles were thrown. At this moment loud shouts were raised at the Hicks's Hall end of the Green, and on Inspector Barton, who had a large body of his men drawn up in front of the Sessions House, arriving at the spot, he found several men in a waggon, which, on examination, he found to be half-full of rotten turnips, and which it was stated had been brought for the purpose of pelting the police. Inspector Barton assured the driver and those who were in the van, if they made the slightest attempt to enter the Green, he would direct the men to take the whole of them into custody, which it was withdrawn.

CHARTIST MOVEMENTS IN THE METROPOLIS.—The Lord Mayor on Monday called together at the Mansion-house, Aldermen Brown, Sir Peter Laurie, Copeland, Thomas Johnson, Humphery, Magnay, Gibbs, and Farncomb, to aid them in keeping the peace within the City, if it should be menaced by the mob, which it was rumoured would be collected at various points in the metropolis. Officers were despatched in various directions, who made a report every half-hour from Paddington, Lincoln's Inn-fields, Clerkenwell-green, Islington-green, Bethnal-green, Smithfield, and Kennington-common. Col. Coxe, of the Hon. Artillery Company, announced to his Lordship that eight companies of that corps had assembled at their quarters, and would remain during his Lordship's pleasure. The City Commissioner had a considerable force of his constables ready to move on any point.

THE LONDON INSURGENTS.—The object of the persons who assemble nightly in London was declared by one of their leaders last Friday evening. They are perfectly aware that their meetings here cannot possibly be of any avail. Their weakness would become apparent, if any attempts at rioting were to be resolved upon. All they hope to accomplish is, to convince the "turn-outs" in the provincial towns that they sympathise with them, and that they rejoice in the movement recently made. It may be well for the insurgents in the country to know that the mob who follow their example in London are dissimilar to themselves in every respect. Those in the provincial towns are principally men of good character, skilful artisans, and requiring only certain concessions to induce them to return to their respective occupations. It is very different with those who meet nightly in London. They consist of low vagabonds from Whitechapel, Saffron-hill, and other such places, who employ themselves during the day in pickpocketing, &c. Several hundred boys generally accompany them, and the only mischief that they commit is by yelling at the policemen who are on duty. Scarcely a respectable workman has disgraced himself by joining these idlers. On the contrary, they reprobate the proceedings, with scarcely a single exception.

CHARTISTS OF FINSBURY.—In consequence of a numerously circulated placard, inviting the "electors" of Finsbury to assemble together at White Conduit House, to consider the present distressed state of the country, a gathering took place in the great concert-room of that tavern, which, though so large, was too small to accommodate all the visitors. The meeting was addressed by Mr. T. Duncombe, Mr. Feargus O'Connor, and others. The assembly, which could not have consisted of less than from 5000 to 6000 persons, then separated in a very peaceable manner, and it took a considerable time before the ground which they had occupied was cleared.

OUTRAGE BY A POLICEMAN.—At nine o'clock last Friday evening a young gentleman, aged 15, was returning from his father's warehouse in the City to his dwelling-house at Islington, when, finding there was a mob in Smithfield, he turned out of King-street, to avoid it, into Turnmill-street. Hearing there that a number of persons were coming down Clay-street, and finding Clerkenwell-green in possession of the police, he passed quietly by a file of those men, and was proceeding towards his home across the open space in front of the Sessions-house, when a cowardly brute, mounted on horseback, rode up to him, and with a blow of his truncheon struck the unoffending individual senseless to the ground. A number of the dismounted force then ran to the spot, and bearing the poor youth, still unconscious, in their arms, placed him on a horse-cab, and, by Jerusalem-passage, while several remained, without making any attempts to recover him, apparently to see whether he would come to himself or not. This he at length did, and opening his eyes, not knowing where he was, pale, faint, and sick, he inquired which way he had better go to Islington. The monsters showed him no compassion, but told him to go round the City-road; this he did, and at length reached home in such a state as to excite the utmost alarm in the bosoms of his family. He was laid on a sofa and was immediately seized with vomiting, uttering wild and incoherent expressions. He was put to bed, and being kept quiet during the two following days, has happily been restored to his usual health. The father, who was at a distance in the country, returned on Saturday, and immediately applied, first at the Mansion-house, then to Mr. Combe, the magistrate, and finally to the Commissioners of Police; but the only satisfaction he could obtain was a polite intimation, that if the man could be identified, every assistance should be rendered. This the ill-used youth is, however, unable to do, as there was no warning given, no order to go back, nor other intimation of danger, before the savage and unprovoked assault, so nearly amounting to murder, was perpetrated. The name and address of the gentleman is left at our office, with a hope that some spectator may be able to give information of the policeman's number.—From a Correspondent of the Times.

THE COALWHIPPERS' STRIKE.—On Wednesday there was a general strike among the coalwhippers on the river, not accompanied with any political movement whatever. The object of the men employed on this description of work is to relieve themselves from the thraldom of the middle-men in Shadwell, Limehouse, Ratcliffe, and Wapping, who make a profit out of their labour. They resolved to submit to no exactions, but to be employed direct from the landing places along shore, and to be paid every evening on board ship, as the act of Parliament directs EXTENSIVE ROBBERY BY A HOTEL KEEPER.—On Wednesday information was circulated through the divisions of the metropolitan police, that on the 11th instant, Louis Coqueril, proprietor of the Commercial Hotel, Leicester-street, absconded from his establishment, stealing and taking away with him the sum of £600, viz., 13,000 francs in notes of the Bank of France, and £80 in English gold coin, the property of Mons. Saclir, a French gentleman, who had occupied apartments in the hotel in question A reward of £100 is offered for such information as may lead to the apprehension and conviction of the delinquent, and the recovery of the moneys above mentioned.

ALARMING ACCIDENT TO A STEAMER.—An alarming accident occurred on Monday, between twelve and one o'clock, to one of the Watermen's Company's steamers (boat No. 6), on her trip from Greenwich to London, with passengers. It appears that when nearly Mill-wharf, in the vicinity of Deptford, the pin of one of the piston-rods started out of its place, and which the crank which it secures burst from its confinement. The steamer's power was on at the moment, and the crank in its dislodged state continuing to perform its revolutions, was opposed by the cast iron framework in its vicinity, with which it came in violent contact. It struck the framework in quick successive blows, resembling the report of large cannon, shaking the vessel in all her parts at every shock. The utmost consternation prevailed amongst all on board, and the passengers, among whom were many ladies, ran to and fro in the vessel, apprehensive that it was the boiler that was bursting Some narrowly escaped tumbling overboard in their fright. The engineer quickly stopped the vessel, and the anchor was let go, when the cause of the accident was discovered. The iron framework was smashed into fragments, and the vessel being disabled to proceed on her passage, was obliged to lie to until another of the company's boats (No. 7) came up to her assistance, and relieved her of her passengers, all of whom were conveyed safely to London.

We have learnt within the last few days that Lord John Russell has signified to Lord Palmerston, in answer to representations made by the latter, as to the necessity of the Liberals advancing with the popular feeling, that closely connected as he (Lord John Russell) is with the Bedford family, he could not consent to be a party to further reform; and that therefore he thinks it were better if the opposition would look out for some other leader before the commencement of another parliamentary campaign.—Morning Advertiser.

From Havannah it is now officially announced that British steam-packets are to be subjected to the same port duty of two per cent. on goods transhipped as well as to the tonnage duty, as all foreign merchant vessels.

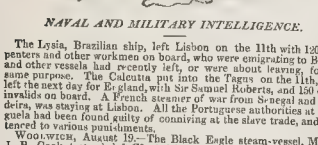
THE LATE MARQUIS OF HERTFORD'S VALET.—Suisse, the valet of the late Marquis of Hertford, was tried for robbing his late master on Wednesday, at the Central Criminal Court, and acquitted. Mr. Kelly, for the prosecution, said there were three other indictments against the prisoner, but one of them stood on a very different footing from that which had just been disposed of. He should, therefore, consult with his learned friends before he could announce what course they intended to pursue. The other indictments were then ordered to stand over until Thursday.

ALARMING FIRE AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—On Tuesday night, shortly before twelve o'clock, the greatest excitement prevailed in the immediate vicinity of Kennington, in consequence of an immense body of fire suddenly shooting forth from the centre of the Zoological Gardens into the air, which illumined the horizon for miles round; but by the time the engines arrived, the flames had greatly subsided, through the workmen employed on the premises throwing a large quantity of water upon them. The cause of so much alarm was the pictorial model of Rome, situated on the borders of the lake in the gardens, catching fire, and which was partially destroyed before it could be extinguished. The origin of the fire could not be ascertained.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN TOTTENHAM-COURT-ROAD.—About half-past three o'clock on Sunday morning a police-constable of the E division, who was on duty in Tottenham-court-road, near Hanway-street, observed flames issuing from the roof of the extensive premises of Mr. Morgan, candle and soap manufacturer to her Majesty, 18, Tottenham-court-road, which premises are situated at the south side of Tudor-place. An alarm was instantly given, but, from the inflammable nature of the stock, the flames had attained a most fearful ascendancy before the arrival of the engines. In the interim the brigade from Crown street, Holborn, and Well-street, arrived, which were followed by the West of England, County, and also by the engines of Combe and Delafield, and Sir H. Meux and Co., and there being a plentiful supply of water, the devouring element was arrested in its fearful progress, or the devastation would have been immense: but, notwithstanding all the exertions, an area of about an acre has been completely laid waste, whilst many houses in the immediate vicinity have been materially injured; among these were the back of the houses of Mr. Peplow, surgeon, 13, Tottenham-court-road; Mrs Wilkie, straw-bonnet maker, No. 14; Mr. Palmer, perfumer, No. 15: Mr. Kyezer, clockmaker, No. 16; Mr. Johnson, shoemaker, No. 17; and Mr. Watchorn's wine vaults, No. 11, at the corner of Tudor-place. In addition to these the St. Patrick's School at the rear was much damaged in the roof; the back part of the shop of Mr. Baldock, chinaman to her Majesty, and also the premises of Mr. Stone, in Tudor-place. The extensive premises of Mr. Baldock, wherein there is a very large stock of ancient and modern foreign and British porcelain, were saved from total destruction by the exertions of the fire brigade, as were the backs of the houses in Tottenham-court-road; the premises of Mr Stone (of the Brecknock Arms, Camden-town), on the north side of Tudor-place, who is owner of several houses, and keeps the upper part of the building as a storehouse for materials, the lower part being occupied by Mr. Kearslake, a tinman, were affected by the fire so as to render them untenable. These premises are on the opposite side of Tudor-Place, to the roof of which the flames communicated; and the places in the rear, including that of Mr. Jones, also a tallow-chandler, were saved from destruction by the exertions of Mr. Connerton, the foreman, and the firemen of the West of England establishment. To the above circumstances, and the wind shifting from north-east to south-west, may be attributed the salvage of the houses mentioned. The firemen of the West of England engine ventured up Tudor-place, a narrow entry across which the flames were furiously raging, but were compelled to retreat, and shortly after, about six o'clock, several feet of the north wall of Morgan's factory fell with a tremendous crash on the spot where the engine had stood. Detachments of the C, D, E, and F divisions of the police attended, and rendered most effective service. The flames brilliantly illuminated the horizon, and were distinctly seen from the metropolitan bridges and several elevated situations, and by eight o'clock were completely out under. There were not twenty houses destroyed as has been erroneously reported, Mr. Morgan's premises alone having been totally destroyed, and only nine houses being injured. The total amount of property destroyed is about £15,000, including £2,000, the premises valued at Mr. Morgan's stock and premises, which are insured in the Sun, Brigade, Norwich Union, and Westminster fire-offices, but not to the full amount. The rest are insured in the City.

The consternation created in the neighbourhood was immense, and much panic and damage were sustained by the hasty removal of goods. At No. 14, Tottenham-court-road, reside the father and mother of Francis, who fired at Mr. Hayley, both of whom were in great trepidation. Mrs. Francis ran from her chamber in her night clothes, and was received in almost a frantic state in the arms of her landlord. Crowds of people throughout the whole of yesterday visited the scene of devastation.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—SINGULAR DREAM.—On Monday an inquest was held at the George the Fourth, Portsmouth-street, Clare-market, on the body of Joel Wright, aged 57, that was taken out of the river near Arundel-street, on Sunday morning. From the evidence of the wife of the deceased and others it appeared that his wife and a man named Richardson were "the worse far liquor" on Saturday night, and that about one o'clock on Sunday morning they were going on board a lugger, when deceased fell overboard, and although an excellent swimmer, was drowned. Everard, a lighterman, said that he was occupied until three o'clock on the Sunday morning in endeavours to get the body, but failed in the attempt. He then retired to rest, when he dreamed that deceased was fastened in the chains of Essex-street pier. He immediately repaired to the spot and hitched up the body from the chains, in which it was closely entangled. Verdict—"Accidental death."



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Lysia, Brazilian ship, left Lisbon on the 11th with 120 carpenters and other workmen on board, were emigrating to Brazil, and other vessels had recently left, or were about leaving, for the same purpose. The Calcutta put into the Tagus on the 11th, and left the next day for England, with Sir Samuel Roberts, and 150 other invalids on board. A French steamer of war from Senegal and Madeira, was staying at Lisbon. All the Portuguese authorities at Bengueila had been found guilty of conniving at the slave trade, and sentenced to various punishments.

WOOLWICH, August 19.—The Black Eagle steam-vessel, Master J. B. Cook (acting), left Woolwich on Tuesday for Chatham, and returned yesterday evening with the Lords of the Admiralty, who had been on a visit to that port. The Hydra steam-vessel, Commander A. Murray, will be paid off at Woolwich to-morrow. The Avon, steam-vessel, Lieut.-Commander Henry Byne, is expected to sail from Woolwich, on Tuesday or Wednesday next, for Portsmouth and the West Indies. The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, in consideration of the hard labour experienced by rope-makers in her Majesty's employment for the last of the navy, &c., have ordered that in future their superannuation pensions should be from £20 to £21 per annum, according to their services.

THE NIGER EXPEDITION.—Corporal T. Edmonds, of the company of Royal Sappers and Miners, stationed at Woolwich, arrived there on the 19th inst. The rest of the Royal Sappers and Miners who embarked in the Albert, Wilberforce, and Soudan steam-vessels, and who have escaped with their lives from the pestilential climate of Africa, are on their way to England, as the project for the continuance of the expedition has been abandoned. Only six persons of the Albert steam-vessel, including Corporal Edmonds, have survived the ravages of the pestiferous climate in which they served, and the river fever.

LOSS OF THE ULYSSES.—The following particulars of the loss of the above vessel, and the sufferings of her crew, will be found interesting:—On the night of Thursday, the 28th of July, the Ulysses was found to be making water fast. There being eight feet water in the hold, Captain Lakeman determined to abandon her, more especially as she was expected to have started one or more of her timbers. The boat was got out and the captain and crew, nine in number, then left. This hardy boat's crew were now without the slightest means of subsistence, and remained for four days and nights without food or drink in a small open boat, until they arrived at Ajaccio. In about half an hour after Captain Lakeman and his crew left the Ulysses, she was seen to heel over on her beam ends, and go down immediately, in lat. 42 deg. 30 min. and long 6 deg. 20 min.

MILITARY FORCE IN THE POTTERIES.—The district comprises the following 4 tachments, the whole under the command of Major Deeds:—One troop 2nd Dragoon Guards, Captain Milarney; two companies 12th infantry, Major Sir R. Douglas; two companies 34th Infantry, Major Deeds; the Newcastle and Pottery troop of Yeomanry Captain Tomlinson; the Uttoxeter troop, Hon. Captain Bagot; the Burton troop, Lieutenant Peel; the Stafford troop, Lieutenant Hand; the Lichfield troop, Lieut. Mott. Two other companies of the Staffordshire Yeomanry are out on duty. The Tamworth troop, Captain Peel, is lying at Lichfield, and the Wolverhampton troop at Stafford.

Two additional regiments are ordered to Scotland. The 6th Carbineers (dragoons) arrived in Glasgow from Ireland yesterday (Friday.) There is now a powerful body of infantry, artillery, lancers, and dragoons in this city; but there will be no need for them, for Roy of the Gallowgate will not mount his charger to face them, and good sense and better trade will become our best peace preservers. But these Chartists have occasioned the country more expense—more real loss and detriment, than would have fed the whole weavers of Paisley for 15 months to come.—Glasgow Reformers' Gazette.

The General Commanding-in-Chief has decided upon the appointment of a Lieutenant-General of the Northern District, to whose orders the Major-General now presiding over that part of the country will, of course, be subject. BELFAST ELECTION.—This election terminated on the 19th, in the return of James Emerson Tennent and David R. Ross, Esqrs. The Sovereign having announced the following as the state of the poll:—D. R. Ross, Esq., 986: J. E. Tennent, Esq., 859; Lord Chichester, 500; then declared the two former duly elected amidst warm applause.

MRS. ELLEN BYANE.—Upon leaving the Court-house, in Dublin, on Tuesday evening, this individual proceeded in a covered car to the railway station, in Westland-row, from which she was to take the train to Kingstown—sailed thence for England on the same night, and is at present domiciled at the other side of the channel.

A deplorable accident has occurred in Killaloe, during the excavations in the river near the bridge, by the Shannon Improvement Commissioners. While blasting rocks in the bed of the river with weirs, an explosion took place, and a stone block of nearly half a cwt. was blown into the air, which falling over a cabin, brought down the roof, and killed a fine young woman, named Margaret Ellis, then in bed, to the utter astonishment and horror of the family.

EXECUTION OF JAMES SHEA.—The extreme sentence of the law was carried into effect on Saturday between the hours of twelve and one o'clock, on James Shea, alias Smyth, who was found guilty at the last assizes of this town of the inhuman and most barbarous murder of Rody Kennedy, at Loughane.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

COWES—ROYAL YACHT SQUADRON REGATTA.

On Monday week, the following yachts of 65 tons and under started for the first Royal Yacht Squadron cup, of £7; viz.: Medina, of 41 tons, Capt. F. Holcombe, R.H.A.; Cynthia, 49 tons, Mr. R. Frankland; Nymph, 31, Sir J. Bayley; and Wave, 51, Captain J. Kean, R.N.

The wind at starting, at eleven o'clock, was light from E.S.E.; the course 42 miles from Cowes to the Nab Light-vessel, and back again round a vessel off Yarmouth, and thence to Cowes. The wind died away as the flood tide slackened, and the Medina was the only vessel to round the Nab Light before the tide set in, the other vessels did not round till two or three hours after, during the whole of which time the Medina was making the best of the tide back again. During the whole of the night it was a perfect calm, and next day the vessels came in as follows:

Medina, at	.. ..	.. ..	1 25 15
Cynthia	.. ..	.. ..	1 29 20
Nymph	.. ..	.. ..	1 42 43

The Wave got on shore, and did not return till some hours after. As the Medina had to give the Cynthia 40 seconds per ton, she only gained 2 minutes and 40 seconds

On Tuesday the annual ball took place, and was attended by 270 persons.

On Wednesday, the 17th, the following schooner yachts of the squadron sailed for her Majesty's cup of 100 guineas —

Yachts	Tons	Owners.
Ceramsian	164	Mr. W. Lyon.
Gem	123	The Marquis Ormonde.

Flirt	182	Sir B. B. Graham, Bart.
Narda	153	The Earl of Wilton
Harriet	192	Mr. John Beardmore
Pet	99	Captain C. Bulkeley

At starting eleven o'clock, they had a light south-easterly breeze, and S.E.; the night was beautiful, the course from Cowes to the Nab Light-vessel off Yarmouth, from thence round the Nab Light back to Cowes, 42 miles. This was one of the most beautiful races ever seen, the chances continually changing as the wind lessened or freshened. Off Ryde the Gem and Pet came in contact, by which the latter's jib-boom was carried away, by which she in all probability lost the prize On nearing the Nab Light vessel, the wind was so light that two or three of the yachts could not round it. The wind died away in the evening, and they drifted in with the tide as follows:—

Ceramsian	.. ..	.. ..	8 30 30
Gem	.. ..	.. ..	9 0 30

During the whole of the day boat racing and the Royal Marine band kept the numerous company amused. Upwards of 60 yachts, on a system very much resembling Cinque and Rear-Admiral Parker among the number in the rounds) and more than that number of other small vessels, with the Brilliant fireworks in the evening, and the illuminations with various colours, made about the harbour in the beautiful calm moonlight, caused the greatest gratification to thousands of inhabitants and visitors.

ST OLAVE'S REGATTA.

The twentieth annual regatta given by the inhabitants of St. Olave's, South-wark, took place on Monday, and was well contested, and equally as well attended. It was amongst six scullers, for four boats, on a system very much resembling the old fashioned one; three men start together for the first heat, and the other three for the second: the four worst of those for the third, and the first of that contending with the first man of the first heat and first of the second for the grand heat. William Pearce, red; John William Law, pink; and Charles Mitcham, blue, rowed the opening heat, which was won by blue, red being second. William Henry Law, green; Richard Robinson, yellow; and George Mead, purple, were the competitors in the second, which was won by yellow. The third heat was won by pink, and he, and blue man, yellow shirt, rowed the grand heat, to row from Chamberlain's Wharf to George's Stairs Horsleydown, and back again, twice, to constitute the heat. Shortly after the start blue took the lead, and won by twenty yards; yellow was second.

TATTERSALL'S, Monday.—The St. Leger betting was confined to a select few, viz.—Attila, Faraway, Ballinhelie, and Prince Tommy of this last Attila was backed at 11 to 8 and 5 to 4 (125 to 100), and at the middle of the two prices the backers would have gone on eagerly. Faraway's price was 10 to 1, taken two or three times, and afterwards offered to be laid. Ballinhelie's friends stood 7 for 20 to 1, and succeeded in getting on about £100. A strong commission in favour of Priscilla Tomboy was executed partly at 8 to 1, offers to bet the latter at the close. The odds quoted against Seahorse Polly, Cabrera, and Catonnie are nominal.

EFFECTS OF TOO MUCH WINE.

Wine heightens indifference into love, love into jealousy, and jealousy into madness. It often turns the good-natured man into an ardiot, and the choleric into an assassin. It gives bitterness to resentment, it makes vanity insupportable, and displays every little spot of the soul in its utmost deformity.—Addison.

GRAMMATICAL WITTICISM.

We don't know who originated the following, but it's a good one at all events:—"Bobby, what is the steam?"—"Boiling water." "That's right; compare it."—"Positive, boil; comparative, boiler: superlative burst."—American paper.

NAPOLEON CONQUERED BY A FEMALE.

Napoleon lived on friendly terms with the family of Mr. Balcombe in St. Helena, at a small white house, called the Briers. Miss Balcombe was a great favourite with the Emperor. She was very young, and Napoleon used to condescend to romp with her. However, one day she drew his sword, and got him up in a corner, laughing at him and preventing his escape. "Now," said she, with glee, "I have the greatest man in the world at my mercy." The Emperor, it is said, was so annoyed at this sally that he never spoke to her afterwards.

THE MALEVOLENCE OF FOLLY.

There is no prejudice more popular, nor is there any which is better worth refuting, than that which attributes to folly certain good qualities of heart, as a kind of compensation for the deficiency in those of the head. Now, although there are, of course, instances to the contrary, yet will the rule be found generally true, that mediocrity of mind has its influence in producing a mischievous disposition. Unable to carry on any lengthened chain of reasoning, the man of narrow intellect looks for some immediate result; and in his anxiety to attain his object, forgetful of the value of both character and credit, he is prepared to sacrifice the whole game of life, provided he secure but the odd trick. Besides, the very insufficiency of his resources leads him out of himself for his enjoyments and his occupations. Watching, therefore, the game of life, he gradually acquires a certain low and underhand cunning, which, being mistaken by himself for ability, he omits no occasion to display it; and hence begins the pretty warfare of malice he wages against the world with all the spiteful ingenuity and malevolence of a monkey.—Jack Hinton, by Harry Lorrequer.

SAM SLICK ON SMOKING.

The moment a man takes to a pipe he becomes a phelosifer—it is a poor man's friend—it calms the mind, soothes the temper, and makes a man patient under trouble. It has made more good men, good husbands, kind masters, indulgent fathers, and honest fellers than any other blessed thing in this universal world.

DRESSING.

Is not merely a pleasure but an occupation with some, and an art with others. It is an occupation with men of forty or more, who seek to make an impression; with pretty women of thirty, who wish to preserve a lover; with those of thirty-five, ambitious for another conquest. It is an occupation with ugly or ill-made women of every age. To the studious man, whose inclination keeps him aloof from society, but who is driven by circumstances to make his appearance in full dress, it is hard labour. It is a science which the actor studies thoughout his life; an art with the women of easy virtue. The man who always appears dressed, may be held as a more than dandy-like person, who knows not how to dress, when it becomes necessary, has a mind of trifling capacity. With women, the toilete is an infallible index to their character. The savage dresses badly; the prude dresses without grace; the slattern dresses tawdrily and without taste; and the virtuous citizen's wife knows not of all common sense; the coquette, the coquette only, possesses all the secrets of the art, knows how to choose and dispose of the several colours which compose a costume, how to decide with exactitude the size, the shape, the cut of her habiliments, and though there assistance how to increase or diminish, change or modify, hide or display that of her beauties and blemishes she thinks fit to dissimulate or discover. The Parisian woman bears off the palm with all the women of the earth for the tactics and the genius of dress, that military art of love. - Charivari.

A young gentleman, on a fishing excursion on the Mississippi, instead of putting the bait on the hook, put himself on, and did not discover his mistake, until politely informed of it by an alligator.

A SMALL MISTAKE.

"I say, neighbour Snobbs, if you don't keep your hens out of my garden, I will shoot them."—"Very well, Doolittle, shoot away; only if you kill any of my hens, throw them over into my yard." "Crack went the old fowling-piece, morning after morning, and the large fat hens were pitched into neighbour Snobb's yard like rain. After a fortnight or more, Doolittle discovered that Snobbs never had any hens, and that he had been shooting his own, they having broken out of his own hen-coop.—N. O. Picayune.

A Yankee editor gives the following as the most approved mode of killing fleas. Place the animal on a smooth pine board, and hedge him in with putty: then read him an account of all the railroad and steamboat accidents which have happened within the last twelve months. As soon as he becomes so frightened as not to be able to stir, draw out his teeth, and he will starve to death.

The mortality of bachelors, from the ages of 30 to 45, is 27 per cent. Of married men, of the same ages, 18 per cent. For 41 bachelors, who attain the age of 40, there are 78 married men. The difference is more striking as age advances. At the age of 60 there are but 22 bachelors alive for 48 married men; at 70 years, 11 bachelors for 27 married men; and at 80 years, for 3 bachelors there are 9 married men. Dr. Caspar of Berlin.

"I know of no such thing as genius," said Hozarth to Mr. Gilbert Cooper; "genius is nothing but labour and diligence."

A QUEER KIND OF CURRENCY.

At Queratare, one of the States of the United Mexican Confederacy, and in the towns of that State, a recent traveller avers that much amusement was occasioned by receiving lumps of soap as small change for silver. So strictly are they local in their use, that the current soap of one village is refused at places not half a mile distant. Some of the men found the value of this small change not at all diminished after washing with it, and probably the excess of any issue is usually washed up.

TWENTY CENTURIES SINCE.

The English armies are not the first Europeans that have appeared as invaders in Afghanistan; more than two thousand years ago, Alexander the Great opened through these lands a highway for commerce and civilisation, which was broken up by his premature death, and has ever since continued closed.

CONSCIENTIOUSNESS.

Milkmen are generally sufficiently honest to paint over their doors "milk from the dairy," knowing that they would tell a gross untruth, were they to inscribe "milk from the cow." So conscientious, indeed, are they, that, remembering the origin of their commodity, they cry "Lear."—E. J. Hytche.

THE RULING PASSION.

A gambler on his deathbed, having seriously taken leave of his physician, who told him that he could not live beyond eight o'clock next morning, exerted the small strength he had left to call the doctor back; and, having accomplished with difficulty, for he could hardly exceed a whisper, "Doctor," said he, "I'll bet you five guineas I live till nine."

EMBARKATION OF TROOPS FOR THE EAST INDIES, AT GRAVESEND.

TROOPS FOR THE EAST INDIES.

Chatham, Aug. 20.—This morning the following detachments from the Provisional Battalion of this garrison marched from Chatham to Gravesend, where they embarked on board the ship True Briton, for Madras:—47 rank and file of the 4th; 22 rank and file of the 25th; 75 rank and file of the 57th, with the following officers—Capta'n H. Gayon, 57th; Ensign Fitzgerald, 4th; Ensign John Clancy, 22nd; and Ensign R. A. Logan, 57th. The troops were medically inspected on Friday, and Sir T. Wiltshire spoke highly of their appearance. On the 28th inst., another embarkation of troops will leave this garrison for Bombay. Also left Brompton Barracks this morning 84 rank and file of the E. I. Co's troops for Gravesend, where they embarked on board the ship Vernon, for Madras. The E. I. Co's detachment is under the command of Lieut. Thomas Osborne, 40th Madras N.I.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.—THE UNITED SERVICE.

Last week the boys of Chelsea School proceeded by water in one of the iron steamers to Greenwich Hospital, where they were received on landing by the descendants of our hardy tars with drums beating and colours flying, in the presence of the Governor, Admiral Sir Robert Stopford, G.C.B., the Lieutenant Governor, Admiral Sir James Gordon, K.C.B, Captains Huskisson, Claud Simpson, Commanders Robinson, Williams, Dalzell, and Corbyn, Lieutenants Rivers, Montmorency, Tucker, Vasper, Tatton, Rouse, and Casey, in their naval uniforms. The juveniles of the United Service drew up in the grand square of the Hospital, and after greeting each other, performed various evolutions, and played a number of tunes, in the presence of their own officers and the officers of the institution. They seemed most proficient in their evolutions and their music. They were met on the green by the band of the Nava Asylum. We understand that the visit is to be continued annually, and has been procured by a wealthy old lady, who attended in her carriage on the occasion. On the return of the boys to Chelsea they were regaled at this lady's expense, she having given a donation of £20 for that purpose.—[May she live long to witness the happiness she has conferred on the children of the gallant defenders of our native land.—Ed. I. L. N.]

We cannot find a more appropriate opportunity than the present, of giving our readers a representation of a blind Greenwich Pensioner reading his Bible by means of his fingers. It is now familiarly known, that a "Bible for the blind" is in pretty general use. The letters are raised from the surface of the paper, and thus by passing the tips of the fingers along them, the words are at once recognised.

Death of Admiral Sir Robert Ricketts.—It is with sincere regret we record this event, which took place on Thursday, at the Elms, where, for many years past, this gallant and distinguished officer had resided. Sir Robert Ricketts was born in 1772, and entered the navy at a very early period—serving through the whole of the French war, and assisting, in 1815, at the reduction of Fort Boyer. He was created Baronet in 1826, and attained the rank of Vice-Admiral of the Blue in 1841. Sir Robert married, in 1802, a daughter of Richard Gumbleton, Esq., of Glencairn Castle, county Waterford; and has been succeeded in his baronetcy by his son Cornwallis, born in 1803, who is a Commander in the Navy.—Cheltenham Looker-on.

East India Steam Navigation.—The steamer India having performed her last voyage from Suez to Bombay against the height of the monsoon, a circumstance unprecedented in the annals of navigation, it may be interesting to compare a statement of that steamer's performance on her last two voyages, the first having been made in the fair season, and the second against the strength of the monsoon. On her first voyage the India left Calcutta on the 10th January last, and steamed to Suez in 25 days and 14 hours, running 4849 miles, or 182½ miles per day, consuming 680 tons of coal, or 7 6-10 lb. per horse power per hour. On her second voyage she left Calcutta on the 9th May, and steamed in 35 days 4653 miles against the wind, averaging 137 miles per day, and under sail 4 days: total distance 5089 miles, consuming 900 tons of coals, or 7¼lbs. per horse power per hour. This result is most important, as shewing that the communication by steam can be kept up with the eastern side of India at all seasons of the year. On the first voyage the Calcutta letters reached London in 46 days; the second voyage her letters were detained 24 days in Egypt waiting a conveyance.

Novel Timepiece.—A German paper mentions the production of a very powerful timepiece by Herr Lebonardi, a watchmaker of Berlin. The description, which is not very intelligible in all its parts, taken generally, is to the following effect:—This chronometer, which marks time to the 1000th of a second, is destined for observations on the rapidity of cannon balls and the distance of the firing. The dial plate is divided into 100 sections, and the hand or index, which passes over it one second, and which can be stopped and set in motion again at pleasure, is quite capiliform. But as error would be unavoidable if it were put in motion or stopped by the human finger, a galvanic connexion is established between the gun and the watch. By an ingenious contrivance the moment the ball leaves the cannon the index rises, and comes down and is stopped on the report, so that the time may be exactly marked.

A large aerolite, or meteoric stone, fell at Harrowgate a few days since. It hissed through the air during the storm, and was seen to fall like a dark object. It was warm to the touch when taken up, and weighs about half a ton. Dr. Magill, who examined it, says it is composed of basalt, with small particles of flint and album Græcum.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

STONE TO THE MEMORY OF WILLIAM RUFUS.

NEW FOREST, HAMPSHIRE.

In the bottom of a beautiful forest vale adjoining the hamlet of Canterton, near Stoney Cross, a stone is erected to point out the scene of William Rufus's death, who was accidentally slain here by Sir Walter Tyrrel, a Norman, his companion in the chase. A stag passing by, the knight discharged his arrow at him; but the weapon glancing against a tree, took a direction contrary to the one intended, and pierced the monarch through the heart. Tyrrel, on seeing him fall, immediately escaped and embarked for Normandy. The body, however, was shortly after found by a forester, who threw it in his cart, and conveyed it to Winchester, where a plain tomb is still pointed out as covering its remains. Tradition says that the name of the person who paid this attention to the deceased king, was Purkess, a charcoal maker; whose immediate male descendants still reside near the spot. It also asserts, that part of the cart on which the body was placed, existed till within these few years, when the only remaining wheel was wantonly committed to the flames.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, 23rd August, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Your fair readers will see by the drawing I send you that we have something new in the trimmings of bonnets. The wreath of white roses is put much farther back than usual, being almost on the edge of the crown. The bonnet is of white drawn silk or lace, trimmed inside with half wreaths of small blush roses, without a blond or lace cap. The dress of this figure is of pink foulard, made plain, with full skirts and tight sleeves, ending in a manchette or lace cuff, tied with a small bow of ribbon.

The camail is double, made of organdie, through which the colour of the dress throws its blushing hue: it has sleeves, as well as an additional cape, and is trimmed with a plaiting of the same, which is edged with a narrow border of lace, and forms a trimming round the throat. I must draw the attention of your fair readers to the cut of this camail, which is elegant, distingué, and peculiar; and, as much depends on it, they must direct their dressmakers to be particular in noticing its shape, following exactly the outline given by your artist.

The cap of the sitting figure is especially jaunty and smart; the bow of blue ribbon at the side, the finesse of its coquettish smartness, and the power, nevertheless, which it affords of exhibiting a taste in lace and a new style of coiffure, will render its introduction an acceptable addition to the morning toilet of young ladies in their visits at country villas this season, where the shot must be both sharp and sudden that can bring down a young sportsman intent on other game than that of love and idlesse.

This dress is also a foulard, but you must notice that it is richly brodée en rentache (embroidered with braiding), and that, too, of a military pattern. The body, you will see, is made high and close in the neck, with a petite lace collar falling over; the sleeves are made tight, and with epaulettes on the shoulders. This is considered one of the most killing walking or morning costumes of the present day; and you will find that in London, where you are generally some time after the fashion, that braid, embroidery, and lace will be the rage in your ball-rooms during the whole of the winter.

Julie.

Getting planted in the mud in any latitude between this and Gravesend, is by no means a particularly pleasant position, with the thermometer of Fahrenheit at 110 deg., and we are by no means surprised to see one choleric son of Father Thames "pitching in" to another by way of pastime. It is a beautiful provision of nature to let off the superabundant animal spirits. The above is a queer situation for "a mill," we must say; the oddest paddle-box we ever saw in our lives.

The Oriental Steamer.—The statement relative to a fire having occurred on board the Oriental steamer, belonging to the Oriental Steam Navigation Company, is without the slightest foundation. A fire took place, under circumstances similar to those described, in a sailing vessel of the same name on the outward voyage from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres, and by the misapprehension of the reporter, it was said to have taken place in the Oriental steamer, the only vessel of that name known to the public.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

MADEMOISELLE CAROLINE, AT VAUXHALL.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.

Vauxhall Gardens have been, at the reduced prices, completely crowded during the week, and one of the principal and most interesting of their attractions, consists certainly in the beautiful equestrian achievements of Mademoiselle Caroline, who is, perhaps, the most graceful as well as wonderful lady-rider the public has ever beheld. After what she has performed, we are inclined to think that, had she lived in the time of Phaeton, she would have taught him to have driven the chariot of the sun, and so despoil the heathen mythology of one of its most instructive morals. She makes two displays of her extraordinary talent. The one which we consider the more interesting, we have chosen to depict—the ordeal of training a horse to the highest point of tractability; putting him through a thousand playful manœuvres; in short making him obey her at will. The other, the mere act of graceful riding, which she does with surprising grace and power. One of her magic influences is making her steed pirouette with her to a waltz movement, which he does as if he had been taught by a Coulon or a Taglioni. This is really a pretty and a clever exhibition, and it is mightily enacted to the surprise and delight of many hundreds of admiring spectators.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed Mr. Sergeant Stephen a country commissioner under the recent Bankruptcy Act; and Mr. Francis Barlow one of the commissioners in lunacy.

Death of William Maginn, Esq., LL.D.—With deep regret we have to record the death of Doctor Maginn, on Saturday last, at his residence, Walton-upon-Thames. Dr. Maginn was in his 49th year, and for the last year and upwards suffered from confirmed consumption. He has left a widow and three children, we fear without any provision but the claim of the lamented deceased upon the gratitude of the country, and more especially of the Conservative party.

Mr. John George, the only patriot that remained of the old stock who figured in the time of Horne Tooke, Hardy, Thelwall, Gale Jones, Clio Rickman, &c., expired in great penury, a few days since, at his humble residence near Lambeth Butts, in the 75th year of his age, and was buried on Sunday week, in the burial-ground, Bunhill-fields, by the Chartists, where lie the remains of three of the above-named reformers.

The Turnip Fly.—It may appear somewhat remarkable, but it is a certain fact, that rabbits which are in the habit of feeding upon field turnips which are affected by the turnip-fly, contract a vermicular disorder, which appears to have escaped the notice of the most accurate observer of nature. The worm generated by the fly, which is a tentredo, must, it would seem, be deposited in the shape of ova in the plant, and in that form be taken into the animal's stomach.

The Murder at Highbury.—On Friday it was ordered by Government that Mrs. Daly, the widow of Timothy Daly, the murdered policeman, should be paid £450 from the Treasury. Mott, the baker, who was wounded, £50, and Moss, the policeman, £20. The two latter persons are perfectly recovered, and are now at their usual vocations.

Madlle. Cerito kindly offered her services gratis, at the Italian Opera House, in behalf of the distressed operatives in the disturbed districts. Such noble conduct is deserving of the highest praise.

Death of Admiral Sir H. Digby, K.C.B.—Sir Henry expired at Minterne Hall, his seat in Dorsetshire, on Friday week. The deceased admiral, who was the eldest son of the Hon. and Rev. W. Digby, Dean of Durham, uncle of the Earl of Digby, was in his 73rd year. At Trafalgar he commanded the Africa, and the services he rendered on that memorable occasion were such that he received a medal and the thanks of both Houses of Parliament on his return to this country.

South Hants Election.—Lord Charles Wellesley was elected member of Parliament for South Hants, in the room of Dr. Fleming, at Southampton, on Tuesday.

The Office of High Bailiff of Southwark.—As it has been very confidently stated in the City, that Mr. Harvey, the commissioner of the City police, will be appointed high bailiff of Southwark, several candidates have already started for the office of commissioner of the City police. The gentlemen, whose names are given according to the form in which they appear to be with the corporation, are as follows:—Captain Kincaid, governor of Bridewell, a gentleman introduced to the notice of the members of the corporation by the most eminent military men in the kingdom, under whom the captain fought through the Peninsular war; Colonel Angelo, Colonel Grant, and Major-General Sir Burgess Camac.

The Green Park.—A new footpath for the public has been formed through the centre of the ground occupied by the late ranger, extending to the garden of the Earl of Coventry, where it branches off to the old road.

The New Tariff. We continue to have importations of cattle under the new tariff, and, if the speculation continues to answer the purpose of the spirited gentlemen who engage in it, the meat market will, no doubt, be soon lower.—Hull Rockingham.

Fire on the Great Western Railway.—On Wednesday week the luggage in a van, which was placed next to the tender of the engine affixed to the five o'clock tram from Paddington, caught fire in consequence of a lighted cinder flying out from the furnace when about two miles on the London side of West Drayton. Several of the packages were immediately ignited, and, upon the arrival of the train at that station, many of them were in flames. The necessary assistance being then at hand, the lighted packages were promptly removed, and a good supply of water prevented the further destruction of much valuable property.

The Queen of Holland's Jewels.—A letter from the Hague, Aug. 15, in the Constitutionnel, states that the diamonds of the Queen of Holland have been again stolen. Suspicion at present rests on one of her Majesty's footmen.

The Lancaster and Preston Railway Company have leased the line to the Lancaster Canal Company for a period of 21 years, the agreement being that the Canal Company shall pay four per cent. per annum upon the paid up capital, to be further increased should it eventually be determined to carry the railway forward to Carlisle.

THE MONUMENT, FISH-STREET-HILL.

The City Lands Committee, at a meeting on Monday, determined, in order to prevent any other persons from precipitating themselves from the top of this pillar, to place some strong iron bars, fixed sufficiently close over the head of the visitor to leave no chance of squeezing through. The additional railings will be painted white, so as to be invisible at a distance. The surveyor of works was directed to proceed with the alteration immediately, and till it is finished the Monument will remain closed.

The Income-Tax.—It has been decided by the commissioners of Taxes, that the carriage and horses of a medical man, although required for the exercise of his profession, if occasionally used by him or his family for pleasure, cannot be deducted from his profits, nor will any deduction be made for the assessed taxes on them.

The Great Western Steamer.—It is not generally known that every probability now exists of this vessel being shortly obliged to discontinue running between this country and America. Indeed, from present prospects we should conceive it an act of madness and extreme folly for her to make another voyage, as it is now certain that every passage made must only contribute to plunge her owners into further difficulties, and render their condition the more desperate. The concern is in the very reverse of a flourishing state, and, unless speedily brought to a close, must involve the proprietary in sad pecuniary difficulty. There are calls and arrears of calls on capital to the amount of £27,000, but of course, in a proprietary of such dismal prospects, it is impossible to say what amount of this is likely to be paid up. Liverpool Albion. [This statement, so far as relates to the discontinuance of this splendid steamer's voyages between this country and New York, has been officially contradicted.]

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE NEW COURT.

The August Sessions of the Central Criminal Court commenced on Monday morning before the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Aldermen Farebrother and Gibbs, the Sheriffs, and other civic officers. The calendar contains the names of 359 prisoners for trial, of which number 49 stand committed by the City magistrates; 273 by the Middlesex magistracies; Admiralty, 1; Essex, nil; Kent, 19; Surrey, 17; and we understand since the calendar was printed, nearly 40 other prisoners have been committed to Newgate. Mr. Barry, the architect of the Houses of Parliament, who had been summoned on the grand jury, was excused on the ground that he had to attend meetings of the Committee of Fine Art, in connexion with the rebuilding of the Houses of Lords and Commons. The Court, however, directed that Mr. Barry should be summoned again next sessions.—Mr. Brunel, the engineer, was fined £20 for not attending.—The Grand Jury having been sworn, the Recorder addressed them on the nature of the public duty they were called upon to perform. The learned judge said the calendar lying before him contained within a fraction the names of 360 individuals, whose cases they had to inquire into, and no doubt before their labours terminated that number would exceed 400. Amongst the numerous charges he regretted to see that no less than 51 were against servants, for larceny in robbing their employers; there were nine cases of receiving stolen goods, six charges of cutting and maiming, three of murder, and others of persons charged with aggravated offences. It was certainly true that a long time had elapsed since the last sessions of the Criminal Court, but still he regretted to say that the number for trial on that occasion was exceedingly large. Amongst the various crimes was one for an attack on her Majesty's person. Since that offence had been committed the legislature had passed an act for the better security of the Queen's person. He had before alluded to 51 cases of felony by servants; that was a growing evil, which it would be the bounden duty of magistrates and the courts to put a check to if possible, by awarding heavy punishments on all those convicted of so serious a crime. With respect to the charges of murder, he had read the depositions, and as they would all turn on matters of fact and not of law, he did not think it necessary to detain them with any remarks. After a few general observations on the minor cases in the calendar, and paying a compliment to the vigilance of the police, the learned Recorder told the grand jury that if they found any difficulty in the course of their inquiries, the court would afford every information necessary to guide them. The grand jury then retired.—The remainder of the morning was occupied in swearing in the common juries, and trying some cases of misdemeanour of no public interest.

TRIAL OF JOHN HEAD FOR ATTEMPTING TO SHOOT THE QUEEN.

John Wilson Bean, the deformed boy, aged 16, a wretched and diminutive looking being, apparently not more than 12 or 13 years of age, was on Thursday morning indicted for a misdemeanour, in having presented a pistol at her Majesty the Queen, on the 3rd of July last.—The prisoner, on being arraigned, pleaded not guilty. The Attorney and Solicitor General, Mr. Adolphus, Mr. Wedderburn, and Mr. R. Gurney, conducted the prosecution, and Mr. Henry defended the prisoner.

The Attorney-General stated the case for the prosecution. On the 3rd July her Majesty was passing from St. James's to Buckingham Palace in a carriage, when the prisoner at the bar presented a pistol, and attempted to discharge it at the Queen. A person, whose testimony the jury would hear, snatched the pistol from the prisoner, upon which the latter ran away, but was afterwards apprehended. The person of whom the prisoner purchased the pistol would also be examined before them; and a letter which the prisoner had written to his father some time before this transaction would be put in and read. Nothing could be more calculated to lead to excitement and trouble than such an act as that with which the prisoner stood charged.—The facts of the case were so recent and so well known, that it would be almost waste of time to detail them. The observations of the Attorney-General were fully borne out.—Mr. Henry took several objections to the form of the indictment, the principal of which were, that if the prisoner had been guilty of an assault upon her Majesty, he was guilty of high treason, and could not be indicted for a misdemeanour; that the charge of levelling a pistol at the carriage was no offence against the law, as no alarm had been created in the mind of the sovereign, and there was no proof that any assault had been committed. The learned judges overruled the objections, and said they should let the case go to the jury.—Mr. Henry then rose to address the jury for the defence. The line taken by the learned counsel was to throw ridicule on the idea that the prisoner ever contemplated any assault whatever upon the Queen, and that the witness Dassett had confounded in her own mind the question of such intention, and the act itself of carrying such intention into effect. If there had been anything of the nature of the offence imputed to the prisoner, was it likely that the police should have refused to take the charge? After some general remarks, he concluded by calling Mr. H. Hawkes, who stated that he resided in Brunswick-place, City-road. I was in the park on the 3rd July, and saw the elder Dassett standing in the middle of the road, in the act of taking the prisoner into custody, he (Dassett) having the pistol in his hand at the time. Dassett said he had taken the pistol from the prisoner. The carriage had passed, and I was looking at it. If any person had raised his hand to present a pistol, it is probable that I must have seen him. The prisoner might have got away if he had liked; he was walking by the side of Dassett, and there was a great crowd. Dassett was examining the lock of the pistol. He appeared to treat the matter lightly; he was laughing and smiling, as were other persons; I myself smiled.—Thomas Vosper, a journeyman painter, deposed that he saw the prisoner the day in question, with the pistol, which he held downwards; he did not present it as he was charged, for had he done so witness must have seen it. He would undertake to swear he never presented it at her Majesty's carriage.—David Hillam, a newsvender, gave prisoner a good character for mildness and gentleness of disposition; and several other persons bore him testimony, including the prisoner's father.—The Attorney-General addressed the jury in reply. He wished them to bear in mind that the prisoner was not charged with high treason, and that the question for them to consider was, what were the facts of the case which were worthy of credit. The learned gentleman proceeded to comment upon all the evidence which had been adduced in support of the case for the prosecution, as well as that which had been given in support of the defence, and concluded a long and able address by leaving the case in the hands of the jury.—Lord Abinger then summed up, and the jury, after two minutes' deliberation, returned a verdict of Guilty on the second count—intending to harass, perplex, and alarm her Majesty.—Lord Abinger then sentenced him to be imprisoned in the gaol of Newgate for eighteen calendar months.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—YORK, AUG. 20,

HULLAH AND WIFE, v. DOLBY AND WIFE.

This was an action for assault and battery. Mr. Watson for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Dundas for the defence.—The parties reside at Bishop Monkton, near Knaresborough, Mr Hullah being a shopkeeper and Mr. Dolby a farmer. There had been, it would appear, a feud of some standing between the Montagues and Capulets of Bishop Monkton, which finally came to a crisis on the morning of the 19th of March last. According to the testimony in support of the plaintiff's case Mrs. Hullah was peaceably proceeding on her way to Knaresborough market, intent on fur other thoughts than those of war, when in passing a gateway where Mrs Dolby was standing, the latter lady, forgetting for the moment the delicacy of her sex, struck Mrs. Hullah a blow on the nose, giving her a pair of "black and blue eyes," of a style somewhat different from those of which Moore has so pathetically sung. Mrs Hullah was obliged to lay by a little to refit, but finally proceeded on her journey to Knaresborough, where she procured medical advice. According to the evidence for the defence, however, Mrs. Hullah had been the aggressor Mrs. Dolby was standing in the gateway already mentioned, when Mrs. Hullah passed, and gave Mrs. Dolby a blow on the breast, which made her stagger backward, accompanying the attack with certain expressions indicating a doubt of Mrs. Dolby's chastity. This, of course, was not to be borne, and it was only, as alleged, on being thus called upon at once to defend her person and her fair fame, that she gave the blow which formed the subject of the present action.—The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, £5.

On the Crown side a number of cases were disposed of during the day, which were, however, of the usual class, and contained nothing of any public interest.

Nearly 100 prisoners from the disturbed districts have already, it is said, been lodged in the Castle, which was already sufficiently crowded, the original calendar containing the names of no fewer than 137 prisoners. The trial of these cases would, it was thought, have occupied about three weeks, being a week more than can be expected still to come in, seems to put it out of the power of the present Judges to deliver the gaol in any reasonable time, if these cases are to be disposed of at the present assizes. A large proportion of the prisoners, however, are, it is believed, not committed for trial, but merely remanded for further examination, and it will probably be thought better to arraign the whole before a special commission. The grand jury, however, has been discharged, and the next again in the course of next week.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.—DEVIZES

(Before Mr. Justice Cresswell.)

HOOK V. CONWAY

This was an action for a breach of promise of marriage, to which the defendant pleaded that he did not promise. Mr Erle and Mr. Bestow conducted the plaintiff's case; Mr. Crowder and Mr. Butt appeared for the defendant.—Mr Erle stated the plaintiff's case, which was shortly as follows:—The witnesses who were called in her behalf. The learned counsel introduced his fair client to the attention of the jury as an amiable young lady, who had passed the flighty time of youth and had attained the thoughtful age of twenty-six or 28. She no longer, therefore, had an ear for the soft nothings and idle prattle of green young men, whose heads were teeming with dreams of romantic love, and such like stuff of that sort. The grave period of age was that which was most addicting to the heart, and thus it was, perhaps, that she had opened her ear to the sober tale of love, and her heart to the venerable blandishments of the defendant, who had attained the good old age of 65. At any rate, it was the plaintiff had long loved, fondly loved the defendant. She had nourished the thought that she should, ere long, become his wife, share the old gentleman's pleasures, and bear a part of his pains, and thus, hand-in-hand together they should go down the stream of life carrying peace affection could make them, until separated by that inevitable destiny that separates all human transactions and unions. The defendant had had the best opportunities of promising his suit, and of endeavouring the means of winning the fair plaintiff, and winning them as the soft tendril of a weak and clinging vine secured its venerable but still stout and manly form. He was related to the plaintiff's mother, being her first cousin, and the best intimacy had always existed between the families. This led to reciprocal visits; and it was at one of these visits paid by the plaintiff to the defendant and his family, that he first commenced the soft attack which had led to this action. There was no longer privity, however, in this visit. The defendant was a widower, and had several children. One of these, Miss Mary Ann Conway (who was about the age of the plaintiff), resided with her father, as did also another young lady of the same name, and an old aunt, who had attained her 60th year. The plaintiff had gone to make a visit of a month; but, alas! she visit was for love, and seemed by the wishes and desire of defendant, she had lingered and lingered under the roof of her lover until eleven long months had passed away. During this time it was proved that the amorous pair had got up at lovers' hours, and had walked forth hand in hand, like Adam and Eve of old, while the birds were still singing their matin songs, and warbling their morning tunes. But all happiness has an end; and at length the young lady was obliged to leave, and return to the house of her parents. There she was followed by her aged lover a few days after her return. He staid some days, and then once more a cruel separation took place, the old gentleman being obliged to go to Poole, to look after the numerous mercantile transactions in which he was there engaged. Then began an epistolary correspondence, which has so justly been termed the food of love. The lovers did not sign these letters in their own names; the regions of poetry had been entered, and the old gentleman had taken to himself the name of "Collin," and his fair correspondent that of "Lambkin;" and to avoid all discovery of the soft theft, he was accustomed to sign the word backwards, so that his letters concluded with the euphonious name of "Nilloc.' One letter contained a lock of his grey hair. Letters also from the young lady were read, some of which created considerable amusement. In a letter dated "murder will out," and so will love; and from the letters of these lovers, it appeared that various jokes were passed upon them in reference to their passion for each other. This led the young lady to urge upon her aged lover the propriety of assuming names which would the delicate engagement they had formed. He answered this request by pleading his modesty, but promised to put himself in mamma's way, and if she questioned him, and he supposed she would, she promised to acknowledge the plaintiff's impeachment. But time passed on, and the wicked old lover allowed the fire of his affection to cool, and seemed to draw back from a fulfilment of that engagement which was to the plaintiff all the bright hopes and lively expectations which the defendant had awakened in her mind. He came to sec her, and, overcome by the sight, the young lady nearly sunned in his arms. This awakened his dormant passion; he tenderly embraced her, supported her from falling, hung over her with a lover's fondness, while he bathed her fair temples with the richest perfumes from the garden of love. He expressed his sorrow at the painful effects of his faithlessness, and, as an atonement, promised that he would make her his wife in the space of six months at the furthest. This promise he had refused to satisfy, and it was to recover a compensation for the wounded lady that this action was brought. He was proved to have considerable property.—The jury, after a minute's consultation, expressed a wish to retire to consider their verdict. They were absent about a quarter of an hour, and then returned into court, and pronounced a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, one farthing.

GUILDHALL.—On Saturday Charles Wilson was put forward charged with going about on Friday night for the purpose of tearing down from the walls the proclamations issued in the City by the Lord Mayor. A city policeman deposed that he was passing along the Old Bailey when he saw the defendant come out of a public house, and deliberately tear down the proclamation which had been posted against the wall. As soon as he had accomplished this, he threw up his hat and cried out, "Hurrah for liberty;" and witness took him into custody.—The prisoner, in his defence, said he was very sorry, and would not offend again.—He was discharged

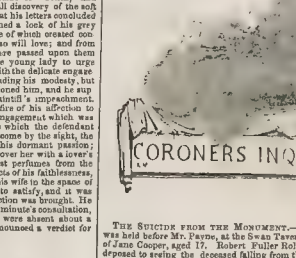
BOW-STREET.—George Snell, a shoemaker, residing in Whitecross-street, was brought before Mr. Twyford, charged with causing a mob to assemble by carrying a banner in St. John-street. The prisoner, it appeared, was observed about seven o'clock in the evening proceeding along Smithfield with another man, carrying the union-jack produced, on a long bamboo, and on getting into St. John-street they were joined by a mob of 500 persons. The other banner was blue, with a motto, and the cap of liberty on the top; but the man who was bearing it threw it in the street and ran away. The mob continued shouting and hissing the police, so as to cause much apprehension to several housekeepers; and on searching the prisoner at the station-house a large case-knife, which had been recently ground down and sharpened, was found upon him.—The prisoner said he had received a shilling at a coffee-shop from two men to carry the flag, and the knife was constantly used by him at his work.—Mr. Twyford ordered him to put in sureties in £50 each, to answer the charge at the sessions.

Richard Stainsbury, a surgical-instrument maker, of Fetter-lane, and Charles Smith, a porter, of Islington, were next placed at the bar, charged with assaulting the constables of the G division, and obstructing them in the execution of their duty. About nine o'clock on Friday night some men and boys had assembled in Clerkenwell-green, and on their being dispersed, several others joined them, the prisoner Stainsbury haranguing them, saying, "Stand together, and we'll have our rights." Constable 133 G instantly laid hold of him, when he kicked, and called out to the mob to rescue him. He struggled with him along the Bagnigge-wells-road, about 500 persons followed, the prisoner Smith being in front, and calling out to the mob to rescue the prisoner. Before they had arrived at the station-house a stone was thrown, by which the officer was struck on the back of the head.—The prisoners denied the charge; and they were each sent to the House of Correction for one month.—A constable, named Edward Sweeney, of the F division, proved the assault, and said different persons struck his body, and he remains in such a precarious state as to prevent, for the present, his attendance to give evidence against a tailor, named Pring, residing in the Commercial-road East, who, he believed, struck him with a stone on the head, while conveying a prisoner to the station-house.

THAMES-OFFICE.—On Saturday Captain Partridge, master of the Jarrow of Liverpool, was charged on the wilful murder of three Spanish sailors on the high seas, between the coast of Africa and Trinidad, and on arriving at the latter island, in confinement in her Majesty's steamer Alban, which arrived on Friday at Woolwich from Cape Coast Castle. Partridge had been for some time detained by the Spanish authorities for non-payment of bonds for the liberation of his crew's seamen. On being claimed by our Government, the prisoner was given up.—The first witness was Joseph Sherry Capo, who said he went out as boatswain in the Jarrow, and came home as mate. He gave his evidence in a very unsatisfactory manner, and pressed and threatened him, saying he was determined to get the whole of the facts out of him. The ship was bound to Africa, and when taken from Africa to Liverpool, and soon after she sailed she became very leaky, which compelled them to put into Prince's Island, where they shipped four Spaniards as able seamen, that who proved to be quite novices. They had been taken out of a slaver by a man of war, and where all ill when they came on board, but two of them particularly so. The first, whom they called Humbry, was flogged because he could not do his duty properly; he died like sticks after he was first beaten; he was flogged repeatedly; neither of the Spaniards had a hammock; they had small mats and rugs to lie upon; the day before Humbry died witness found him in the scuppers, and pulled him out; he supposed he had been sitting on some of the spars, and by the rolling of the ship fell off The second, called Manuena, was continually flogged by the captain; he was beaten 36 hours before he died on the head with a double-lided log-stick, the frame of which broke into a dozen pieces; the man's head was cut severely and bled profusely, but he was, nevertheless, kept on deck for two hours till his time was up, and then he went to the pump; he either could not or would not pump, and the captain sent him into the rigging for four hours and a half; when he left the rigging he was insensible and never moved afterwards. The third man was called Rosanne. He was beaten as often as the others; he was flogged before he had been on board a dozen hours because he could not pump hard enough. This man did not die until they reached Terre Isle, witness had repeatedly seen the captain knock him down; the man was dirty, and he died through dirt and weakness, and hard work. When the ship performed quarantine the man was mustered with the others at the gangway, but nothing was said to the doctor who came alongside about his being ill. All three of the men went to the pumps when they could scarcely stand. Witness had reported to the captain that one of the Spaniards was too ill to come on deck, and was ordered to rouse him dead or alive.—The prisoner said he found the Spaniard asleep at the foot of the pump when he gave him a "slap" with the rope. Richard Gerrard, carpenter of the ship, detailed a number of gross cruelties, and added that the Spaniards had less provisions than the other men. The man who died at Teneriffe had his arm in a sling, and was unable to work when he came from the captain. They had shipped two Frenchmen at Liverpool; one ran away at Teneriffe, and was also dispatched from the ship one morning when on the coast of Africa. It was supposed the lumpers had murdered him, and he was thought to be out of his mind.—Other witnesses deposed to the extreme cruelties practised towards the Spaniards; and ultimately the magistrate remanded the prisoner on the charge of murder.

MR. CHURCHILL'S CASE.—A base conspiracy to extort money from a gentleman named Churchill was fully exposed on Monday at Marlborough-street, through the zeal and activity of the police. A charge of a very grave nature was made against Mr. Churchill by two ruffians, in Hyde-park, who are now in the course of being punished for their infamous conduct.

CLERKENWELL.—Several cases of disorderly conduct on Clerkenwell-green were heard on Tuesday before Mr. Combe, most of which were dismissed, with trifling punishments or reprimands. One, however, claimed some attention. A shoemaker named Baker, who gave his address, 19 Paul's-square, Paul's-street, Finsbury, was charged, by police-constable G 153, with creating a disturbance and causing a mob in Clerkenwell-green, on Friday evening. Among other inflammatory cries, he exclaimed "Down with the police," and when apprehended even by the constables, his answer was—"We'd show what we could do with you, if we had you singly." The prisoner, who evidently considered himself in an enviable situation, because of the facilities which his position afforded him of making a speech, looked into the body of the court to catch from the eyes of three or four Chartists who attended the trial, confidence and sympathy. Having delivered a stilted harangue by the aid of notes, he proceeded to cross-examine the principal evidence against him.—Mr. Combe, addressing the prisoner, said: You have too much to k for one in your condition of life, and are just the sort of man to inflame the minds of the ignorant. You go out of your own district and talk upon every subject with consummate assurance in a way which is calculated to be productive of much mischief. I shall send you for fourteen days to the House of Correction. The prisoner, who evidently expected that he should be sent to the Home Secretary for the purpose of suggesting the best means of improving the social condition of the people, seemed somewhat amazed, but soon collecting himself, he cast a glance of mingled pity and contempt at the magistrate, and strutted to his cell with an air of mock martyrdom and dignity which Keeley alone could imitate.



THE SUICIDE FROM THE MONUMENT.—On Saturday afternoon, an inquest was held before Mr. Payne, at the Swan Tavern, King William-street, on the body of Jane Cooper, aged 17. Robert Fuller Rolfe, a policeman, and George Pike, deposed to seeing the deceased falling from the top of the Monument, but their statements did not vary from the account already given. The evidence of Jenkins, the keeper of the Monument, was next taken, but no new facts were elicited. —Nathaniel Fletcher said he was on duty yesterday morning at nine o'clock. The deceased came about a quarter past ten o'clock, and asked to view the Monument. She then went up stairs. He was with her at the top; but hearing a door shut he left for a short time, during which she threw herself off. He thought she had gone down stairs. In answer to questions by the jury, the witness said he had only had half a pint of beer in the morning of Friday. The last time he saw the young woman she was standing at the iron staff The witness appeared to have an imperfect recollection of what took place.—A female acquaintance of the deceased, named Sarah Trimmer, living at Wandsworth, stated that deceased called upon her on Thursday. She appeared very happy, and said she was going to Camberwell fair.—Mr. Rowbottom stated that deceased was in his service. She left her employ on Thursday, and did not return.—Mrs. Rowbottom stated that when she deceased left home on Thursday morning, she said that she was going for a holiday to Vauxhall. During the time she was in her service, she never appeared low-spirited, and witness was not aware that any young man had called to see her.—Sarah Cooper, deceased's mother-in-law, deposed that deceased was rather gaily inclined. When out of service she was in the habit of staying out late at night. She had a very bad temper, and had talked of self-destruction on various occasions. She had often expressed a wish to see the Monument.—Mr. Fuller, surgeon, of King William-street, stated that he saw the deceased shortly after she had thrown herself from the Monument; she was quite dead. He did not think she was enceinte, but no doubt existed that she had deviated from the paths of virtue.—Two married sisters of the deceased were next examined, but neither of them could explain the cause which led her to commit the fatal act.—Mr Bleaden then entered into an explanation of the mode in which strangers were admitted to view the Monument. After the last fatal accident, a person had been appointed to accompany those parties who went to the top; but, it appeared that in this case, during his temporary absence, the unfortunate female threw herself from the top of the Monument A committee of the Common Council was summoned to meet on Monday, when the present state of the Monument would be taken into consideration.—The Coroner having summed up the evidence, the jury returned the following verdict:—"That deceased destroyed herself while labouring under temporary insanity, brought on by intoxication."

On Saturday forenoon, a long inquiry took place before Mr. T. Wakley, M P., and a respectable jury of householders, at the Red Cow, Charterhouse-lane, on the body of Mr James Tooth, the stockbroker, residing at No. 19, in the same street, who met his death by the extraordinary occurrence which befel the Dart steamer, at Blackfriars-bridge, on the evening of the Monday preceding. The jury, after a short consultation, returned the following special verdict:—"That the deceased died from mortal injuries inflicted upon him by a certain piece of iron belonging to the gas-pipe of a certain bridge, which was thrown down upon him by means of a certain apparatus belonging to the vessel called the Dart."

CHINESE REGIMEN FOR THE AGED.

The following directions with regard to the course recommended to the aged, is taken from the Kow-kin-e tung, which is a collection of all that had been published on the subject of medicine up to the year 1617 —reduced into order and a concise form. The Doctors of the Imperial College of Medicine, who published it with the consent and sanction of the Government, had made it one of their duties to support and insist upon everything that had any connection with filial piety, or could direct medicine to what concerns the health of fathers and mothers.

It is first observed in a preface that old age, as Mencius says, is an age when life is nothing but an uncertainty and the accumulation of many cares, and then is insinuated that, according to the doctrine of the King filial piety is the first virtue of man, and the care of the health of one's parents the first of his duties, it is laid down that this care ought to increase in proportion as fathers and mothers are falling into the misery and infirmities of old age. But this care may become more pernicious than useful, if it is not enlightened by medicine.

According to Tsou-Tsze, who lived so long a time, wisdom and innocence are the sources of long life; according to Mencius nothing so rests the blood and purifies the humours, as peace of mind. According to the ancient sages, to speak but little fortifies and preserves the vital spirits: simple and frugal nourishment preserves the balm of the blood: in presence, and subdue the sallies of anger, preserves the temperature of the liver: succulent and chosen aliments, preserves the strength of the stomach; the serenity of the thoughts preserves the balance of the heart and the regularity of its movements. Medicine is in accordance with morality in all these points, and so agrees with her, that were mankind faithful to her ordinances, they would escape the greater number of illnesses. This observation is most important for old men. The first care of filial piety in a son ought to be to persuade his father and mother of these truths. The remedies of medicine can do nothing but diminish the evil consequences of what has been done contrary to these doctrines, and even then, they do not always succeed.

Remedies are made to assist nature. When she is feeble, languishing and exhausted, as it often happens in old age, it is still less dangerous to abandon her to herself than to assist her too much. The efforts which she is then forced to make are often fatal, and induce a cure, very often, at the price of many years of life. The first rule of preservation for old men, is to attack none of their infirmities with violent remedies. A wise old man will attempt nothing but impeding their progress and diminishing their pain—frequent, gentle, and, at first, are the true means of curing trifling diseases. In the more violent, nothing must be done with roughness; a good physician never expresses himself to risk remedies too strong and too powerful. As to the rest you must not delude yourselves; nature as a matter of course gives way in old age—death makes its approaches, and you should dream of diverting attacks which come from the constitution or from the time which each one has led: one infirmity exhausts the violence of others.

Old age is an age of decay, of wasting, of falling. The whole nature of the body is changed; you must accommodate yourself to this new condition. Whether you have been occupied with the labours of the body or the cares of the closet, you can no longer give them the same time, nor employ in them the same strength: you must diminish the load from day to day under the pain of a sudden close. A son ought to influence his parents therein, and warn them from the foolish idea of not wishing to appear old. It is with everything else as it is with work; after a certain age, you can no longer bear the same clothes, eat the same things, support the same rigours of weather, resist certain sorrows, nor even take pleasure in repasts and festivals. You are changed, and everything round you must change. The life which you have led—the diseases which you have had—and the constitution which you possess, decide old age more than length of time. To pay attention to only the number of years, is to expose oneself to diminish their number.

Spring and summer, autumn and winter, are only different seasons for those who are in the bloom of their age. They are critical times for all men. A son ought to watch with the greatest attention over a father in the transition from one to another. The fevers of spring, the colics of summer, the dysenteries of autumn, the colds of winter, are of extreme importance to old men. It is much easier to prevent than to cure.

CITY IMPROVEMENTS.—For some time past, a great number of men have been employed in pulling down the houses on the south side of Caicaton-street, west of King-street, Cheapside, for the purpose of widening the carriage-way. There being at present scarcely seven feet of roadway, it is impossible for two vehicles to pass each other.

THE BEAUTIES OF WAR.

(From the Illuminated Magazine.)

The deadly animosity which existed between the French and Prussians during the occupation of France by the allied army, can hardly be conceived by any but those who were spectators of it: it showed itself in a thousand modes; not merely in contest in the field in the serious antagonism of war, but in the most trivial and insignificant actions of ordinary life. The hatred was reciprocal. I have seen a Prussian officer, when his load of wood came to his quarters, make the carter wait an hour, to his own inconvenience, before he would allow it to be unloaded; the man standing all the while in the rain, swearing with the peculiar grace and volubility of that period—a fashion so extraordinary, that those who have only visited France within the last twenty years cannot form to themselves an idea of the extent to which the accomplishment may be cultivated. The man in his turn would contrive to place all the worst pieces of wood to come out first, so as to give the impression that the whole was of inferior quality; and when the Prussian had exhausted himself with complaints and remonstrances, and the Frenchman with oaths and exclamations, (that the worst wood in the world was too good for a Prussian,) he would ostentatiously place all the fine pieces uppermost, with a smirk which seemed to say, "Now, you can't make a complaint to the authorities, for the wood is better than average, and I have had my revenge by worrying you!"

A row of the largest pieces of artillery was placed along the Quai Voltaire, and all that side of the river down to the Chamber of Deputies. Night and day stood by the side of each a man with lighted match, and it was understood that they were loaded to the muzzle with grape shot. Directly in front of them, across the river, were booths, swings, stalls for fruit and confectionary, printsellers (not the most decent), rope-dancers, mountebanks, and all other caterers for the public amusement; while grown men and women were amusing themselves with all the enthusiasm of children, apparently unconscious of the existence of the deadly instruments of warfare which pointed their brazen throats at them. The indifference to danger generated by habits of warfare is inconceivable by those who have never seen it. Every individual of the motley throng knew that on any sudden "emeute" he might be blown to atoms before he could reach a place of safety, but he trusted it would not happen, like the dwellers on Vesuvius; and if the guns were fired, perhaps he might be able to get out of the way in time—"If not, not," and so he continued his amusement.

With those whose patriotism was too powerful for restraint, and who felt the utter impossibility of open resistance by arms, it was some consolation to walk behind the row of cannon, just out of the reach of the bayonets of the sentinels, and empty their hearts in execrations. I was often tempted to go to listen to them, from the extraordinary energy and eloquence of their vituperation, which was curiously composed of words (not sentences) without the slightest meaning; occasionally, however, the orators would break out into threats of revisiting Prussia, and wreaking their vengeance; but as these threats were unintelligible to the soldiers, they excited no more attention than the preliminary oaths. The Prussians knew that the words were intended for insult, because the pantomime was so perfect that it did not require the aid of language to make itself understood; but they generally bore it with the most philosophical indifference.

I was always apprehensive, however, that the patience of some one individual soldier might be unable to last out the succession of execrators, and that the human overcoming the military feeling, might vent itself in an explosion, and I might thus come in for a stray shot, which would have been a disagreeable reward for my anxiety to complete my vocabulary of French.

It was really a very extraordinary exhibition, and such as I verily believe could exist only in Paris. The crowds of swearers and threateners gave way at the approach of the large patrols (incessantly traversing all parts of the town), and vanished; how or where, used to astonish me, for the moment the patrol had passed they made their appearance again like a swarm of gnats, and resumed their occupation. The thing seemed to give them great relief; and if so, as it did nobody any harm, it would have been a pity to interrupt their expectoration. A Parisian mob is, perhaps, the only collection of human beings in the world which could feel consoled by the process.

In remote parts of the country, however, the animosity was less lively and more deadly, and assassinations were frequent. The Prussians had so many deep injuries to avenge, that it is not extraordinary that they should occasionally exercise the spirit of retaliation, and in the small bodies of their troops dispersed in the villages personal conflicts were common, in spite of military discipline. A large part of their troops were landwehr (militia), and even landsturm (levy en masse), so that discipline was necessarily imperfect.

I was at this time quartered in the house of a gentleman who was secretary to a branch of the municipal government, and he often showed me petitions from towns and districts, entreating to be relieved from the presence of the Prussian troops, and to be allowed English in lieu of them; still more frequently came petitions for English instead of French, whose tyranny and exactions were intolerable. Defeat had exasperated them to madness, and they wreaked their vengeance indiscriminately on friends and foes. The state of demoralization of the French army was complete.

Occasionally a Prussian officer would take care to let his hosts feel that France was not safe from experiencing some of the miseries she had inflicted on other nations; and the hatred of Blucher was so intense for everything connected with Frenchmen, that offenders were pretty sure of impunity when complaints were carried to head-quarters. The Duke of Wellington's general orders at this period show his great anxiety to establish better discipline, and his fears lest the severity of the Prussians should excite a general revolt, and jeopardize all the fruits of his hard-earned victory, and arduous negotiations.

One of the instances of this tyranny and resistance will show that it is not always safe to indulge a spirit of retaliation in an enemy's country, however completely it may seem to be subdued.

There was no part of France where there appeared less chance of collision between the foreign troops and the peasantry than in the province of Normandy. Prussian troops took up their quarters in the towns and villages of that country with as much tranquillity and composure as in their own, and they no more contemplated opposition from the inhabitants than an English regiment would expect it in Scotland. Being in very small bodies, the officers were enabled to exercise a close surveillance over their men, and whatever license they might allow to themselves, they maintained strict discipline among the private soldiers.

A Prussian officer with whose friends I am acquainted, was quartered in the house of a widow, who, since the death of her husband, continued to conduct a large establishment for the manufacture of crockery (Fayence) at B——. This hard and heavy substance requires the greatest possible heat for its vitrification, and the furnaces are of gigantic magnitude and strength. The men employed in the manufactory lodged and boarded in the house, and, like the miners in Cornwall, were not mere servants, but a sort of fellow-adventurers, whose gains depended in some measure on the success of the establishment. These men, whose laborious occupation was incompatible with any but great bodily strength, felt the honour of the head of the establishment to be in some sort their own, and that they were bound to maintain the cause of the widow and the fatherless. Madame L——'s family consisted of one son only, about fifteen years of age.

The servant of the officer, having seen the indulgence to others for similar freaks, determined to exercise a little of the pleasure of authority himself, and after his master was gone to bed was in the habit of keeping up the family to prepare his coffee, which he did not choose to take till two hours after the time they usually retired to rest; he would sometimes take it into his head to be hungry at three o'clock in the morning, and insist on having something grilled for supper, which if not done to his taste he would throw into the fire, and command them to take more pains with the next.

Madame L—— at last determined to make a formal complaint to the officer. Whether the mode of stating her grievances did not please him, or the narration excited recollections which awakened a dormant spirit of revenge, he received her remonstrances with haughtiness.

"Madam," said he, "my servant shall call you all out of bed six times every night if I please, and you shall wait upon him yourself. I am sorry that you have no daughters, that you might learn how your infernal countrymen behaved to my sisters. My mother was a widow with four daughters; six officers of your brutal and uncivilised nation were quartered in her house; she had lost her only other son in the battle of Jena, and I was far away. The conduct of your countrymen would have disgraced the lowest savages; my mother and sisters were subjected to loathsome indignities, and made to perform the most abject menial services for their brutal guests. My mother's heart was broken—she sank under the horrors she was compelled to witness; and while her corpse yet lay in the house, the officers endeavoured to dishonour my sisters. But I should go mad were I to begin a list of the atrocities committed by your army. You shall know a little of the miseries of war: to-morrow you shall have a couple more officers and half a dozen soldiers to maintain; see that you prepare for them. Take care to let me have a turkey dressed at half-past two in the morning, and coffee at four."

The lady slunk away, terrified at the aspect of the infuriated Prussian, and retired to think of the best mode of pacifying him: she rightly conjectured that the attempt would be most likely to be successful after she should have prepared him a dinner with unusual care, and given him time to subside; set herself to the task with a determination to please him, if possible; and hoped that a more humble entreaty in the evening might avert the dreaded infliction with which she had been threatened.

Not so her son, who had been listening at the door, attracted by the loud voice of the officer. He heard all; but in his attempts to rouse the workmen to resistance, did not think it at all necessary to repeat the officer's account of French cruelties in Prussia: he dwelt only on the threats held out to his mother, and the tyranny of the servant; and he succeeded in inspiring them with a determination to take a safe revenge.

The lady went on with her preparations for the officer's dinner, and was deeply engaged in larding a fine fowl, when horrible screams assailed her ears. She rushed to the door of the kitchen—it was fastened; to the door which led to the manufactory—that also was fastened; every outlet for escape was closed. She screamed for her son, and was answered by him, from the other side of the door, that there was no danger, and no cause for alarm. She entreated to be told what was the meaning of the screams, which now became fainter and fainter, as if retiring to a greater distance.

"Soyez tranquile, ma mère," said her son, "you will know it all presently. I will let you out directly; there is no danger, none whatever."

Presently the door was opened, and her son led her into the manufactory; but what was her horror to see the officer and his servant lying on the ground opposite the great furnace, each bound round with bandages from neck to feet like an Egyptian mummy. At the moment she entered, the door of the fiery furnace was thrown open, and cast its glare on the faces of the helpless beings; the servant had fainted from excess of terror, and the officer's bloodless countenance in vain assumed an air of firmness.

"Save me, Madam, if possible, and I swear to you that this outrage shall never be betrayed. I and my servant will instantly remove, and you shall have no others quartered on you."

The lady stood aghast, and unable to utter a word.

The men cried out, "Don't believe him, Madam; let us make complaints impossible;" and they took up the helpless beings, and brought their feet near to the mouth of the furnace. "Say but the word, and in three minutes there won't be a vestige of either of them. We can never be detected—there won't be an atom of bone left, and their buttons will be undistinguished in the cinders. Say the word, Madam—say the word; they will be senseless in three seconds; the furnace is in full glow, and they will be turned into steam and ashes in half a minute."

It was an awful moment! the men had not exaggerated the effect of the furnace, for the intense white heat, much greater than that of a glass-house, would have volatilised every particle of the hapless wretches in an instant. The men held both the bodies in the attitude of throwing them into the furnace, and as their mistress's terror deprived her of the power of speech, they took silence for consent, and were proceeding to put their threat into execution, when the son, who had only intended to frighten the offenders, and never contemplated the actual murder, screamed out his horror, and threw himself on his knees to intercede for them. The mother had by this time found her tongue, and joined the prayers with those of the son; but it was not till after very long and urgent entreaties that they succeeded in arresting the hands of the ruffians, who were gloating in anticipation of so complete and so safe a vengeance. Indeed, except by the confession of one of the parties, detection would have been absolutely impossible.

The officer and his servant were liberated, the latter placed in bed delirious, and the officer was in no frame of mind to do justice to Madame L——'s cookery. I venture to guess that the fowl went away untasted.

The next day both officer and man were removed to fresh quarters; but the servant's delirium gave rise to suspicion; and although the officer contended that the whole was a fable, it is supposed that his fellow soldiers believed his story, for the manufactory was shortly afterwards burnt to the ground and the men thrown out of employment for months.

MEXICO AND TEXAS.—A letter has been received at Lloyd's from their agent at Galveston, announcing the intended blockade of the Mexican coast by the Texians. It is stated that the British West India steamers will not be interfered with in their regular communications with these ports.

IRON STEAMER.—An iron steamer, for the use of the Royal Navy on Lake Ontario, has lately arrived out from home. It came, of course, in pieces; but the Government having sent out competent persons, it is to be put up forthwith. In the same vessel which brought out the iron steamer arrived the magnificent engines of the steam-frigate Cherokee, now almost ready for launching. We have received intelligence on which we can rely, to the effect that the Lords of the Admiralty have determined to put the naval establishments at Point Frederick on a substantial and permanent footing.—Kingston paper.

A NICE DISTINCTION.—"Well," says I, "they ain't such an enlightened people as we are, that's sartin; but they don't justify you a bit, you hadn't ought to have stolen that watch. That was wrong, very wrong indeed. You might have trade with him, and got it for half nothin'; or bought it and failed, as some of our importin' merchants serve up the note-horned British; or swapped it, and forgot to give the exchange; or bought it and give your note, and cut stick before the note became due. There is a thousand ways o' doin' it honestly and legally, without resortin' as foreigners do to stealin.' We are a moral people—a religious, high-minded, and a high-spirited people; and can do any and all the nations of the universal world out of anything, in the hundred and millions of sliever shifts there is in trade; but for stealin', I despise it; it's a low, blackguard, dirty, mean action; and I must say you're a disgrace to our great nation. An American citizen never steals, he only gains the advantage!"—Sam Slick.

CROCKFORD'S CLUB.—For several years (observes the Edinburgh Review) deep play went on at all these clubs—fluctuating both as to locality and amount—till, by degrees, it began to flag. It was at a low ebb when Mr. Crockford came to London, and laid the foundation of the most colossal fortune that was ever made by play. He began by taking Watier's old club-house, in partnership with a man named Taylor. They set up a hazard-bank, and won a great deal of money, but quarrelled and separated at the end of the first year. Taylor continued where he was, had a bad year, and broke. Crockford removed to St. James's-street, had a good year, and immediately set about building the magnificent club-house which bears his name. It rose like a creation of Aladdin's lamp; and the genii themselves could hardly have surpassed the beauty of the internal decorations, or furnished a more accomplished maitre d'hote than Ude. To make the company as select as possible, the establishment was regularly organised as a club, and the elections of members vested in a committee. "Crockford" became the rage, and the votaries of fashion, whether they liked play or not, hastened to enrol themselves. The Duke of Wellington was an original member, though (unlike Blucher, who repeatedly lost everything he had to play) the great Captain was never known to play deep at any game but war or politics. Card-tables were regularly placed, and whist was played occasionally; but the sun, and, and hazard cause of the whole, was the hazard-bank, at which the proprietor took his nightly stand, prepared for all comers. There was a recognised limit, at which (after losing a certain sum) he might declare the bank broke for the night; but he knew his business too well to stop. The speculation, it is hardly necessary to add, was eminently successful. During several years, every thing that any body had to loose, and cared to risk, was swallowed up. Le Wellington des Joueurs lost £23,000 at a sitting, beginning at twelve at night, and ending at seven the following evening. He and three other noblemen could not have lost less, sooner or later, than £100,000 a piece. Others lost in proportion (or out of proportion) to their means; but we leave it to less occupied moralists, and better calculators, to say how many ruined families went to make Crockford a millionaire—for a millionaire he was and is, in the English sense of the term, after making the largest possible allowance for bad debts. A vast sum, perhaps half-a-million, is due to him; but as he won all his debtors were able to rise, and easy credit was the most fatal of his lures, we cannot make up our minds to condole with him on that amount, faithful though it be. He retired a few years ago, much as an Indian chief retires from a hunting country when there is not game enough left for his tribe.

THE LIGHT FOR ALL NATIONS.—GOODWIN SANDS.—At present the caisson is sunk below the sands sixteen feet at low water mark, and the whole portion is now forty-two feet high, which is nine feet above high water.

PIRACY IN THE LEVANT.—A Smyrna letter of the 27th ult., says:—"A new act of piracy has just been committed in the very bay of Carabournou, attended with circumstances of great ferocity. A Calymnote boat, with a crew of eight men, which had come to Smyrna with a cargo of sponge for sale, left this port on the 12th, to return to Calymnos, with the money received from the sale. This being known to the pirates, they made their attack during the night, killed seven of the crew, and took possession of the money, provisions, and everything of any value on board the boat. The Governor of Smyrna, on being made acquainted with this sanguinary deed, gave orders for every exertion to be made to discover the perpetrators of this atrocious crime."

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XI.

MR. WALTER, M.P.

Ere the prorogation of the Imperial Parliament, and what time the odour of bribery came strong from it into the nostrils of the people, there burst a long but gentle word upon the tympanum of the national ear, and men pronounced it COMPROMISE! It astonished innocent minds; it exposed guilty members, and frightened Mr. Roebuck out of everything but his personality, his propriety, and his wits. In this word "Compromise," associated, as alliteratively it was, with "Corruption," the salubrious and beautiful village of Nottingham was in no small measure involved. There had been a four thousand pound note of hand whispering away, with its paper magic, the entire franchise of the place; and Mr. Roebuck hoped to make either the note or the franchise valueless—he didn't care which. Parliament, however, was not to be bamboozled out of a borough by any honesty in man; the franchise was not suspended, the writ was issued; the great doors of St. Stephen's were handsomely slammed at the end of the session; and here is Mr. Walter, M.P. for Nottingham aforesaid, the living result of all the events we have been narrating!

Mr. Walter, as a public man, has not cut out his career into such brilliant and dazzling episodes that we require to seize upon them as landmarks of chronology, and march them up before the reader in the solemn order of time. No, as our printer's devil sapiently suggests to us, we can "do him without dates." He is a man for general information.

We must not conceal from society the fact, that the notoriety which Mr. Walter has been made to possess in the world of politics is derivable principally, if not solely, from his connection with the Times newspaper, of which he is a leading and influential proprietor. Those who object to his professed principles, find it his greatest vice that he has anything to do with that thundering journal, although, for our own parts, we cannot see the objection to share the vast power, influence, and money which are linked in with its existence as the Jupiter Tonans of the English press. People, however, have been very vindictive towards Mr. Walter upon that score, and have talked and written bitter things both against the gentleman and the paper.

We remember when Knowles's play of the Hunchback came out in 1833, the letting loose of a most formidable pasquinade, which began in these terms:—

> "There is a play of worth and wit,
> Which Knowles in modern times hath writ,
> Where Master Walter wears, alack!
> An ugly hunch upon his back.
> Now in this year of Thirty-three,
> Another Walter you may see,
> Who owns—vile theme for poets' rhymes—
> An uglier hunchback, called the Times.
> Its shape it changes like the sea;
> But whatsoe'er that shape may be,
> It still is foul deformity!"

In this gentlemanly strain the verses continued, and here and there touched up the journal with some severity—par exemple:—

> "Based on a pinnacle of pride,
> No liar before so much hath lied,
> And strange, as if the world defying,
> No liar hath gained so much by lying.
> Without one principle to boast,
> Save that by which it wins the most;
> Whose friends, if any cling unto it,
> Are valued by the good they do it;
> Whose foes may safely rest secure,
> Are only foes while they are poor;
> Whose virtues—no, we sore regret,
> It never had a virtue yet,
> Or, if it had, its sins so cover it,
> That no one ever could discover it."

And so on to the ringing of all the changes of satirical invective.

Now, if the Times journal really possesses (which we by no means assert) any claims to the polite vocabulary which is here bestowed upon it, we think it would be going a good deal too far to fasten so good a character upon Mr. Walter himself. Yet it is astonishing how the gaping world will have it, that the paper is the man, or that the man is the paper; and even Mr. Roebuck went so far in his place in the House of Commons, or some other respectable sanctuary, as to declare that the best way of obtaining revenge for any attack that might appear in the Times journal, would be to horsewhip Mr. Walter, to his personal dislike to whom has been attributed his active desire to purify the streams of Parliament. We, however, have acquitted him of this, and that ought to be enough for him.

Mr. Walter for some time represented Berkshire, in which county he has a beautiful estate, whither, however, for reasons easily conceived, Mr. Roebuck has never been invited. He also engaged a few years back in a strong contest for Southwark, in which he was defeated, and it then became amusing to see the sort of recrimination which the Dispatch, the paper of the mob, belaboured him with. The Times had written Alderman Harmer, the proprietor of the Dispatch, out of the mayoralty, and the Dispatch was writing Mr. Walter, the proprietor of the Times, out of his seat for that respectable borough, the capital of which is the Queen's Bench. We are not chronologists, and the order of events might have been vice versa to that in which we put them, but the fact remains the same; and the incident furnished a fine specimen of bludgeon warfare on the one hand, and Billingsgate on the other. Of course the Times exploded the politer gunpowder.

All the transactions of Mr. Walter with reference to the town of Nottingham, which he now represents, are, of course, too recent to make a "refresher" necessary to our readers.

MR. WALTER, M.P.

We therefore leave him in the happy possession of his incorruptible seat.

The politics of Mr. Walter are modified Conservative. He is an active and persevering opponent of the New Poor-law, for which we honour him; and we believe that, personally and privately, he is a benevolent protector of the lower classes. On the question of Corn-laws he goes further against the agriculturists than the present Government.

In person he is a well-looking old gentleman; and in purse he has gold enough to buy the "old gentleman" himself.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—The arrivals of English wheat up to our market since our last reports have been limited, they having amounted to only 2429 quarters, while the stands have been moderately supplied with samples. The demand, however, has ruled excessively dull, and, in the few sales effected, an abatement from 1s to 4s per quarter has been submitted to by the Factors. Upwards of 51,000 quarters of Wheat have come to hand from abroad, the inquiry for which has ruled dull, at very low figures. Barley and malt have proved a mere drug. The best sound oats have gone off at full prices; but other kinds have suffered an abatement of quite 6d per quarter. Beans, peas, and flour have had a downward tendency

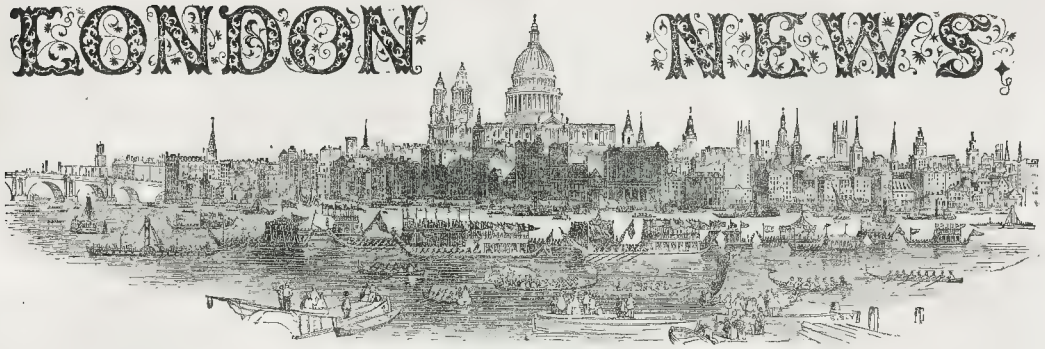
THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS



No. 17.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1842. [SIXPENCE.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

THE visit of our beloved Sovereign to her Scottish realm is now the absorbing topic of public interest; and, as an event, is regarded with glad and kindly feelings by all the generous and right-thinking portion of the community. It is nevertheless true, that in a few isolated quarters of joyless discontent and envy, a sort of grudging rancour has broken forth, and one or two organs of the press have apostrophized the Queen on the distresses of the country, and hinted suggestions, which would be cruel if they were not contemptible, that amid all the happiness that awaits her at her destination, she may not forget the misery which she leaves behind. It is, however, only a bad and bitter spirit, with nothing noble or manly in its composition, that could engender such a misanthropic reflection; and its venom is of that kind, which would propose the shutting out of glorious sunlight from all God's fair creation, merely to countenance the gloom of those whom sorrow and circumstance constrained to dwell in the dark.

It is quite clear, however, that, if the event of her Majesty's journey be properly regarded, it should convey unmixed delight and gratification to all her living subjects, whether English, Irish, or Scotch. Abstractedly, the desire of a Sovereign to hold communion with all classes of her people without regard to local or national distinctions, is an indication of a love of justice and of that beautiful maternal affection which, in domestic life, cherishes no favourite in a family, but sheds its holy love on all alike, and which, in the application of its principle to the people of a mighty empire, only spreads its influence with a more expanded wing. It is in itself the practical exercise of a feeling which is akin to all the virtues, and is just of that pure spirit which we should most desire to find warming a Sovereign's heart.

But apart from the excellence of the source from which this new and, we trust, happy adventure of an enterprising young Queen has originated, the event itself is one of importance, on account of its certainty of doing good. Royal movements, when made upon a grand scale of pageantry and magnificence, and directed as it were down the midstream of popular affection, and with a tide of loyalty set in their favour from the universal heart of the empire, must everywhere stir the stagnant waters that engender misery and discontent. They give new wings to trade; they stimulate all sorts of employment; they put cheerfulness as it were on the qui vive of hope; and produce expectations which are in themselves joyous and exhilarating, and do the people good. They lend a helping hand to struggling labour through a thousand ramifications of trade; they unlock the pocket interest, force an expenditure of individual wealth for public benefit, and scatter refreshing showers from the coffers of the rich upon the brightening pathways of the poor.

And never surely was royal visit surrounded more with the genuine elements of enthusiasm than this of our beloved young Queen. She reigns in the very soul and focus of untarnished popularity. No speck is blown upon the purity and honour of her public life. She has displayed decision without tyranny, and distributed affection without partiality. There can be no murmur against her in any corner, however murky, of the national mind. When, therefore, she makes her entry into any part of her kingdom, not hitherto used to the gladdening influence of her presence; but, above all, when she—

for the purpose of arriving among the proud and happy subjects whom she goes to greet, she is followed by a thousand conflicting anxieties—some to do her honour; some to watch over her safety; some to crown her departure with a boundless loyality; some to welcome her arrival with still more boundless joy. The sounding note of preparation is everywhere loud for one of the results to be achieved; and, from the silver Thames of London to the Castle steep of Edinburgh, the people are united by the links of one animating enthusiasm, bounding with electrical rapidity from heart to heart!

We hope to have the pleasure of presenting to those of our readers who participate in this happy feeling (and are there any who do not?) a most beautiful and perfect commemoration of all this popular episode of adventure in which our fair and dauntless young Victoria has so gracefully and brilliantly embarked. Every point of her journey—every incident of her travel—every honoured locality of her stay—will find true and vivid impress upon the pages of this journal; and we shall bring them to illustrate the faithful details which accompany their pictorial narrative with not the less pride and pleasure, because we stand alone in our vocation of newspaper art, and rejoice in being among a host of contemporaries without a single rival. We shall not, however, want the spirit of competition to stimulate our exertion: the event—the event is the spur—and the steed bounds along with a heart as willing as its rider.

Nor shall we be sorry to find that these spirited royal excursions are at proper times and seasons of frequent repetition, that Ireland and Wales come in for their share of sunshine, and fill their cup of exultation from the same bright fountain. The Queen, who we believe is really present in the hearts of all her people, will, when that presence has personal palpability rather than symbolic love, be still more the idol of national regard; and we shall be glad to hear flinging back to the Highlander the echoes of the loyalty that is shouted among his eternal hills.

"The Welsh mountaineer and the wild son of Erin"

Meanwhile we have only to wish our Queen and her gallant and amiable Consort "God speed" upon their present journey. A happier one than they will have, our most fervent aspirations could not wish them; but we will, in conclusion, breathe that hope in which none more than the good Victoria would enthusiastically join us, that when she shall return to her welcoming subjects in England she may find the voice of disturbance hushed, and the land reposing upon the bosom of gentle Peace, the spirit of Trade revived, the arms of labour active, the pressure of poverty relieved, the people as happy as they are loyal, and the smile of national content gilding and pervading all her returning journey from the shores of her silver river to the steps of her palace throne.

WOOLWICH DOCK LANDING-PLACE, HER MAJESTY'S ARRIVAL.

THE QUEEN'S TOUR.

(From our own Correspondent).

WINDSOR, Monday.—Precisely at five o'clock this morning her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert entered one of the royal carriages, and, under an escort of the 2nd Life Guards, commanded by Lieutenant Moore, proceeded to the Slough station. The following personages were in attendance on her Majesty and the Prince:—Earl Morton and the Duchess of Norfolk, lord and lady in waiting; General Wemyss, equerry; and the Hon. Matilda Paget, maid of honour. Colonel Bouverie, equerry to the Prince; Mr. George Edward Anson, and Sir James Clark.

Her Majesty and the Prince arrived at the Slough station at a quarter past five o'clock, and were received by C. Russell, Esq., chairman of the Great Western Railway; Mr. Holland, M. P., one of the directors; C. Saunders, Esq., Secretary; and Mr. Howel., superintendent, by whom they were conducted to the royal saloon. At twenty minutes past five o'clock her Majesty and the Prince came on the platform, which was covered with a splendid carpet, and entered the royal saloon carriage. The lady in waiting and the maid of honour entered the same carriage. Two other carriages (her Majesty's being in the centre) were occupied by members of the royal suite, and the gentlemen connected with the railway company. The engine (the Argus), decorated with colours, was attached to the carriages, and at twenty-one minutes past five o'clock the royal party left the station, at a moderate rate, for Paddington; the time allowed for the performance of the journey being half-an-hour. The Earl of Liverpool and a number of the royal household proceeded to town by a special train, as early as three o'clock.

The Queen and Prince Albert, attended by the royal suite, arrived at the terminus of the Great Western Railway at Paddington, at ten minutes before six o'clock. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness immediately entered an open carriage and four, and left for Woolwich, escorted by a party of Hussars. The royal suite followed in two carriages and four, and included the Duchess of Norfolk, lady in waiting; Honourable Matilda Paget, maid of honour in waiting; Mr. George Edward Anson, treasurer to Prince Albert; Major General Wemyss, equerry to the Queen; Colonel Bouverie, equerry to Prince Albert, and Sir James Clark, physician to her Majesty. The Earl of Haddington, first lord of the Admiralty; the Earl of Liverpool, lord steward; the Earl Delawarr, lord chamberlain; the Earl of Jersey, master of the horse; and the Earl of Morton, lord in waiting, had previously left town for Woolwich, to receive her Majesty and the Prince on their arrival. The Earl of Morton to attend the Queen during her visit to Scotland. The Earl Delawarr returned to town after her Majesty's embarkation.

WOOLWICH, August 29.—At the very early hour of half-past four o'clock this morning, all the troops in the garrison were up, and equipped in review order, the instructions to assemble in that state having been issued at a late hour on the previous evening, and the whole to be at their respective posts at a quarter-past five o'clock, A.M. At precisely that time a guard of honour, selected from the Royal Marines, consisting of two subalterns, four sergeants, and one hundred rank and file, under the command of Captain Charles C. Pratt, arrived at the dockyard, headed by the excellent band of the corps, and were stationed on the approach to the steps leading to the point where her Majesty was to enter the Admiralty barge, which arrived about the same time. In a few minutes after, the whole of the marines in the garrison, including the men of the Chatham division doing duty under Lieutenant-Colonel Stevens, in place of the 73rd Regiment, entered the dockyard, and formed in line from the station of the guard of honour to the dockyard-gate, on both sides of the ground over which the carriage containing her Majesty was to pass. Simultaneously, or rather three or four minutes earlier, Admiral the Right Hon. Sir George Cockburn, G.C.B., first naval lord of the Admiralty, Captain Sir Francis A. Collier, Knt., K.C.H. and C.B., superintendent of her Majesty's Dockyard, Captain Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, G.C.H., arrived, and the two former immediately commenced issuing instructions and personally superintending them, to ensure that everything might be in readiness by her Majesty's arrival; and Captain Lord A. Fitzclarence proceeded on board the Royal George yacht.

The scene from a quarter past five o'clock until about a quarter past six o'clock was one of a very interesting nature, by the arrival of naval and military officers dressed in full costume, decorated with their orders, and from their number and variety of uniform, had a very imposing effect when all assembled to welcome her Majesty, on alighting with Prince Albert. Amongst those present were the Right Hon. the Earl of Haddington, first lord of the Admiralty; Admiral the Hon. Sir Robert Stopford, G.C.B. and G.C.M.G.; Captain Sir Francis A. Collier, Knt., K.C.H. and C.B., and a number of naval officers; Lieut.-General Lord Bloomfield, G.C.B. and G.C.H., accompanied by General Count Rosen, an officer of the Swedish service, at present on a visit to his lordship; Major-General Sir Hew Dalrymple Ross, K.C.B., Col. J. J. Lacy, Col. Cleaveland, Col. Dyneley, C.B., Lieut.-Col. Dundas, C.B., Lieut.-Col. Macbean, Major Harding, K.H., Major Sandilands, and Brigade-Major Cuppage, of the Royal Artillery; Col. Sir George Hoste, C.B., Brigade-Major Sandham, and Captain Wulff, of the Royal Engineers; Col. T. A. Parke, C.B., colonel commandant of the Woolwich division, Col. Conolly, late commandant, and Col. Nichols, of the Royal Marines; and a great number of officers of the Royal Artillery, Royal Engineers, Royal Marines, and other corps.* A great number of the gentlemen cadets, in full uniform, were also present, and being stationed on an elevated platform with a brilliant assemblage of the female branches of the families of the officers and heads of the various departments of her Majesty's services here, had a pleasing effect. From a quarter past six o'clock, the period of the latest arrival of the officers and members of the press, to whom the privilege of entrée was extended in the handsomest manner on the occasion by the highest authorities, until a quarter before seven o'clock, all were on the tiptoe of expectation, and many appeared to be agreeably surprised by the arrival of Field Marshal his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, K.G., G.C.B., G.C.M.G., and G.C.H., in full uniform. Scarcely had his Royal Highness been congratulated by the brilliant assemblage of naval and military officers present on his arrival, when it was announced that the royal party was near; and at precisely ten minutes before seven o'clock, the royal carriage, containing her Majesty and Prince Albert, arrived at the spot for embarkation, and the Queen and her royal Consort were received with due military honours, the band of the Royal Marines playing the national anthem.

* Previous to the arrival of her Majesty at the dockyard, the space from the stairs, where the Queen entered the royal barge, to the yacht, had been left clear; and while the naval and military officers, &c., were anxiously awaiting the royal arrival, a heavy dingy-looking coal-barge dropped leisurely into the vacant space. The bargeman was called to, but it was not in his power to remedy the mischance; and in an instant some dozen men-of-war boats took the unintentional offender into tow, and quickly cleared the required space, ere the expected arrival and embarkation.

HAULING OFF THE COAL-BARGE.

By the order of angered Sir Francis,
The boats tow her off now in shoals;
It's the first time we e'er saw a Collier
Ashamed of a great barge of coals!

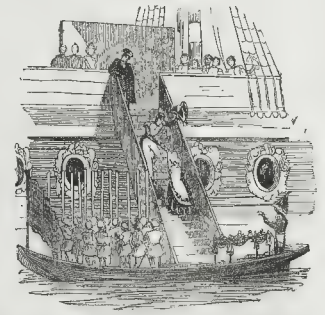
Prince Albert alighted first from the carriage, and her Majesty was handed down the steps by his Royal Highness on one side, and his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge on the other. Her Majesty appeared delighted, and kissed her uncle with sincere affection on the cheek, when bidding him farewell for a time, and immediately descended the steps, covered with canvass and cloth, into the Admiralty barge, his Royal Highness Prince Albert having previously entered to hand her Majesty into the boat. In the least space of time, Captain Sir Francis Collier, who had the honour of steering, gave the order to proceed, and before the assemblage of officers and spectators had recovered from the anxiety consequent on the arrival of the Queen, the Admiralty barge was alongside the Royal George yacht, and her Majesty mounted the steps, or accommodation ladder, with the greatest liveliness and ease, and was handed on board by Prince Albert, who entered first, and Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, who appeared with the light blue ribbon of his order over his full dress. At that moment the first gun was fired from a field-battery of four 6-pounder guns, stationed in the dockyard, to announce her Majesty's having gone on board the Royal George yacht. The firing on this occasion was continued, at royal salute time, until the royal yacht, towed by the Monkey steam-vessel, arrived opposite the Royal Arsenal, where the whole of the Royal Horse and Foot Artillery, under the command of Colonel Turner, C.B., and the Royal Sappers and Miners, had assembled and presented arms. The scene at this moment must have been gratifying to her Majesty and Prince Albert, as the number of troops was so great as to extend nearly the whole length of the river side of the Arsenal. A battery of 9-pounder guns at the upper part of the wharf wall took up the time on the firing at the dockyard ceasing, and continued until the royal yacht passed the convict ship, when the battery at the eastern extremity, near the canal, commenced, and continued firing until the royal squadron had passed, the bands of the Royal Artillery and Royal Sappers and Miners playing "God save the Queen" during the whole time. Had the spectacle witnessed this morning taken place under more favourable circumstances, it would have been one of great gratification to her Majesty's subjects; but the early hour and uncertainty which prevailed, unless in a few highly-favoured quarters, and only then a short time before the actual embarkation of her Majesty, and the heavy rain which fell in the early part of the morning, combined to prevent a great number of spectators from being present who otherwise would have assembled on this occasion. To those who were present the scene was very animated; the gay decorations of the William and Mary yacht and manning of the yards of the vessels opposite the dockyard on the announcement of the near approach of her Majesty, the hoisting of the royal standard on the flag-staff to show that Royalty was present, the lowering it again and hoisting another in the Admiralty barge, and ultimately a splendid royal standard, hoisted on the topmast of the royal yact, as her Majesty stepped on board, and the rapidity and correctness with which all was accomplished, appeared more like magic than reality. As soon as the royal party had arrived on board, Sir Francis Collier struck the royal standard in the Admiralty barge, and in a second it was fluttering over the maintop of the royal yacht. His Royal Highness Prince Albert gave a purse of gold to be distributed amongst the crew of the Admiralty barge, and shortly after seven the cannon pealed forth to the denizens of Woolwich that her Majesty had embarked, and the yards of the surrounding shipping showed a goodly array of blue jackets, who greeted their Sovereign with three rounds of cheers. The fleet of steamers then got under weigh, and the Royal George, towed by the Monkey, proceeded down the river, amidst the protracted cheers of the assembled multitude. Her Majesty remained on deck for a few minutes, in conversation with Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, but as soon as the flotilla arrived in Erith Reach, her Majesty went below, accompanied by Prince Albert, Lords Delaware, Liverpool, Jersey, and Morton, and the Duchess of Norfolk, whilst the remainder of the party stayed on deck. The ship which carried our Sovereign and her fortunes at each succeeding reach of the river was greeted with loud bursts of protracted cheering. The flotilla passed by Gravesend at half-past eight, the Lightning leading the way, with the other steamers following in the wake of the royal yacht, according to the seniority of their commanders. The whole of the squadron was under the command of Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, the captain of the Royal George. It consisted of the following:—The Shearwater steam-vessel, Captain John Washington; the Salamander steam-vessel, Commander A. S. Hammond; the Lightning steam-vessel, Lieutenant Commander G. Snell; the Black Eagle steam-vessel, Master-Commander S. B. Cooke; the Rhadamanthus steam-vessel, Master Commander T. Laen; the Fearless steam-vessel, Captain F. Bullock. The Salamander was ordered by Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence to precede the squadron, as from her great depth it was found that there would scarcely be water for her to steam down the river; but in getting under weigh she carried away a portion of her paddle-box, and was obliged to lie-to whilst the damage was being repaired. She however regained the royal squadron off Tilbury Fort, whose iron throat was booming forth the stern greeting with which it was wont to receive Queen Bess. Gravesend was thus stirred up into a foam of bustle and loyalty, in the midst of which the steam flotilla opened upon Sea Reach, when her Majesty and Prince Albert came on deck, and books, charts, and telescopes were placed upon the table.

EMBARKATION OF HER MAJESTY.



HER MAJESTY GOING ON BOARD THE ROYAL GEORGE.

CHOPPING THE HAWSER.

Her Majesty was attired in a blue silk dress, a white silk bonnet, and wore a splendid shawl of Paisley manufacture. His Royal Highness was dressed in plain clothes, over which he had a military cloak with a red collar. His Royal Highness also wore a travelling cap with gold lace. Her Majesty, with her accustomed courtesy, had previously intimated to the noblemen and gentlemen in her suite that she did not expect them to remain bare-headed, and accordingly they all appeared on deck coiffés, with the appurtenances of their respective uniforms.

At the Nore we found the Camperdown, of 120 guns, the flagship at Sheerness, which had slipped from her moorings at Sheerness, and was anchored with the Pique, 36, Captain Stopford, the Daphne, 17, sloop, Captain James Onslow, and the Wolverine, 18, sloop, with several yachts belonging to the members of the Royal Yacht Squadron, all of which fired a royal salute as the flotilla passed by the Nore. Sir Edward Brace, K.C.B., with a party of officers here went alongside the royal yacht in his barge, but none of the party went on board. The Monkey not being able to keep as good way as was expected, another steamer (the Royal Eagle) was sent a-head, which considerably increased the speed of the squadron. Ramsgate, Margate, Herne Bay, the Isle of Thanet, and every village along the coast, sent forth its inhabitants to pay a passing tribute of loyalty to their Sovereign. Old Ocean showed no wrinkles on his brow; the surface of the glassy sea was undisturbed by a ripple, save the swel. caused by the paddles of the steamers, the sun shone upon the brilliant scene with an easter splendour, the sky was unclouded, and the "flaunting heaven" of the decorated ships, the rigging and yards of which were completely enveloped in a gaudy clothing of bunting, "looking like some gay creatures of the element, that in the colours of the rainbow live," rendered the royal progress a most joyous and glorious spectacle.

At noon the royal squadron reached the Nore, and then the scene on the river was unsurpassable for beauty and brilliancy of effect. A powerful sun, a clear blue sky, a pure invigorating atmosphere, a health-leaving breeze, and the waters dancing clear and bright, made it a picture the parallel of which has, perhaps, never before been seen in this country. Hundreds of craft plying in the wake of the royal yacht, which was now towed by two war steam-ships; the tug which towed her previously, having been cast off; thousands of happy human beings cheering in all the ardour and gaiel feelings of grateful loyalty; bands of music playing with might and main the national anthem, "God save the Queen," and the popular air "Rule Britannia," and the thunder of the cannon of the Camperdown, line-of-battle-ship, and the Pique and Castor frigates, which fired royal salutes as her Majesty's yacht passed, together with the grand and impressive sight presented by the manned yards of these noble vessels, formed a combination in which all the elements of grandeur and loveliness, all the requisites of the sublime and beautiful, were so happily blended, that it is scarcely possible to hope "we shall ever look upon its like again."

Her Majesty was upon deck at this point of time, and appeared to pay the most particular attention to all that passed around her, as well as to experience the greatest delight at the animated and extraordinary spectacle which the scene presented to her eyes. Generally she remained seated before the mizen-mast, under the awning, which covered the whole quarter-deck of the royal yacht, his Royal Highness Prince Albert standing or sitting beside her, but occasionally the royal pair walked the starboard side of the ship from stem to stern, now and then conversing with the captain, Lord A. Fitzclarence, but for the most part conversing together. Her Majesty looked once over the larboard side of the royal yacht, and watched for two or three minutes the man in the main-chains heaving the lead, appearing to take much interest in the operation. Upon all occasions, however, her Majesty stopped short when any of her subjects, the exuberance of whose zeal surpassed their observance of etiquette, ran alongside and cheered her, and graciously acknowledged their loyalty. It was at once a tender and an interesting object to witness the solicitude with which his Royal Highness Prince Albert watched over her Majesty's comfort, and the attention he paid to the preservation of her royal person, from the effects of the fresh sea-breeze, which then blew rather briskly. The luminous of crowded steamers and yachts at this time following the royal squadron, and all evincing their love and loyalty in the most enthusiastic manner—the hundreds of large sailing vessels coming and going to every part of the globe, passing and repassing her Majesty, all saluting, all dressed out in gaa decorations—the towering men-of-war and the booming roar of their guns over the surface of the water, the flash and the smoke, were altogether like the highest homage that could be paid to the Queen of a free people on the noblest commercial highway in the world.

Shortly after the royal squadron passed at the Nore, the fleet of small steamers, yachts, and other craft, which had accompanied her Majesty's brilliant progress from Woolwich, dropped off to return to London; but each, before it left, ran up alongside the Royal George, played the national anthem, and gave her Majesty a regular broadside of cheering. Not a single vessel of the whole fleet of steamers, yachts, and all evincing their love and loyalty in the most enthusiastic manner, passed without paying this compliment. To the credit of the innumerable vessels that accompanied the royal squadron, it must be stated that with only one exception the most strict etiquette was observed towards her Majesty—none of them with that exception having attempted to pass before the fleet. That exception was the Margery steamer Isle of Thanet, the master of which seemed more anxious to exhibit the powers of his craft than to pay the respect due to her Majesty. This vessel not only passed the royal squadron, but actually headed it and rounded it in the most audacious manner. The Margery river steamer when left the cortege was the Ariel, and she took her departure amidst a volley of cheering and the echoes of the national anthem, played in an admirable manner by a band on board.

About half-past one o'clock her Majesty went below, it is presumed to luncheon. At this time the only vessels of the royal squadron in company were the Shearwater and Black Eagle, war-steamers, engaged in towing her Majesty's yacht, the Royal George, and the Trinity-house steam yacht. The Lightning and the Readamanthus steam-ships were a long way astern, and the navy-steamer was "nowhere." One of the most prominent features in the fleet was the Trident, Scotch steam-ship, despatched by the General Steam Navigat on Company to keep up with the royal squadron. Of this fine vessel, from her greater size and power, contrasted very favourably for herself with the massive and heavy war-steamers which towed and followed her Majesty. A Dover steamer also kept up with the royal squadron for a couple of hours, hours, and only parted company when their courses became different.

Shortly after three o'clock her Majesty re-appeared upon the deck of the royal yacht, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and promenaded on the larboard side of the ship, from stem to stern, for upwards of an hour. All this time the weather was most propitious—the sea smooth, the sky clear, the evening sun bright, and the whole scene sweet and beautiful a perfect picture of that which will, we trust, be her Majesty's course through life—a career of brilliancy, and beauty, and peace. The wind at this period was, as it had been all through the day, S. E. and by E., with a light breeze; but it looked rather hazy to windward, which was, it is supposed, the reason why the topgallant-masts of the royal yacht were struck at a few minutes past four. Her Majesty was not on deck when this took place, nor did she re-appear afterwards during the time the Trident remained in company with the royal squadron.

Passing the remarkable Maplin lighthouse, built upon iron screw piles, apparently in the middle of the sea, and receiving a royal salute from Walton-on-the-Naze, the squadron arrived off the entrance of Harwich Harbour (the Queen of safety on the eastern coast of England, and where, in case of bad weather, we must have sought refuge,) at five o'clock. Here it was met by the Orion and Rivet queen, Ipswich steamers; the former having on board the mayor and town authorities of Ipswich, ranged up alongside, playing the national anthem, and greeting her Majesty with loud hurrahs. A little beyond, we passed through a line of revenue cru sers, under the command of Capt. Jermingham and Lieut. Smith, R.N., who manned their rigging and gracefully lowered their gaff-topsails and flags to the royal standard, while hundreds of white pocket-handkerchiefs which loyalty fluttered in the breeze, and the thrilling cheers of an equal number of "manly hearts" proved their devoted attachment to their lovely Queen. Foremost among them we distinguished a group of children, who, having imbibed loyalty with their mother's milk, stretched out their little arms towards their beloved Sovereign, and asped a blessing on her royal head.

Onwards swept the royal yacht—Bawdsey, Orford, Aldborough, were rapidly passed in succession, and the last rays of the setting sun fell upon the commercial yet crumbling towers of Dunwich, and illuminated all that now remains of the thirteen churches of the former capital of the kingdom of East Anglia.

At midnight we rounded the extreme eastern point of England, guided by the brilliant light of Lowestoffe, and passing round the back of Yarmouth sands, steered through Hasborough Gat, while the first beams of light fell upon the lofty cliffs of Cromer, indistinctly seen through the morning mist.

At nine we passed the Dudgeon Light Vessel, about thirty miles from Cromer, at noon were off the Humber, and at five we had a glorious view of the projecting promontory of Flamborough Head, which boldly resists the waves of the German Ocean, and affords the valuable shelter of Burlington Bay to the numerous shipping which trade along the eastern coast of Great Britain.

The sea, during the whole of the time, was calm as a mirror, and her Majesty and the Prince were early on deck, enjoying the morning air; shortly after breakfast a telegraphic message announced that "her Majesty and the Prince were perfectly well," a message which, I need not tell you, was received by the whole squadron with three hearty cheers; a signal was then made by command of her Majesty, to inquire after the ladies, the Duchess of Norfolk and Miss Paget, who were on board the Black Eagle; the answer was "with duty to her Majesty, quite well." A similar question was made to the Lords in Waiting, &c., who were on board the Rhadamanthus, the answer to which caused general merriment throughout the squadron, "All well, and the Lord Steward eating monstrously."

By means of Watson's signals the royal yacht communicated with the station at Flamborough Head, and, I believe, received news of the health of the royal infants. I have not said that out of every port along the coast, boats and sailing vessels, and steamers, came to pay homage to their Queen; but perhaps the most remarkable were the Aldborough yawls, which rowed out a long distance off the land, and cheered manfully as we passed them close alongside about nine o'clock; and off the Humber, a simple fisherman, with a venerable bald head, held up a fine fish with both his hands, as the only homage he had to offer to his Queen; this act was kindly acknowledged by Prince Albert.

Towards sunset the gallant fleet as the shades of evening closed on the white and conspicuous buildings of Scarborough. As the squadron passed along the land, her Majesty from time to time referred to the beautiful charts of the coast which have been recently published by the Hydrographic Office as the Admiralty, and a copy of which was mounted and folded in a convenient form expressly for this occasion.

During the night the wind freshened from the northward, and rather delayed our progress; still we passed along the coast of Yorkshire and of Durham, and at eight o'clock on the morning of the last day of August we stood into the land at the entrance of the Tyne, and had a distinct view of Tynemouth Cliff and Castle; hence we continued alongshore about five miles off the coast, passing Blyth, Newbiggin, and Cresswell, backed by the heights of Newcastle, Bradham, and Shaftham, and the range of hills which form the great Cheviots, rising nearly three thousand feet above the sea.

At two we passed close to Coquet Island, and had an excellent view of the far-famed Castle of Warkworth. At three a royal salute from Leith greeted her Majesty as she passed, and the Percy banner gracefully drooped from the lofty tower of Alnwick Castle, evidenced at once the loyalty of its owners to their Sovereign, and their devoted attachment to their former royal charge.

Dunstanborough Castle next showed itself, and shortly after the whole squadron swept at the rate of ten miles an hour through the narrow passage between the Farn Islands and the Main, having on the left the stately structure of Bamborough Castle, renowned for its charitable institution for shipwrecked seamen; on the right, the three Farn Islands and lighthouses, and the Longstone, the scene of Grace Darling's gallant exploit; while, before us, on "St. Cuthbert's Holy Isle," rose the ruins of the castle and cathedral of Lindisfarne,—

> "A solemn, huge, and dark-red pile,
> Placed on the margin of the isle;
> The castle with its battled walls,
> The ancient monastery's halls."

This was, perhaps, one of the most interesting points of the whole voyage, the proximity of the shore on either hand, the rapid speed of the vessels as they swept past, hurried along by a strong tide, and the mingled roar of the cannon of Bamborough Castle, and the loyal cheers of the Island fishermen who surrounded the squadron in their boats, gave an animation to the scene that it is difficult to describe, while the classic associations connected with Warkworth and Lindisfarne and the Tweed, the remembrance that the antique and venerable ruins of the abbey and cathedral church of Lindisfarne where once that "holy place" where Episcopacy and Christianity were first permanently estab lished in Northumbria, were well calculated to make a lasting impression on the mind so susceptible of deep emotions as that of our youthful Queen, nor could it be entirely effaced from some of our recollections, that only five days later in the season, on this very spot, had occurred the fearful wreck of the Forfarshire steamer, when eight-and-thirty persons perished, and caused all to go out upon silently, yet fervently, praying that no harm might happen to the precious freight intrusted to our charge.

Onwards sped the royal bark, and passing Berwick on the Tweed, her Majesty for the first time had a view of her Scottish dominions, of "Caledonia, stern and wild," as, at first sight, but containing within her mountain fastnesses and along the borders of her lakes a moral, brave, and educated people, as devotedly attached to their sovereign and their country as any on the face of the earth, and gratified beyond expression at the opportunity now afforded them of testifying their loyalty to her Majesty, in person.

A light westerly breeze now enabled the yacht to set her headsails, we rapidly approached St. Abb's Head, and shortly after sunset got sight of the remarkable mountains of the Bass Rock and the North Berwick Law, and entered the Frith of Forth. Here the royal squadron was met by the Monarch and Tyrian, two of those splendid steamers of the General Steam Navigation Company, crowded with passengers, who, immediately on recognising her Majesty, commenced singing the national hymn, which, from the numerous voices softened by coming over the water, had a beautiful effect.

The breeze freshened from the north-west; but the flood-tide enabled the squadron to make good head-way; when off Dunbar, besides the illumination of that town, and a royal salute from the castle, the magnificent sight burst upon us, of beacon fires lighted on all the conspicuous Scotch hills, and was imposing in the extreme. The night was quite dark, but clear; astern, were all the lights of the several steamers, bending like a crescent around the royal yacht in the centre; while, on the coasts around, in East Lothian, in Mid Lothian, in Linlithgow, in Fife, and Clackmannan, bonfires blazed on all the remarkable heights, all announcing the cordial welcome that awaited her Majesty from Scotland and her Scottish subjects; while, in Edinburgh, the annals of Arthur's Seat seemed a blaze of fire, shed a flood of light over the surrounding hills and valley below, an aspect of wild grandeur to all its romantic scenery.

It has been to our lot to witness beautiful illuminations in various parts of the world. The cities of Rio de Janeiro, of Lima, and of Santiago, lighted up in all their splendour; the city and all the shores of the Bay of Naples, and even the dome of St. Peter's at Rome, never made so deep an impression as our passage up the Frith of Forth on this occasion. The beautiful expanse of water, the brilliant lights around, the rapid speed of the vessel, throwing off the phosphoric waves on either bow passing along,—the recollection of the precious freight trusted in charge, and the feeling that, through the merciful Providence of God, her Majesty had been enabled in her voyage to a happy end, all combined to render the scene one of thrilling interest far beyond the usual powers of expression.

The heights surrounding the pier at Granton were crowded from an early hour on the Wednesday morning with well-dressed persons, and the whole road from thence to Edinburgh was lined on each side with galleries, gaily decorated, and filled with respectable-looking people.

The Duke of Buccleugh arrived at twelve o'clock from Dalkeith Palace at Captain Bain's, Granton Pier Master's house, and there remained there during the night, in consequence of official information received by the members of the Government that the royal yacht, with her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert on board, and the fleet of steamers and yacts forming the accompanying squadron, had arrived off Dunbar, and would come to anchor for the night in Aber ady Bay, with the intention of proceeding at daybreak this morning up the Frith of Forth to Granton Pier, the place selected for the debarkation of the Queen.

The Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel joined the Duke of Buccleuch at the early hour of three o'clock A.M., the Premier coming from Dalkeith Palace, and staying with the noble duke.

At about seven o'clock the royal squadron came in sight, and shortly afterwards the signal flag was hoisted on Nelson's Monument, on Calton-hill, and the approach of her Majesty was announced to the inhabitants of the ancient and loyal city of Edinburgh by the discharge of two pieces of ordnance from the ramparts of the Castle.

On Thursday morning, by the time the military arrangements and the preparations for her Majesty's reception on the pier were completed, the royal yacht, commanded by Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, came alongside the pier, it then being about half-past eight o'clock, when the Duke of Buccleuch and Sir Robert Peel instantly proceeded on board, to congratulate her Majesty and the Prince on their safe arrival.

The pier was far from being crowded; for many who were in the possession of the Duke of Buccleuch's cards of admission were not admitted in consequence of the noble duke's agent not being present.

Lieut.-General Sir Niel Douglas, K.C.B. and K.C.H., Commander of the Forces of North Britain, with Lord Robert Kerr, and a brilliant staff, in full uniform, arrived at Granton just before the royal debarkation.

Captain Bain, R.N., the pier-master, and Mr. John Hawkins, the resident engineer, were present—to the latter gentleman devolved the sole management of suitably preparing the gangway.

It was announced shortly before nine o'clock that everything was in readiness for her Majesty to land; and at five minutes to nine her Majesty stepped ashore, accompanied by Prince Albert, the Duke of Buccleuch leading the way, and Sir Robert Peel, followed by the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward, the Duchess of Norfolk, Lady in Waiting; the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe, Lord in Waiting; Hon. Miss Matilda Paget, Maid of Honour in Waiting; Major-General Wemyss, Equerry in Waiting on the Queen; Mr. George Edward Anson, Treasurer, and Colonel Bouverie, Equerry to his Royal Highness Prince Albert; and Sir James Clark, Physician in Ordinary to her Majesty, then came ashore.

A brilliant sun burst at the moment, lighting up the scene, which had been sometime overclouded and wet, looking like an auspicious omen of the joy and happiness which awaits, during her life, the beloved Queen of these realms.

Instantly on the Queen stepping ashore, a preconcerted signal was given, and the field battery fired a salute from the meadows in the neighbourhood, and the seamen on board the royal yacht, and several of the government steamers forming the royal squadron, manned the yards of their respective vessels, and greeted her Majesty's safe landing by three distinct and well timed cheers, congratulatory of the happy arrival of her Majesty in this distant part of her imperial dominions. The hearty cheers of the brave tars were responded to by an enthusiast c burst of applause from those assembled on the pier, and the vast concourse congregated on every disposable place that could possibly command a view, reiterated the warm and fervent cheering.

The guard of honour of the 53rd Regiment, being stationed near the ling-platform, saluted her Majesty with the customary honours, and the band of the Dragoon Guards received the Queen by playing the national anthem.

The gangway and place of landing were covered with crimson cloth, and a tastefully-constructed covering was borne by six men over the head of her Majesty and Prince Albert, from the verge of the pier to the royal carriage in waiting to convey her Majesty to Dalkeith Palace.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, directly on quitting the royal yacht, entered the carriage, an open one, and proceeded along the pier to the Edinburgh-road, amidst the loud cheers of the people.

It would be impossible to describe the fervent and devoted zeal manifested by the multitudes that crowded both sides of the carriage-road, one continuous round of applause shaking the royal car as the cortège progressed at a slow pace.

Her Majesty looked remarkably well—indeed not in the least fatigued by her voyage. Prince Albert was not apparently free from the effects of the sea trip.

The Duke of Buccleuch left Granton directly after the Queen was seated in her carriage, and at once went to Dalkeith Palace, in order to be there in time to receive his august visitors.

The welcome experienced by her Majesty along the whole line was of the most enthusiastic character as to baffle all description.

It was precisely half-past nine when the Queen passed the barrier erected at the city boundary, near Henderson-row, at the bottom of Pitt-street.

On the royal cortège entering the city, the ensign which had floated from the castle battlements was hauled down, and the royal standard hoisted in its place, amidst salutes of artillery from the castle.

Her Majesty's landing at nine took the Town Council by surprise; and it is a fact, that they were not present when their Queen first set her foot on the shores of their country. The magistrates of Leith were present; but it is said that the rush was indicrous in the extreme which the authorities of Edinburgh made, when they learned that her Majesty had landed. Some from their beds, others from the festive board, and not a few from their shops and behind the counters. There were, however, very few of them to greet their Queen on her arrival among them. But, like all mean men who do wrong, they sought to relieve themselves of the odium they had incurred at the hands of their fellow-citizens, and cast it upon other persons:—in short, if the truth must be told, upon her Majesty. It was to her Majesty they attributed the popular disappointment which, it must be admitted, was considerable at not seeing the pageant of the arrival, slight though it was, and private though it was intended to be. Having passed through Edinburgh, amid the acclamations of the citizens, her Majesty and suite proceeded straight to Dalkeith Palace.

Her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert reached the Palace shortly after eleven o'clock from Granton and Edinburgh, escorted by a detachment of the 6th Dragoons.

About 7,000 of the Duke's tenantry, and the respectable inhabitants on the family estate, were permitted to enter the park, and, by means of the military, order was strictly preserved.

The royal cortège entered the park by the "King's gate," and on the Queen and Prince Albert, with the members of their respective households, arriving at the Palace, the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, with the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl and Countess of Cawdor, Lady Caroline Thynne, Lord and Lady John Scott, Mr. Talbot, Viscount Lascelles, and the circle staying at Dalkeith and Newbattle Abbey, were assembled to receive the august guests.

A guard of honour, of the 53rd Regiment, guarded the hall entrance, and, on the royal carriage driving up to the Palace, saluted their Royal Mistress. The royal standard was immediately hoisted, amidst the cheering of the spectators on the lawn in front of the Palace.

On alighting from her carriage her Majesty took the arm of the Duke of Buccleuch, his Royal Highness Prince Albert offering his arm to the Duchess of Buccleuch.

The Lord Provost and Council, at two o'clock this afternoon, waited upon the Duke of Buccleuch, Sir Robert Peel, and the Earl of Aberdeen, at Dalkeith Palace, to express their regret that they had been unable to testify their loyalty towards her Majesty on her progress through the city.

Not to disappoint her loyal subjects in Scotland, her Majesty most graciously agreed to postpone her departure for the Highlands another day, and to give that day to a public procession through Edinburgh, for their sake and particular gratification.

Her Majesty and the Prince, after partaking of luncheon about three o'clock, walked through the gardens adjoining the Palace for nearly an hour, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch and the distinguished guests invited to meet the Queen at the Palace.

There was a numerous and highly distinguished circle at dinner in the evening, covers being laid for thirty-two. Had the Queen been on Wednesday the dinner circle would have been confined to the Queen and Prince Albert, and the noblemen and ladies in the Royal suite, and the personal friends staying at the palace; but in consequence of invitations previously issued the original intention was departed from, and therefore it was not of that private character.

The party who sat down to the Royal table consisted of her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, next to whom were the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, Sir Robert Peel, Earl of Aberdeen, Duke of Hamilton, Duke and Duchess of Argyll, Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, Earl and Countess of Hopetoun, Earl and Countess of Kinnoull, Earl and Countess of Rosebery, Earl and Countess of Cawdor, Lord and Lady John Scott, Lady Willoughby d'Eresby, Mr. and Lady Georgiana Bulfour, Sir G. Murray, Sir Neil Douglas, and the following personages attached to the suite of her Majesty and Prince Albert:—The Duchess of Norfolk, Lady in Waiting; Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward; Earl of Morton, Lord in Waiting; Hon. Miss Paget, Maid of Honour in Waiting; and Major-General Wemyss, in waiting on the Queen; Mr. G. E. Anson, Treasurer; and Col. Bouverie, Equerry to Prince Albert.

The company, on dinner being announced, passed through the small dining-room to the grand salle à manger. The ordinary dining-room is a small but remarkably elegant apartment, the walls of which are adorned by a valuable collection of paintings, all by Canaletti. In this room was to be seen a superb massive silver cistern, exquisitely wrought, weighing 2500 ounces, of ancient workmanship, and from the ceiling was suspended a splendid chandelier, of solid silver, unique in this country.

The principal banqueting-room, although far from spacious, is a noble apartment, and the fine portraits which cover the panelling contribute to render it particularly attractive. There are full-length portraits of the Duchess of Monmouth and her two sons, and several members of the Buccleuch family, and a fine painting of Claverhouse. It is not generally known that in a small closet opening at the end of this room General Monck arranged his plans for the restoration of Charles II.

The dining-table presented a truly gorgeous display of plate; and, in the recesses of the three large windows which light the room, the ancient ornamental and heirloom plate of the noble house of Buccleuch was arranged. The centre recess was solely of gold, the goblets, tankards, and salvers being remarkable either for their antiquity or the elaborate taste displayed in the subjects of the chasing. Conspicious amidst the assemblage was a costly gold jug and basin, presented by the late King William IV. to the youthful Earl of Dalkeith, at his lordship's baptism, to whom that revered monarch stood sponsor.

The leading feature of the Royal table was the elegant and massive silver candelabrum, which occupied the centre. It is a magnificent piece of plate, not only from its weight (three thousand ounces), but the correct taste evinced in the costumes of the group. They were taken from drawings especially furnished by Sir Walter Scott. The figures are King Kenneth and John Scott, of Buccleuch, descriptive of the scene described in Sir Walter Scott's "Lay of the Last Minstrel." On the base is the inscription:—

> "Knee old Buccleuch the name did gain,
> When in the Cleuch the buck was slain."

It has twelve branches, each forming a receptacle for a light springing from a palm-tree. It was manufactured about fourteen years since for the noble Duke.

The band of the 53rd Regiment was in attendance during the dinner, and performed a variety of music selected from the compositions of the Italian and German masters.

The whole range of apartments called the "King's rooms," from having been occupied by George IV., were placed at the disposal of the Queen and Prince Albert.

FRIDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, who rose early, both enjoyed a short walk in the park this morning before breakfast.

After luncheon preparations were made for a drive in the neighbourhood of the Palace, but it was four o'clock before the carriages attended at the entrance.

Her Majesty and her august consort, with the Duchess of Buccleuch and Duchess of Norfolk, in an open carriage and four, with outriders, left the Palace shortly afterwards, with the full intention of going to Hawthornden, the interesting spot where Robert Bruce concealed himself from the pursuit of his enemies, and the royal party purposed afterwards to visit Roslin Chapel, one of the most entire and exquisitely decorated specimens of ecclesiastical architecture in Scotland; and Roslin Castle, now a mouldering ruin. That interesting spot is the scene of Scott's charming ballad of Rosabelle. The unpropitious state of the weather prevented the party going to see that curious and unique building, where

> "——twenty of Roslin's baron's bold
> Lie buried within that proud chapelle."

The royal party left the park by the Dalkeith gates, and passed through the east end town. The news of their arrival in the town took the inhabitants rather by surprise, however there were many persons out of the park gates, one hundred of persons of all grades came out of their habitations to welcome her Majesty. The loyalty was most extravagant; and one man was carried so far by his zeal as to offer his hand to her Majesty, who seemed greatly amused. His Royal Highness Prince Albert was evidently as much amused as the Queen at the not over discreet proceedings of the multitude; but their intentions were good, so their actions must not be too severely criticised.

On leaving Dalkeith the royal party went through Bonnyrig to Lasswade, and from thence by Melville Park, Lord Melville's seat, to the Palace, where they arrived shortly after five o'clock, their return being accelerated by the unfavourable state of the weather, which compelled them to give up the intended visit to Hawthornden and Roslin Castle.

Early in the afternoon a laughable incident occurred in Edinburgh, which, at the time, caused no little sensation. One of the royal carriages came into the city, with some of the female domestics of her Majesty inside, when, being descried by the crowd, that had all day thronged the streets, there was a general rush, and the carriage was instantly surrounded, the cheers at the same time attracting additional crowds. It was long before the populace discovered their error, for in vain did the inmates of the carriage call out that the Queen was not there; and a lusty fellows who had hold of the carriage door, said in reply, "It won't do, for there she is, with the same bonnet she had on yesterday," pointing to a pink bonnet worn by one of the females. This positive assertion, made in a tone calculated to assure the mob that the Queen had visited the city, was received by a hearty and confident burst of riotous applause. However, the carriage, after making but slow progress, stopped at a circulating library, and at length it was satisfactorily ascertained by the crowd that the Queen was not within the carriage. Altogether it was a most ludicrous affair.

In Edinburgh all Friday was consumed by the citizens in preparing for an illumination. All rejoicings of this kind have a sort of family likeness; so that having seen one you will have a very distinct idea of all. Suffice it to say, in respect to this form of expressing affection, the "guide folk" of Edinburgh were not behind-hand with any other city, of its capabilities, in the empire; and that as a visible symbol of welcome to their beloved Sovereign, and a sign of the loyalty which they felt, their illumination was every way worthy of the character of their country. It is said that the Scotch are a grave and serious people, and those who understand them assert that they are incapable of gaiety. But most assuredly those who say these things never witnessed a general illumination in Edinburgh, on the occasion of a Queen coming to visit her northern dominions, or otherwise they would not have made the assertion. Such an exuberance of dancing and singing, such an outpouring of joy, such a perfect state of exultation, never seen as beheld in this town. The whole population of the town and the surrounding districts seemed to have taken up their home in the streets all the night; and more hustling, shoving, and jostling, were not felt in London on the occasion of her Majesty's marriage rejoicings than were occasionally endured in the city of Edinburgh. The night was fine, and the multitude was most orderly. Indeed, everything seemed propitious for the occasion, and everything passed off with the greatest satisfaction to all concerned.

EDINBURGH, SATURDAY.—But if the excitement of the people last night was great, that which actuated them this morning was infinitely greater. Indeed, it seemed almost like madness, the wild way in which the ordinarily slow, steady, inhabitants of this town rushed from point to point to get a glimpse of her Majesty, and exerted their lungs to welcome her after their own fashion, by a hasty, hearty cheer. This was, in truth, "a great day for Scotland." From the dawning of the morning until noon thousands upon thousands of well and ill-dressed people were pouring into the streets and filling up the highways of Edinburgh. As usual on all occasions of sight-seeing, and where the passion of curiosity is to be indulged, the fair sex formed a large proportion of them; and it is but justice to the women of Scotland to add, that a finer, healthier, and more comely collection of females of the middle and lower classes could not be found than that which crowded the streets on the joyous occasion. They were, too, all well dressed, and looked excessively amiable and happy; and what with the softness of their large light blue eyes, the brilliancy of their complexions, the clearness of their skins, and the variegated hues of their many-coloured plaids and dresses, they formed by no means the least gratifying portion of the grand spectacle.

The great occasion of all this gathering was the anticipated visit of her Majesty, their beloved Sovereign, to her ancient fortress, the Castle of Edinburgh. Accordingly, all through the night the din of preparation was sounding over Edinburgh, and scaffoldings and barriers were seen to rise on every portion of the line through which it was known that her Majesty was to pass on her progress to the Castle. Windows rose, also, in the Old Town, not higher in point of elevation, for Heaven knows they are high enough in the Cowgate already, but what was pleasanter to the "cosny" occupants of houses in this classical district, these windows rose higher in point of price. Every nook and cranny, in short, which commanded a glimpse of the Royal procession was crowded.

At nine o'clock the incorporated trades, the high constables, and other public bodies, assembled with their flags and insignia in front of the Canongate, and then filed off to the respective stations allotted to them in the programme published for the occasion. Accordingly, on the signal of her Majesty's arrival being made, there was no confusion, and no helter-skelter work, such as is too common amongst corporations of every kind when called on to participate in state ceremonials. This regularity was entirely the result of the indefatigable exertions, and excellent arrangements, of the Edinburgh magistrates. The streets in the Old Town, along which her Majesty had intimated her intention to pass, namely, the Canongate, High-street, and the Lawnmarket, were lined with special constables—special Deghees, in fact—but still sufficient to enforce order among a population inclined more to joyousness than to turbulence, and more eager to display their loyalty to their Queen than to indulge themselves in any reprehensible recreation on such a great occasion as a royal visit. The streets of the Westend, however, were less guarded; but then they had a good guarantee in the character of the class which crowded them. In so far the good sense of the magistracy was evident, and therefore their scheme was entirely successful.

About ten o'clock her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert and a brilliant cortege, including Sir Robert Peel and the Buccleuch family, left Dalkeith House according to appointment, and proceeded at a quiet pace towards Edinburgh. The Royal procession was loudly cheered by the countless crowds who lined the roads over which it passed.

At twenty minutes past eleven the first outrider of her Majesty's train reached Holyrood House, and in another minute the thunder of the Castle guns announced that the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland had entered the city of Edinburgh. From this point the Royal progress was a triumphal procession until her Majesty entered the Castle. The Royal cortege entered the King's Park, near to Parson's-green, and came into town by the south side of Holyrood House.

At Holyrood Palace her Majesty was received by the Royal Company of Archers, the Queen's Bodyguard for Scotland, who had been stationed there for that purpose; the Earl of Dalhousie, Lord Elcho, Lord Polwarth, Duke of Roxburghe, and the other officers connected with that ancient corps, and immediately arranged themselves on the line of the procession.

The expressions of public welcome, even here, at the very entrance of the city, were most enthusiastic, and the warm greetings of the dense masses were acknowledged by her Majesty and Prince Albert by affably inclining to the populace.

At St. John's Cross Sir Robert Peel was recognised, and was loudly cheered, mingled, it is true, with trifling hisses, which were drowned by the more lusty lungs of his admirers.

The royal cortege now entered the Canongate, familiar in history and in romance, as in centuries past it comprised that quarter of the ancient city where the high nobility and chief members of the regal court resided. To the superficial observer, there is nothing but dirt and filthiness to mark his attention; but to the lover of antiquarian research every house possesses its interesting history connected with some subject of bygone times. This part of the city still retains its ancient features, and on many of the houses there remain the names and quarterings of their once noble owners

The procession passed up the Canongate amidst the vehement cheers of the spectators, and on reaching Queensberry House a royal salute was fired from the Castle.

The royal progress up to the barrier at that part of High-street, bounded by the Royal Exchange on the north side, and St. Giles's church on the south, was slow, and some time elapsed before the procession arrived at the barrier. The exclamations of the multitude congregated to welcome their youthful Queen were loud and long-protracted, and the gaily-dressed occupants of the windows waved their handkerchiefs in the exuberance of their joy

On the east-side of the barrier the members of the Celtic Society, in plaid and philebeg, and flowing tartan, each member displaying the badge of his clan, with their bright claymores, were stationed in double file, headed by the Marquis of Lorn, son of the Duke of Argyll. We observed the chief of Clanranald, Mr. W. Campbell, of Islay, and several distinguished individuals identified with the society.

Assembled on each side of the carriage-way were the leading professors of the various city institutions, and the principal officers of the different societies more or less connected with the city.

A small party of the dragoons assisted the police in keeping the barrier and carriage-way clear of the mob.

On the other side of the barrier were the Lord Provost, Sir James Forrest, Bart., Bailies Richardson, Thomson, Johnson, and Wilkie; Sir William Dryadale, treasurer of the City Chamberlain (Mr. Robertson), with the keys of the city; the city assessors; the city clerks, Cunningham and Bell; Convener Scott; Dean of Guild Ramsay; Procurator-fiscal Dymock; and councillors Richardson, Dendy, Geikie, Black, John Duncan, Gray, Melville, Lothian, Banks, Dodds, Logan, Urquhart, Tait, Russell, G. Duncan, Dobson, Grierson, Hunter, Drs. Macaulay, Maitland, and Thomson, all in their robes of office, with the Mace and Sword Bearers on the right and left of the platform on which the Lord Provost and the Council were stationed to receive the Queen.

A considerable number of the local police and special constables guarded this part of the city destined to be the scene for the presentation of the city keys by the civic authorities.

Lord Robert Kerr, Colonel Hill, and the extra aide-de-camp of Lieut.-General Sir Niel Douglas, commander of the forces, were actively engaged for some time before the Queen's arrival, in causing the necessary arrangments to be enforced, in order that the passages of the royal cortege should in no way be impeded.

The carriage-way was lined on each side by the members of the incorporated trades and other societies, with their emblazoned flags and other paraphernalia.

At half-past eleven precisely, the royal carriage arrived at the barrier, when a universal and spirit-stirring shout of applause greeted the fair object of their loyalty and admiration; and as in that part of the High-street several large galleries were constructed, it might be considered the point in the royal route where the demonstration of loyalty and devotion to the throne was most apparent.

The Queen and Prince, to all appearance, were highly gratified with the manifestations by which they were saluted.

The royal carriage was now stopped, and the Lord Provost, Sir James Forrest, Bart., then advanced, and on one knee, with the city keys on a cushion in his hands, and surrounded by the members of the corporation, addressed her Majesty as follows:—

"May it please your Majesty,—In the name of the dutiful and loyal inhabitants of this city, I beg to congratulate your Majesty on your auspicious entrance into the metropolis of your ancient kingdom of Scotland, now graced for the first time for ages by the presence of its Queen.

"These keys, committed to our predecessors, have been retained by us, amongst the vestiges of those warlike times when walls and gates defended against hostile inroads. But, under the protection of wise and salutary laws, firmly administered by a succession of illustrious Monarchs, from whom your Majesty is sprung, we no longer require such shelter, and are happy in being able to confide the security of this northern capital to a brave and orderly population—strong in the possession of upright principles—united in their allegiance to their beloved Queen, and dignified by the influence of that pure and peaceable wisdom which is at once the ornament and bulwark of our times.

"I now beg, with all humility, in token of homage, to deliver into your Majesty's hands the keys of this city."

The Lord Provost having concluded his respectful address,

Her Majesty, leaning forward to his lordship, replied with a firmness that could hardly have been expected, that she returned them with confidence to the safe keeping of the Lord Provost and council, at the same time returning the keys to his lordship.

This imposing ceremony having concluded, simultaneous cheers from the spectators proclaimed their delight, and altogether the ensemble was most exciting.

The Royal cavalcade then moved on in the subjoined order:—

Squadron of Dragoons in advance.
Party of Royal Archers, the Queen's Body Guard for Scotland, and Band.
Queen's outriders in state liveries.
Royal carriage, in which were her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with officers in command of the escort on each side.
Squadron of Dragoons.
The Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Edinburgh, and Mr. Spiers, the Sheriff Depute, on horseback.
Three Royal carriages, with the Duchess of Buccleuch, Sir Robert Peel, the Duchess of Norfolk, Earl of Aberdeen, and the members of her Majesty's household, escorted on each side by a single file of the Royal Archers in field uniform.
Two of the Duke of Buccleuch's carriages, in which were the Earl and Countess of Cawdor, Lady Georgiana Balfour, Lord and Lady John Scott, &c.

The members of the Celtic Society, in full Highland garb, fell into the order of procession, headed by the Marquis of Lorn and the Chief of Clanranald. The Lord Provost and Council in their carriages closed the procession.

The royal cortege then proceeded direct up to the Castle, the same demonstrations of loyalty marking the whole distance, for the Royal progress to the Castle was one continued greeting of the most enthusiastic description.

At five minutes to twelve her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert alighted at the barrier gate of the Castle, Lieut.-General Sir Neil Douglas, the commander of the forces, and his brilliant staff; Lord Robert Kerr, the Duke of Argyll, Sir George Murray, Master-General of the Ordnance; the Right Hon. William Boyle, Lord Justice Clerk; the Right Hon. William Dundas, Lord Register; Viscount Melville, Lord Privy Seal for Scotland; the Earl of Lauderdale, &c., all receiving the Queen immediately on leaving her carriage.

The 53rd Regiment, from Piershill barracks, forming the guard of honour, the instant the Queen entered, presented arms.

The preparations at the Castle for the reception of her Majesty had been completed at an early hour in the morning, and everything was arranged in the most complete manner possible long before her Majesty's arrival. The artillery-men were at their guns and the garrison under arms at eight o'clock, while the band of the 53rd Regiment of Foot, now doing duty in the Castle, was stationed on the terrace overlooking the town, ready to greet her Majesty with the national anthem the moment of her entrance into the fortress. Every part of the Castle—roofs, walls, buttresses, "coigns of vantage"—all places, in short, which commanded even the remotest glimpse of the Royal procession, was crowded long before the hour appointed for its arrival, and the old stern walls of this frowning stronghold rejoiced in a collection of beauty which was unsurpassable by any other country. Admission to the Castle was only to be obtained by means of tickets, which were distributed very sparingly. Besides the beauty which presided over the scene within the weather-beaten towers of Edina, there was also a brilliant muster of the chivalry of Scotland; and stars and orders of all kinds, the reward of bravery and conduct in the field, glittered and glanced in every direction among the militaires collected there to do honour to their young Sovereign. Here was to be seen the gorgeous uniform of a general officer—perhaps one of "the heroes of Waterloo" enveloping the shrunken form of some veteran—then the picturesque "garb of old Gael," while the haughty Highlander, in his plaid, "all plaided and plumed in his tartan array," strutted and fretted like a fabled eagle, as though the castle walls were the walls of a prison; anon the brilliant equipment of a dragoon would flash on the eye, and then the sober-coloured uniform of the Royal Artillery officer, not less rich, though less gaudy. It was a striking and a novel scene. From the Castle, the city looked like a sea of human heads, so countless seemed the crowd that filled the streets and darkened the fronts of the houses, even to the topmost windows. No one can imagine the extraordinary effect which the aspect of the city presented from the walls of the Castle.

At twenty minutes past eleven, her Majesty's arrival at Holyrood was announced by telegraphic signal, and in a moment the Royal standard was flung floating gaily from the topmost tower of the old castle, amidst the thunder of the artillery, answered by the guns of the Pique frigate, which lay in the Frith of Forth, off Portobello. No welcome could be grander, and no sovereign could deserve it more than her Majesty.

At twelve o'clock precisely her Majesty entered the Castle, as I have already stated, amidst the most heart-stirring demonstrations of joy from all present. Her Majesty was handed out of the carriage, which drew up at the Castle, by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and was received at the entrance by Sir Niel Douglas, the Governor, Lord Robert Kerr, Sir George Murray, the Fort-Major, and several other officers of distinction. Escorted by the Governor and the Fort-Major on either side, and holding on the arm of his Royal Highness, her Majesty, followed by Sir Robert Peel, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl of Liverpool, the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, the Duchess of Norfolk, the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, Lord John Scott, and several ladies, threaded her way lightly up the acclivitous slopes, and through the narrow passages which lead to the upper part of this famous fortress; and proceeded to view all that it contained of novelty or interest. Her Majesty wore a Stuart tartan plaid in compliment to Scotland, and looked cheerful, and happy, and healthy. The national anthem was played in the most spirited manner by the excellent band of the 53rd Regiment as the royal party passed into the Castle. The various objects of historical interest in the fortress were quite familiar to her Majesty; and she seemed at once gratified and surprised at the sight of "Mons Meg," whose fortunes she appeared perfectly well acquainted with.

After examining this great piece of ordnance, her Majesty and her cortege next visited the Crown Jewel Office, where are deposited the Regalia of Scotland, and greatly admired those ancient insignia of royalty, so strangely preserved and so singularly discovered. Her Majesty, after expressing her gratification at all she had seen, proceeded towards the royal carriage with the purpose of leaving. Her Majesty, still, had his Royal Highness Prince Albert most affectionately by the arm. Linked thus together, lovingly and beloved, the royal pair, presenting an example of the most beautiful of the social virtues to her Majesty's subjects, descended the intricate passages of the Castle, and reached the gate. Here all heads were uncovered, and every voice raised to honour her Majesty and invoke blessings upon her and her family.

At half-past twelve o'clock her Majesty, having entered the carriage, left the Castle by Bank-street, and descended the Mound to Princes-street, amidst the most enthusiastic demonstrations of attachment from the thousands of well-dressed and respectable-looking people who lined the road and filled the windows of all the houses of the royal route.

Just as the Queen's carriage had passed, one of the galleries erected in the gardens gave way, owing to the gallery being overburdened with persons. Shocking to relate, hundreds were precipitated from their seats, the majority of whom received serious contusions, and I noticed above twenty respectable individuals who were rendered insensible. A lady had both legs fractured, and several persons had their arms and legs dislocated; but the whole extent of the injuries had not been satisfactorily ascertained when I left the spot. Doctors Craigie, Jefferies, and some experienced surgeons were immediately on the spot, and administered their professional services to the sufferers. Many were taken to their private residences or boards and in public vehicles, and others to the Infirmary. The alarm was such, that there was nearly as much attendance required on the ladies who fainted, as upon the unfortunate persons injured by the fall.

There is infinite credit due to the small party of dragoons who, directly the accident took place, left the royal escort and surrounded the railing, so that the populace could not intrude and cause confusion. Their conduct was civil and firm to the mob, and was duly appreciated by the more respectable portion of spectators of the calamitous casualty. The cortege then proceeded along Princes-street, accompanied and followed by similar demonstrations of regard and love to the person of her Majesty. When the royal procession reached the corner of Charlotte-street, which is on a right line with the western end of the castle, the guns of that fortress thundered forth an exulting salute, and the multitude set up a cheer that almost seemed an exaggerated echo of the report, so loud was it, and so perfectly overpowering. The royal procession then passed slowly along Queensberry-street and the Dean-bridge to Dalmeny-park, the seat of the Earl of Rosebery.

The Queen and party had scarcely reached the city outskirts before it began to rain, and continued without intermission until late in the evening. The Queen and Prince, and the noblemen and ladies accompanying her Majesty, however, proceeded on their route to Dalmeny Castle, to honour the Earl and Countess of Rosebery with their presence at luncheon.

At about two o'clock the royal cortege arrived. The Earl and Countess of Rosebery, with Lord Dalmeny, and the Ladies Anne and Louisa Primrose, received their royal guests at the grand entrance, and they were forthwith conducted through the splendidly decorated corridor to the principal saloon, where there was a distinguished circle assembled to have the honour of lunching with her Majesty.

It was the intention of her Majesty and the royal party to have gone over the grounds attached to the mansion, commanding an extensive view of the Frith of Forth and the surrounding hills a prospect altogether that could not fail to have highly pleased the Queen and Prince—but in consequence of the bad state of the weather, it was abandoned.

Mr. List, the chief of the county police, was the means of rendering considerable service to the royal cavalcade, both on their arrival and departure, and, by his judicious arrangement, the entire route, not only to Dalmeny-park, but in return to Dalkeith Palace, was kept clear of every obstruction. It had gone six before the Queen and Prince reached Dalkeith.

At half-past eight o'clock this morning her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert went out privately and walked for some time on the slopes of the pleasure-gardens, unattended by any member of their respective households.

At eleven o'clock divine service was performed at the palace, the principal dining-room being appropriated for the solemn duty. A temporary pulpit and devotional chairs, in the Gothic style, ornately carved, and trimmed with crimson velvet, were used on the occasion.

In addition to the Queen and Prince Albert, the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, Duchess of Norfolk, Lord and Lady John Scott, Earl and Countess of Cawdor, Lady Caroline Thynne, Earl of Mornington, Miss Paget, Col. Bouverie, and the junior branches of the Duke's family were present.

The Rev. E. B. Ramsay, of St. John's Episcopalian Chapel, Edinburgh, officiated on the occasion, the rev. gentleman taking his text from the 6th chapter of Isaiah, 1st verse, to the 9th verse, commencing—

"O Jerusalem, that bringest good tidings, lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up, be not afraid; say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God."

The Earl of Aberdeen, with Sir Robert Peel, Earl of Liverpool, and Mr. G. E. Anson, went to the Established Church of the town of Dalkeith, a venerable structure, its foundation being contemporaneous with that of Melrose Abbey, and one of the most beautiful edifices of the Scottish

Last night about half-past four, several of the illustrious guests, inmates of the Palace, went out walking; and at twenty minutes to five her Majesty, with the Duchess of Buccleuch, went for a drive in a pony phaeton, the Duchess driving. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Buccleuch, and the Earl of Liverpool accompanying the Queen on horseback, attended by outriders and grooms. The royal party were absent from the palace upwards of an hour.

Her Majesty held a levee and drawing room on Monday afternoon, at Dalkeith Palace, when above 100 personages of rank and distinction had the honour of paying their respects to their Sovereign, in a distant part of her imperial dominions, and to which such Court ceremonies have been—with only one exception—hitherto foreigners.

A circumstance of such rare occurrence necessarily excited an extraordinary sensation in the Scottish capital, and the curiosity was not confined to the middle classes, for it was apparent, from the number of carriages driving about the city, that those most elevated in the circles of society were anxious to participate in a something which had previously engrossed their anxious wishes and expectations. All this was natural; and the thought was verified by the nervous anxiety that was depicted in the lovely faces of the fair debutantes as they entered the palace from their carriages.

By twelve o'clock the equipages of the nobility and gentry began to arrive, and formed in a line from Sheriff-hall Gate along the Edinburgh and Carlisle road.

The entrance to the park was by that gate, which was guarded by the county police, assisted by the military.

Between twelve and one a squadron of the 6th or Enniskillen Dragoons arrived from Piershill Barracks, commanded by Captain Barker. At nearly the same time a company of the 53rd Regiment, with their regimental band, took up their station on the lawn in front of the palace, as a guard of honour.

The Royal Archers, the Queen's Body Guard for Scotland, were the next to arrive, preceded by their full Land, under the command of Lord Elcho. Shortly after their arrival they passed into the grand hall in companies, where they were received by the Lord Steward of her Majesty's Household, the Earl of Liverpool, before whom they took the oath of allegiance. That ceremony terminated, the corps lined the marble hall and grand staircase, and the court in front of the palace, which had a temporary corridor conducting to the ordinary entrance by the south wing and the grand entrance in the centre of the structure was solely confined to the guard of Archers, who arranged themselves in single file.

The palace, although small, afforded every accommodation for the ingress and egress of the company, in consequence of the judicious arrangements made by the Duke of Buccleuch's instructions, and not the slightest confusion arose.

The Dragoons were placed at distances of about fifty yards along the line selected for the carriages to bring and take up visitors. By the able superintendence of Mr. List, head of the county police, the constabulary force were distributed in every situation of the line where attendance or control might have taken place, and praise must be awarded to that intelligent officer for the judgment he displayed in his arduous duty, as there was not a carriage damaged by accident.

The Lord Provost of Edinburgh, Sir James Forrest, Bart., and the members of the council, arrived early in several carriages, in order to present the city addresses of congratulation to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

Deputations from various societies and public bodies were the next to arrive, and, at about a quarter past two o'clock, they were ushered into the presence of the Queen.

The Lord Provost, Sir James Forrest, Bart., and the following members of the municipal council—Baillies Richardson, Thomson, Johnston, and Wilkie; Dean of Guild Ramsey; Treasurer, Sir William Drysdale; Conener Scott; Councillors Richardson, M'Auly, Doud, Goldie, Black, John Duncan, Grey, Melville, Lothian, Banks, Dodds, Logan, Urquhart, Tait, Russell, George Duncan, Dobson, Grierson, Hunter, D. Macauley, Maitland, Thomson, &c., were in attendance, and had the honour to present addresses to the Queen and Prince.

Her Majesty, in answer, was graciously pleased to make a highly appropriate and flattering reply to the municipal body.

The City address was then presented by the Lord Provost to his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

In answer to the address of the corporate body his Royal Highness made a gracious reply.

The county address was presented by the Lord Lieutenant, the Duke of Buccleuch, to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

Congratulatory addresses were presented to her Majesty and his Royal Highness by various dignitaries connected with the Scotch and Irish Presbyterian Churches, and from different cities and towns in the provinces of Scotland as well as from the Grand Lodge of Freemasons of Scotland, (by Lord Frederick Fitzclarence), and the learned and scientific bodies connected with Scotland.

It was twenty minutes to three o'clock before her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert had concluded their reception of the several deputations with addresses.

Immediately after the retirement of those civic and learned functionaries, the general reception commenced, the company being ushered through the entrance hall in the right wing of the palace to the marble hall, which was lined by the corps of the Royal Archers, the Queen's Body Guard for Scotland, and up the noble staircase, adorned by some of the choicest works of the ancient masters of the Italian, Venetian, and Flemish schools of painting, to the grand gallery, which was appropriated as the throne-room.

Her Majesty was attired very elegantly, but yet very simply more simply, indeed, than any of the female noblesse that waited upon her, or perhaps than any of the numerous ladies that had that day the honour of kissing her royal hand.

Her Majesty wore a gown of white satin, made with the body very low, and the sleeves short. The edges of both the sleeves and body were trimmed with narrow lace, and the skirt flounced with it. Her arms were covered with long lace gloves. Each arm was encircled about two inches above the wrist with a broad diamond bracelet. The clasp of the bracelet on the right arm contained an oval-shaped miniature. On her right shoulder glistened a small but beautiful diamond thistle. On her left she wore the insignia of the Order of the Garter—and the blue scarf of that Order was thrown across her breast, and fastened to the right side of her belt with a magnificent diamond ornament. A small square-shaped brooch was fixed in the upper part of her stomacher. Her Majesty wore a slender necklace, with a locket depending from it. Her neck, in other respects, was bare, and her elegant bust was displayed to full advantage.

The head of her Majesty was dressed so plainly as to contrast strongly with the ornamented coiffures of those around her. Her hair was braided low upon each cheek, in the simple mode displayed in most of her portraits. It was bound by a slender hair-band, in which a small diamond was set in front. The low behind was placed very low, and surrounded by a narrow diamond circlet, which was scarcely visible except on a profile view.

The front drawing-room of the palace was converted into the reception-room. It is a high-roofed and elegant, but comparatively small apartment. The company at once passed from the landing of the grand staircase into this, the presence-chamber, and the transition was so sudden and unexpected that some scarcely discovered that they were actually before her Majesty till they were desired to kneel by the lord in waiting.

The throne, upon which her Majesty sat when receiving and answering the City, Church, and University addresses previously to the commencement of the levee, was the rich one used by George IV. at Holyrood. It was temporally removed to Dalkeith for the use of her Majesty. It was not surmounted, as at Holyrood, with a canopy. The footstool placed before the throne was high. As her Majesty rested on it, her "fairy feet" were completely concealed by the skirt of her gown.

While her Majesty received the addresses, she had only four ladies in waiting upon her, all of them attired in white, except the Duchess of Buccleuch, who stood at her Majesty's right hand, dressed in pink, and holding an exquisite bouquet of flowers. On the contrary, at the general levee, her Majesty the Queen occupied the throne, with his Royal Highness Prince Albert on her left hand, and the Duchess of Buccleuch, as Mistress of the Robes, on the right of the Queen.

The members of the Royal Household and the great Officers of State surrounded the throne on each side, among whom were:—The Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Privy Seal; the Earl of Aberdeen, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart., First Lord of the Treasury; the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward of the Household; the Earl of Morton, Lord in Waiting; the Duchess of Norfolk, Lady in Waiting; Honourable Miss Paget, Maid of Honour in Waiting; Major-General Wemyss, Equerry in Waiting; Mr. George E. Anson, Treasurer to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and Colonel Bouverie, Equerry in Waiting on his Royal Highness; and the following Officers of State of Scotland:—The Duke of Argyll, Heritable Master of the Queen's Household; the Earl of Errol, Heritable Grand Constable and Knight Marshal; the Lord Justice General and Lord President, the Right Hon. Charles Hope; Lord Privy Seal, Viscount Melville; Lord Register, the Right Hon. Wm. Dundas; Lord Justice Clerk, the Right Hon. David Boyle; Lord Advocate, Right Hon. Sir Wm. Rae; Major-General Sir Niel Douglas, K.C.B., and K.C.H., Commander of the Forces, &c.

Among those present at this Court reception, in addition to the nobility and gentry presented to her Majesty, were:—Dwarkanauth Tagore Zenividar, the Marchioness de Riario Sforza, and Mdles. de Riario Storza.

DEER STALKING IN THE HIGHLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

DEER STALKING.

Now that our "bonny Queen" is gone into the Highlands, and will be disporting her sweet presence in the taste of her proud nobility, there will also be "game afoot" for her gallant Consort, and the labours of the "deer-stalker" will doubtless be cheered with enthusiasm by the Prince. Here is something like a representation of the noble sport,—but let not this be all! Let the reader amuse himself with a glance at the qualifications which Prince Albert is supposed to carry with him into Scotland, to enable his Royal Highness to participate in the enterprise of this national chase. The catalogue raisonne is given upon the humourous but undoubted authority of W. Scrope, Esq., one of the best deer-stalkers in the world, and quite the best writer about deer-stalking.

"Your consummate deer-stalker should not only be able to run like an antelope, and breathe like the trade winds, but should also be enriched with various other undeniable qualifications. As, for instance, he should be able to run in a stooping position, at a great bound pace, with his back parallel to the ground, and his face within an inch of it, for miles together. He should take a singular pleasure in threading the seams of a bog, or in gliding down a burn centre a terre, like that insinuating animal the eel—accomplished he should be in skilfully squeezing his clothes after this operation, to make all comfortable. Strong and pliant in the ankle, he should most indubitably be; since in running swiftly down precipices, picturesquely adorned with sharp-edged, angular, vindictive stones, his feet will, madvisedly, get into awkward cavities and curious positions;—thus, if his legs are devoid of the faculty of breaking, so much the better,—he has an evident advantage over the fragile man. He should rejoice in waging through torrents, and be able to stand firmly on water-worn stones, unconscious of the action of the current; or if by fickle fortune the waves should be too powerful for him, when he loses his balance, and goes floating away upon his back (for if he has any tact, or sense of the picturesque, it is presumed he will fall backwards), he should raise his rifle aloft in the air, Marmion fashion, lest his powder should get wet, and his day's sport come suddenly to an end. A few weeks' practice in the tub will make him quite au fait at this. We would recommend him to try the thing in a spate, during a refreshing north wind, which is adverse to deer-stalking; thus no day will be lost pending his education. To swim he should not be able, because there would be no merit in saving himself by such a paltry subterfuge; neither should he permit himself to be drowned, because we have an affection for him, and moreover it is very cowardly to die.

"As to mental endowments, your sportsman should have the qualifications of an Ulysses and a Philidor combined. Wary and circumspect, never going rashly to work, but surveying all his ground accurately before he commences operations, and previously calculating all his chances both of success and of failure. Patient under suspense and disappointment, calm and unruffled in moments of intense interest, whether fortune seems to smile or frown on his exertions; and if his bosom must throb at such times, when hopes and fears by turns assail it, he should at all events keep such sensations under rigid control, not suffering them to interfere with his equanimity, or to disturb the coolness and self-possession which at such moments are more than ever necessary to his operations."

Well done Scrope!—and, if he succeed in coming up to the picture, "well done, also, Prince Albert."

TUESDAY.—The sun dawned this morning auspiciously for the further progress of Queen Victoria through those northern districts of her empire. It being generally known that her Majesty would leave Dalkeith Palace at nine o'clock, and pass through Edinburgh on her way to Queensferry, many citizens were on foot at an early hour in the morning, and making inquiries as to the route she would take in passing through or near the city.

Her Majesty's movements appear to be as punctual as if regulated by machinery. The carriages were ordered to be at the door of Dalkeith Palace at a quarter before nine o'clock, and within a few minutes thereafter she was on her progress northward. The route her Majesty intended to take not being exactly known, the general pressure was towards where it was considered certain she must pass; and shortly after six o'clock this morning, the inhabitants began to assemble at the head of Minto-street, Newington, in the expectation that her Majesty would come that way. The crowd continued to increase until about twenty minutes from ten o'clock, when her Majesty and suite made their appearance, and were received with deafening cheers and waving of handkerchiefs. The cortege then proceeded down West Preston-street, by Hope Park, Buccleuch-street, Bristo-street, Teviot-row, Lauriston, Home-street, and Lothian-road. When opposite St. John's Chapel, at a few minutes from ten, a royal salute was fired from the Castle, and answered by the Dauntless frigate. The thousands who had by this time assembled gave an imposing effect to the scene—the air literally rung with joyous acclamations. The royal party then proceeded along Queensferry-street and the Dean Bridge, to Cranksith toll-bar, where a relay of horses were in attendance. The utmost regularity prevailed throughout the whole line, the police having ordered all carts and carriages to be drawn aside to such places as would least inconvenience the royal progress. Mr. Sheriff Spiers met the royal party beyond Dean Bridge, and rode at a short distance in front of her Majesty's carriage.

In anticipation of her Majesty's passing onwards from Dean Bridge, there were numerous individuals and groups on the move along the Queensferry-road from that point so early as seven o'clock. The pedestrians became numerous, and vehicles of all descriptions began to thicken on the road, all in the same track towards the scene of embarkation at Queensferry. Arrived at Newhalls, about half-past eight, Sheriff's Cay-ers, Mr. Colquhoun, superintendent of the West Lothian Police establishment, were there, along with a body of constabulary, and a detachment of the 53rd Regiment with their arms piled. The several roads leading to the point of attraction were already pouring in the population of the adjacent country, in every variety of vehicle or on foot. The walls of the plantations skirting the declivity on the Edinburgh road, began to be fringed with expectant spectators, and clustering on the western brow of Dalmeny Park, while on the other side of the inn, the several classes of carriages were so arranged as to keep the roadway and area in front of the inn completely clear for the approach of the royal cortege. The sheriffs were ere long joined by the Earl of Hopetoun, Lord Lieutenant of the county, and his brother, Mr. Hope, M.P., who, mounting their horses, proceeded on the Edinburgh road to meet her Majesty. The Earl of Rosslyn and Lord Dalmeny also appeared on horseback, and Provost Wyld and the other magistrates of Queensferry, took a station in front of the inn at the top of the pier. The arrangements that were made by the sheriff for keeping order, and at the same time affording the fullest accommodation, were really admirable—and nothing could exceed the good temper and courtesy of the policemen who were on duty. The whole quay was kept vacant, as well as the area betwixt it and the inn, and the bugle having sounded about nine o'clock, the soldiers were in their rank facing the west in front of the entrance to the inn and the pier, while all who could not find room elsewhere, were spread out on the rocky beach be-east the quay, which was covered with a footway of scarlet cloth from the upper to the lower end. And ere her Majesty arrived the assembled people were clustering thickly all around in the most orderly manner, affording a pleasing picture of all grades of society among us.

Her Majesty arrived at Newhalls, amidst the cheering of the throng, and the waving of hats and blue bonnets in abundance, precisely at five minutes to eleven o'clock. Her Majesty was handed from her carriage by Sir Neil Douglas, commander of the forces, who, with an aide-de-camp, had sometime previously appeared on the ground; and Prince Albert, alighting immediately, her Majesty leaning on his arm, walked along the quay, the Lord Lieutenant walking uncovered on her right hand, and the Earl of Rosebery on the left of Prince Albert, and followed soon after by Lord Aberdeen Peel, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Liverpool, and other distinguished personages of her Majesty's suite.

The embarkation was in a few minutes accomplished, on board of the Queen Margaret steamer (the approach to the shore of a royal steamer in the offing being quite out of the question), and when the Queen in the wooden walls of old England stood on the quarter-deck of this humble bark, she was greeted with renewed acclamations from the crowd, who by this time had rushed along the quay in the ardour of enthusiasm. These manifestations of loyalty were received by her Majesty and Prince Albert with their accustomed grace and courtesy. Only the Prince and two ladies accompanied her Majesty in the boat which bore her from the shore of Lothian, and which took a westward sweep for a considerable distance, partly perhaps to obtain a view of the surrounding beauties on either bank of the Forth, and soon after by Lord Elcho for the embarkation of the other official attendants, and the carriages by another boat. For these another small steamer and ferry-boat were in readiness, and it was not a little amusing to see Sir Robert Peel take his place in the bow of the boat for the carriages, a place which a cockney bagman would have spurned as unworthy of his dignity. He was soon, however, beckoned to the steamer, and stood the observed of all observers while in view. The tug and boat cut right across; and having landed at the North Ferry their passengers and freight, left the quay, while the boat, with her Majesty on board, after sailing eastward beyond Inchgarvy, neared the pier, and disembarked at twelve o'clock noon, the royal steamer firing a salute, and the gathering on the quay and heights of North Ferry greeting the landing by signals.

Her Majesty having intimated to the Right Hon. the Earl of Kinnoull her intention of honouring his lordship with a royal visit at Dupplin Castle, while on a tour through the Highlands, the most extensive preparations have for some time been going on in beautifying the noble edifice, and other improvements, in order to entertain the illustrious Sovereign in a style of princely munificence.

Shortly before two o'clock in the afternoon, her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, arrived at Dupplin Castle from Dalkeith Palace, escorted by a showy detachment of the Enniskillen Dragoons. Three of the royal carriages followed immediately behind, containing their Graces the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, the Duchess of Norfolk; the Hon. Miss Paget and Lady Thynne, Sir Robert Peel, Bart., the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Aberdeen, Colonel Bouverie, General Weymss, and other members belonging to the royal household.

The Earl and Countess of Kinnoull received her Majesty on alighting at the entrance of the Castle, and at the same moment the royal standard was hoisted on its summit. Immediately the royal carriage entered the gates of the domain, a guard of honour, amounting to about four hundred Highlanders, belonging to the 92nd regiment, under the command of Captain Stewart, who were drawn out on the lawn fronting the entrance of the Castle, presented arms, and a band struck up "God save the Queen." Her Majesty and her illustrious Consort were then conducted by the noble Earl and Countess through the baronial hall, an elegantly fitted-up apartment, to the library, where several presentations took place. Amongst the addresses, was one from the Lord Provost, noblemen, and magistrates of the city of Perth, congratulating her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert on their gracious visit to Scotland. The Lord Provost had the honour of kissing hands.

Her Majesty, after inspecting the castle, was, with his Royal Highness conducted to the drawing-room, where a magnificent déjeûné was prepared. The plate that adorned the table was of solid gold, and of the most costly description. The salvers were those presented by the Emperor of Russia to his late Majesty the Duke of York. Other portions of the service were used by the noble Earl's ancestors when Ambassador at the Court of Lisbon in the year 1755. The dessert plate was also of solid gold, and was greatly admired for its exquisite workmanship and design.

The royal table consisted of her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, her Grace the Duchess of Buccleuch, the Duchess of Norfolk, Countess of Kinnoull, Lady Ruthven, Countess of Mansfield, the Lady Willoughby, the Hon. Miss Willoughby, Lady Kinnaird, the Hon. Miss Paget, Lady Thomas Hope, the Hon. Miss Thynne, his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl Kinnoull, Sir Robert Peel, Bart., Earl of Mansfield, Earl of Aberdeen, Earl of Liverpool, Lord Morton, the Right Hon. Lord Willoughby, Lord Kinnaird; General Sir George Murray, G.C.B., Master General of the Ordnance; Sir Anne Alexander Ruthven, Lord Steward; Sir Charles Rowley, Gen. Weymss, Colonel Bouverie, Mr. Home Drummond, Mr. Anson, &c.

At four o'clock her Majesty and the Prince, with their illustrious attendants, took their departure to Perth, followed by an escort. The royal cortege, after passing through the principal street in Perth, reached the palace at Scone about six o'clock. Her Majesty was received by the populace with gratifying enthusiasm, and in the evening her happy arrival was made known to the surrounding country by immense bonfires, kindled upon every mountain for twenty miles round.

The royal entrée into Perth took place amid the acclamations of countless thousands, among whom there evidently prevailed but one unalloyed feeling of loyalty and delight. Her Majesty had the keys of the Fair City presented in due form; and it was perhaps not unfitting, although the consequence of strange and inaccountable contemps in another quarter, that this should be the first city in the Royal Victoria's Scottish dominions thus honoured with such a ceremonial on approaching it, seeing that it was thus providentially, we may say, at the gates of the ancient Victoria that it took place; for historians tell us that when the Roman legions, who so much admired our delightful locality, first planted a military station where the city of Perth stands, they, by something almost like a prophetic coincidence, gave it the distinctive title, VICTORIA!

To attempt describing the feelings of enthusiasm, joy, and delight which this auspicious event created, would be a bootless task.

Up to Monday, great uncertainty prevailed as to the route by which the royal cortege would pass through the city, as also regarding the precise hour when it would approach the gates. This seemed to have arisen from a frequent change of purpose on the part of those on whom it was devolved to direct in such matters; or, perhaps, more probably from the fact of there being too many directors, with different views. The route which at one time was considered as settled on might have given gratification to a greater number of our citizens; but, all circumstances considered, and especially her Majesty's comfort (which throughout should have been the paramount consideration), we are sure that the course at last adopted was the best. By this the Queen and her Royal Consort, with their distinguished attendants, enjoyed to full advantage the Ecce Tiber view of the noble river, while they at the same time avoided all deviation from the nearest line of progress, and that more circuitous route which might have in any way savoured of improper parade.

The excitement of the assembled multitude was now at its highest pitch, and the thousands who thronged the numerous galleries and lined the streets, awaited with thrilling interest the pageant which in a few minutes was to gratify their senses. The cavalcade advanced along the South Inch avenue at a round pace, but on reaching the point where the magnificent triumphal arch at the extremity of Prince's-street came fully into view, the horses were gradually drawn up, and the royal carriage came slowly on to the front of the barrier. Here the shouts of the multitude rent the air, and their joyous acclamations were loudly reiterated and prolonged. Immediately outside the gates, on the east side of the approach, the magistrates and town council—the former in court dresses—welcomed the royal visitors. The civic body occupied a slight elevated platform, covered with crimson cloth, extending the whole length of the grand stand; and a moveable platform of the same height stretched outwards to nearly the centre of the roadway. On this the Lord Provost and magistrates walked out to present their greetings and tender their homage to the Sovereign. They were cordially received with that dignity and ease for which her Majesty is so particularly distinguished. Kneeling on a stool, about a foot in height, and covered with crimson velvet, the Lord Provost having the keys of the city handed him by the City Chamberlain, respectfully presented them on a crimson velvet cushion to the Queen, whom he at the same time addressed in the following terms:—

"May it please your Majesty,

"We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord Provost, magistrates, and town council of the city of Perth, most respectfully congratulate your Majesty upon your safe arrival at the ancient capital of your Majesty's hereditary kingdom of Scotland, and bid you welcome to the favourite city of your Majesty's illustrious ancestor, King James IV., who conferred upon it many valuable privileges.

"Permit me, most gracious Sovereign, in the name of, and as representing this community, to place at your disposal the keys of this your city of Perth, and with them to offer the renewed assurances of an unwavering fidelity and attachment to your Majesty's most sacred person and Government, and of our warmest aspirations for your Majesty's health, happiness, and comfort."

To this the Queen most graciously replied:—

"My Lord Provost,

"I have great pleasure in returning to you these keys. I am quite satisfied that they cannot possibly be in better hands."

At the same time was presented to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the freedom of our city in these words:—

"May it please your Royal Highness—In the name of the Town Council and community of Perth, I have much pleasure in requesting your Royal Highness's gracious acceptance of the freedom of the city—the highest compliment we have it in our power to bestow, and which, assuredly, was never more worthily conferred than upon a Prince who enjoys, in so remarkable a degree, the respect, affection, and esteem of the British public."

The Prince rose in the carriage and said:—

"Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of Perth,—I return you my warmest thanks for the cordial welcome you have given us to the ancient city of Perth; I accept with pleasure this address, and I take this opportunity of returning my best acknowledgments for the honour which the city of Perth has conferred upon me by electing me to its freedom."

After another humble obeisance, the magistrates retired, and instantly proceeded to the carriages within the gates. The royal chariot having passed the barrier, the joyous acclamations were renewed and redoubled, a splendid coup-d'œil met the eyes of the monarch. Along the whole line of Prince's-street extensive galleries were filled, chiefly by the fairest maids of the Fair City, and its "sonsy" matrons; and many a lily hand waved the cambric handkerchief, in gay response of the deafening shouts of the rougher sex. The cortege moved slowly on along that thoroughfare, and from that into South-street, and then along St. John-street, east end of High-street, and through George-street, taking leave of the city at the bridge of Tay. At every turn, and along the whole line, the same kind acclaim and demonstrations of enthusiasm greeted the Sovereign and her illustrious Consort, who graciously acknowledged this reception by winning smiles and a grateful inclination of the head, constantly repeated from the one side to the other, during the course of their progress through the city. The retinue of the royal pair were similar to the same as those unconnected with this county, who composed the dinner party at Dupplin. Sir Robert Peel was enthusiastically cheered throughout the city route.

The magistrates judiciously determined that no person whatever should be allowed to station themselves on the bridge. This had the double effect of preventing accidents, and affording the royal pair a fine view of our magnificent river and the sylvan beauty of the scenery on its banks. To secure this arrangement a strong barrier was erected at either end of the bridge, which was also strongly guarded by the military and police. At Bridge-end of Kinnoull similar demonstrations of welcome and of joy saluted the ears of the royal party, and the whole line of road to the palace was crowded with spectators, who continued the shout of enthusiasm until the cavalcade had entered the park. Here again the scene was one of remarkable animation. An immense number of the tenantry of the county had, on the kind invitation of the noble Earl of Mansfield, assembled on horseback; and, we may safely say, that the flower of Scotland's yeomanry graced the pageant.

The preparations and reception at the Palace fell nothing short of any in course of her Majesty's progress. The assemblage of equestrians in the park was indeed an imposing sight, and within, the entertainment was truly of a princely description. The tables were studded with the choicest viands, and every delicacy which nature or art could furnish, graced the hospitable board. The splendid suite of public rooms were thrown open and brilliantly lighted up. The dessert was of the most recherché description. His lordship spared no pains or expense to make the entertainments generally worthy of his royal and illustrious guests. The well-known author of "The Italian Confectionary," Monsieur Jarrin, was engaged to execute the whole. The beauty of the fruit was admirable, and most tastefully arranged, and the great variety of the biscuits generally bore the device of the crown and thistle, with the word "Scone" in ancient Scotch. The compote bonbons had mottoes appropriate to the occasion. Every dish was adorned with the arms of the noble family of Mansfield. In the flank opposite her Majesty were cupids dressed in Scottish apparel, kneeling in the attitude of prayer, with exquisite expression of devotion. Attached to them was a shield with the inscription—"Je prie Dieu pour la Reine." At the four corners of the table were various figures, as Jean d'Arc, Mandarins and Dancers. Nothing was forgotten, not even the butterfly and fly, partaking of the dessert before the Queen. The whole was splendid—quite in the style of the banquets of Louis Quatorze. The fine band of the Carabineers played in the vestibule during the feast. Her Majesty retired at her usual early hour—ten o'clock.

WEDNESDAY.—This morning her Majesty and Prince Albert rose at an early hour, and breakfasted at eight. For nearly an hour afterwards, both walked in the garden and on the terrace in front of the Palace, and expressed themselves highly delighted with the splendid view, with the Tay in front, and including the whole range of the Grampians to the neighbourhood of Lochearn in the west.

The Lord Provost and magistrates met this morning to make arrangements for the preserving good order on occasion of her Majesty's passing through the city from Scone Palace, and among other matters then taken under consideration, was the propriety of soliciting the honour of her Majesty's signature in the Guildry Books, in imitation of the precedents followed by King James IV. and King Charles the I. The Dean of Guild being necessarily absent, Bailies Keay and Gray were deputed by the magistracy to proceed to Scone Palace with the book, and have an interview with Sir Robert Peel, carrying with them the Guild Book. They were introduced by the Earl of Mansfield, who received them in the most courteous manner, to Sir Robert, whose reception of them was most cordial and flattering to the Fair City. Sir Robert examined the records, and seemed much interested with the antique appearance of the volume laid before him, which is massivey bound and double-locked with locks of iron, and clasps many centuries old. The signatures of our two former monarchs were pointed out to him, which we deem it not uninteresting to extract here—

Nemo me impune lacessit. July 24, 1630. CHARLES R.

The deputation having expressed to Sir Robert the wish of the magistrates to obtain the signatures of her Majesty and Prince Albert, Sir Robert most readily and frankly agreed to show the signatures to her Majesty and the Prince, for which he carried the book to the royal presence, and returned with it, with the signatures and mottoes written on separate pages as follows:—

Dieu et mon Droit. VICTORIA R.

Scone Palace,
September 7, 1842.

Treu und Fest. ALBERT.

Scone Palace,
September 7, 1842.

Sir Robert treated the deputation in the most affable and cordial manner, and took the opportunity of expressing how highly gratified all parties were at the reception her Majesty had met with in our ancient city, and with the preservation of order on that occasion. "The arrangements," said Sir Robert, "were most admirable, and the scene beautiful—I never saw anything so striking in all my life—I wrote off last night to Sir James Graham, telling him of your admirable arrangements, and how well order was preserved. I was quite delighted with the reception of her Majesty, and these sentiments, I assure you, are participated in by her Majesty and Prince Albert.

Her Majesty and suite took their departure from the Palace of Scone, for the Highlands, at eleven o'clock. The proper military, police, and constabulary arrangements were made at Perth, and all the route through Bridgend of Kinnoull, along the Bridge, Charlotte-street, Atholl-street, &c., and for some distance along the Dunkeld-road, the way was kept clear by many hundreds of such officers, appointed by the authorities. Although the crowd was not to be compared with that of yesterday, tens of thousands more select, were again assembled, eager to have a parting glimpse, and take farewell of their most gracious Queen. The royal cortege passed at an ambling pace, rather quicker than the slow progress through the city the previous afternoon; but all obtained a distinct view of her Majesty and Prince Albert, who condescendingly acknowledged the rapturous plaudits of the multitude. All along the road to Dunkeld, numerous groups of well-dressed people crowded the heights, or appeared here and there on temporary platforms. The workers were arranged in order beside the arch, and a concourse of parishioners assembled on the opposite side of the road. The Queen was enthusiastically cheered by the whole multitude, and Sir Robert Peel as heartily, as their respective carriages drove past. At Downhill, where the road to Stanley branches off, a handsome triumphal arch was erected, from a plan by Mr. Scobie, architect, Stanley, and erected entirely by the Stanley Company. It consisted of two massive pillars ornamented with evergreens, relieved in front by two tapering pilasters formed of heather. The two pillars supported a handsome arch, and were surmounted by two roe deer. The principal arch was overtopped by a massive entablature, which, being ornamented with evergeens of a lighter colour than the rest of the structure, gave it great relief. The whole of the Stanley workers, to the number of a thousand, were here assembled, along with an immense crowd of the other population of the village and neighbourhood, arranged on a rising ground to the west of the arch, and covering a part of the road from the south. When the cortege approached, it walked slowly through the arch, till it had passed the whole crowd, when it drove on at its usual pace. Here, also, both the royal carriage and that of the Prime Minister were enthusiastically cheered by the whole assemblage. On Birnam heights were planted various of the national banners, with fine effect. In Dunkeld, all was bustle and excitement during the forenoon. The royal party arrived at that city about a quarter past one o'clock, where they were received with true Highland enthusiasm. The Atholl Highlanders, with their claymores and battle-axes, had a most imposing effect, and everything must have given her Majesty a most favourable idea of the Highlands.

Altogether, here, the scene was one of the most animated and heart-stirring nature. It was indebted certainly to nature, and nothing to art, except the splendour of the pavilion and the admirable manage of the Highlands. The reverberated roar of the cannon from Stanley mount, situated within the policies, was awful and tremendous, rebounding from rock to rock, and from one side of the deep and narrow vale to the other. The magnificent trees and the grey ruins of the cathedral, which skirts the south side of the spacious and beautiful arena, added highly to the effect. Then there was the encampment of the Highlanders to the right, peeping from the glades and alleys green, and the warlike lines of the sons of the mountain, of whom nearly fifteen hundred assembled in the garb of the Gael. Many of them were men of gigantic stature, especially the battle-axe phalanx, and those who were equipped with bucklers. They consisted chiefly of Atholl men, the greater part being tenants or retainers of the noble family. But many of the lesser chiefs and proprietors of the neighbourhood, contributed their quota to swell the pageant. The Duke of Leeds had a following of Highlanders from Dumblane, most splendidly equipped. M'Inroy, of Lude, sent forty of his clan. Mr. Small Keir, of Kindrogan, and Mr. Small, of Dirnanean, appeared with forty men. Mr. Butter, of Faskally, Mr. Fergusson, of Middlehaugh, and Mr. Stewart, of Balnakeilly, sent ninety amongst them. Mr. Sandeman, of Bonskeid, sent twenty-five; of Sir Robert Dick's following, thirty appeared in the muster. At one o'clock, P.M., a signal of the royal approach was given, and the bells of the steeple struck up a merry peal, which was instantly followed by the cheers of the thousands assembled on the bridge and in the town. Soon afterwards the royal cortege was seen entering the gate. On reaching the royal park, her Majesty was received by Lord and Lady Glenlyon, and a salute was immediately fired from the guns of the battery. On alighting, the Queen proceeded to view the Highlanders. Fifteen hundred to sixteen hundred in number, were drawn up in a line across the park. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by Lord and Lady Glenlyon, walked up first, the men presenting arms, and returned between the ranks. They next proceeded to the royal tent, where a princely dejeune was served up. Here three hearty Highland cheers were given for her Majesty, which made the welkin ring. Her Majesty seemed very much amused with some of the Highland dances that were performed to the music of the bagpipe, by various parties on the lawn in front of the tent, in which extraordinary agility was displayed by the mountaineers, as well as by some persons of high rank who took a part in them. Her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert, also walked round part of the splendid park, surveying the scenery in the neighbourhood, and passed close to the numerous crowd of spectators, cordially acknowledging their repeated plaudits. The Highlanders were all delighted with the royal condescension.

The marquee on the lawn, in which her Majesty and suite were entertained was sixty-four feet by twenty. The cover was composed of alternate stripes of scarlet and white cloth, and was supported without centre pillars. The boarded floor was covered with crimson. The front was profusely ornamented with evergreens; and orange trees, some of them bearing fruit, were placed at the corners. It was in front of this that the Highland dances took place.

After remaining about two hours, enjoying a scene which she seemed loath to quit, her Majesty took her departure, amidst the renewed firing of cannon and ringing of bells. A change of horses took place at Balnaguard, and another at Aberfeldy; but nothing presenting any interest in the detail of occurrences on the road, we must at once present the royal party at Taymouth Castle. Here the pomp and circumstance attending the reception of the royal guests were of the most magnificent character, and the entertainments were on a scale almost surpassing even regal splendour. The entrée to the spacious and beautiful park was by the east gate, and in a few minutes the whole cortege drove in, full view of the princely mansion of Taymouth. Anon, the heavy guns from the fort, the Star battery, and from another eminence towards Kenmore, opened their fiery throats, awakening the echoes of the surrounding mountains, reverberating along the lake, and dying away in the distant ravines of Ben Lawers. Onwards the royal party and their noble retinue proceeded, and approached the castle, in front of which, and extending along the line of approach, were drawn up the following of the noble Marquis, all arrayed in the garb of Old Gaul, and fully accoutred. The Campbell clan tartan was the prevailing costume, but one of the divisions, which contrasted beautifully with the others, consisted of the woodmen and gamekeepers, arrayed as foresters, in grey or shepherd tartan. These carried firelocks, and all wore in their bonnets the distinguishing symbol of the clan, a sprig of myrtle, and their chiefs or commanders displayed the eagle's feather. This fine body of men consisted of about two hundred. The first company, or division, carried claymores and shields, and every man was armed with a sword and the usual accompaniments, a Highland dirk and skean dhu.

This imposing array was officered by the leading gentlemen of the clan. Glendalloch commanded the whole, and Major Campbell, of Melford, acted as adjutant. The captains of the four grand divisions were Messrs. Bowie Campbell, of Clochfoldich; Campbell, of Renton; G. A. Campbell, of Edinample; and Sir Alexander Campbell, of Barcaldine—a gigantic chief, and one of the most stalwart Highlanders of the whole retinue.

Farther to the eastward stood, also in martial array, the following of Sir Niel Menzies, with that hon. baronet at their head, numbering in all about sixty; and Menzies, of Chesthill, also appeared with about thirty of his tenants and retainers. This clan had a splendid appearance. The garish hue of their peculiar tartan contrasted strikingly with the more sombre garb of the Campbells; and the ladies, of whom there was a considerable number in their train, with silk scarfs of the same colours over dresses of virgin white, added greatly to the gaiety of this imposing scene. The Menzies' men carried two elegant banners of white satin—the one exhibiting the Menzies' arms, and the other the inscription, "God save the Queen," in letters of gold.

It was at half-past six o'clock the signal was given that Her Majesty had entered the grounds, and ten minutes afterwards the cheering was heard to the eastward. The helmets of the dragoons escorting were at the same time seen glancing through the trees, and in a few seconds more the royal carriage was observed slowly advancing down the eminence. On reaching the gate of the barrier, formed by the invisible wire fence, and where a large crowd was assembled, a loud cheer, which sounded far and near, hailed her Majesty and Prince Albert. The royal cortege advanced, and was in a few minutes in front of the Castle, when the cheers became deafening—the Highlanders and military giving their respective salutes—the band striking up the national anthem, the sailors waving their colours, and the general spectators vieing in their enthusiastic expressions of loyal attachment. The Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Kinnoull, the Earl of Lauderdale, Lord Belhaven, and several other noble lords and ladies, were at this time on the balcony which runs round the Castle. On this balcony there were also stationed four Highlanders, who, at different points, wore the time-worn and honoured colours of the Douglas, Campbell, while Captain M'Dougal, R.N., was selected to sustain the royal standard. The whole scene was here most imposing, and her Majesty and Prince Albert, as they graciously returned the cheering salutations, and looked from side to side, appeared to be not less impressed with its grandeur than the multitudes assembled to do homage to their exalted virtues. On her Majesty arriving at the entrance, the Marquis of Breadalbane came forward, when her Majesty cordially took his hand, and alighted from her carriage, followed by Prince Albert. On the Queen alighting she was received by the Marchioness of Breadalbane, whom she graciously saluted. The Duchess of Sutherland and Lady Elizabeth Gower, who were at the entrance, were immediately perceived by her Majesty, who advanced, and successively embraced them, at the same time very audibly exclaiming—"How grand this is!" The royal party at this time at the portico, surveying the scene, the royal pair entered the halls of Taymouth Castle. The Marquis of Breadalbane conducted her Majesty up the staircase, while Prince Albert gave his arm to the Marchioness.

In a short time afterwards the scene assumed features which would require the pen of a Scott, a Moore, or a Byron, to do any justice to their splendour. History speaks of the magnificence of Queen Elizabeth's reception and entertainment at Kenilworth, but it could not have equalled this; it must have been deficient in the accessories and concomitants which rendered this superior. The comforts of life were not such as they are now; and the wild and romantic scenery amid which all this took place, was wanting in the other instance. At Taymouth, on this memorable night, nature shed all her beauties in the eye of royalty; and every adventitious aid which art could devise was brought into requisition to heighten the effect; altogether, or almost literally realizing the dreamy and imaginary splendours of which the "Arabian Nights" give such glowing descriptions.

From an early hour, the scene in the vicinity of the Castle was an animated picture of life and bustle; Highlanders, in their native attire, being seen in every direction, in addition to the regular companies who had been equipped and drilled for the occasion. The latter were marshalled in the forenoon in front of the Castle, and, after their parade, returned to their quarters for refreshment. But shortly before one o'clock they again took their station, and waited in readiness for the royal approach. The company of the gallant 92nd also appeared; and at a little past one o'clock, a troop of the 6th Carabineers arrived. The strains of the bagpipes were at this time heard in the distance, and soon after the Clan Menzies emerged from the wood in their light red and gay tartan, headed by their venerable chieftain, Sir Neil Menzies, Bart., who rode on a white poney. For about an hour and a half the whole of the Highlanders and troops stood patiently in the order arranged for the royal reception. On either side of the grand entrance to the Castle, and forming a semi-circle, there were stationed Highlanders armed with bucklers; these were joined towards the east, or on the right hand, including from the hall-door, by the company of the 92nd Highlanders; the line immediately in front of the Castle was formed by the Highland companies of the Campbells, who reached to the road or avenue through which the royal cortege was to arrive, being the eastern approach. On the other side of the avenue the dragoons were drawn up, who, thus united with the body of bucklermen on the east side of the entrance, and all formed a complete cordon, with the exception of the breadth of the avenue by which her Majesty and the royal party were to approach. From an early hour, two of the Admiralty bargemen in the royal uniforms, with the prominent symbol of the order on the right arm, were observed on the turrets of the western quadrangle, where the Breadalbane flag was floating, their duty being to substitute the royal standard as soon as her Majesty arrived. All the preparations were thus made, and in ample time—the noble Marquis, along with the Right Hon. Fox Maule and other chieftains, being seen moving amidst the throng, and giving the necessary directions. The Marquis of Breadalbane, as Prime Chieftain of the Highlanders assembled, was equipped in a superb Highland costume, though, at the same time, appropriate and chaste. A few minutes before five o'clock, the signal was communicated by telegraphs on the hills, that her Majesty was within nine miles of the Castle. A joyous bustle succeeded; the dragoons mounting their horses, and the officers of the Highlanders repairing to their respective corps.

The illuminations were of the most dazzling description. The extensive park presented a galaxy of light. Fifty thousand variegated lamps studded and adorned and illuminated the principal points of view. On a slope, a little in front, and to the right of the Castle, a great number of those were disposed on the grass, so as to present in beautiful display, and in the following form, the words:—

WELCOME,

VICTORIA. ALBERT.

From behind this, and stretching along eastwards past the front of the Castle to the eastern approach, the invisible wire fence, situated at some three or four hundred yards' distance, was tastefully festooned with the same dazzling ornament, as were also trunks of many of the largest trees, both near and at a distance; while the boughs and foliage of others were clustered with those of various hue, hanging like natural fruit. The Fort, which is situated high above the plain on which the Castle stands, at the distance of nearly a mile, presented one complete glare of light. The flanking turrets were surmounted by crescents, and the larger one in the centre exhibited the Breadalbane banner in one sheet of fire. The Star Battery below was ornamented in the same way; and the Gamekeeper's Tower, still farther up, and more distant, was similarly illumined; and, in the darkness of the evening, appeared like an eastern temple hanging in mid air between earth and heaven. On an open acclivity, about half a mile west of the Fort, and considerably lower on the height, there was a superb imperial crown, in the most dazzling colours, placed betwixt the letters V. A., in gigantic characters. These lights and the transparencies were all prepared by Messrs. Hancock and Rixon, Cockspur-street, Pall-mall East, London, and did infinite credit to their skill and taste as artists in this line. Besides all this, every mountain top, and all the summits of the lesser eminences within view, blazed forth like as many volcanoes during the night; and even on the following day the smouldering remains of the immense bonfires continued to send up their smoke.

All this, again, was accompanied by illuminations of a different character. There was a display of fireworks prepared by the most skilful London pyrotechnists, such as we have not seen surpassed even at Vauxhall. They were set off in every variety of form and hue, and in uninterrupted succession. Among the most prominent devices was one piece, which, after various fanciful evolutions, at length subsided into a star, with the letters V. A.; another and still more brilliant device was a large triumphal arch, which suddenly evolved from a blaze of light, and crowned by "Long live the Queen," in large letters. This was followed by a battery of rockets and a splendid green light. The fort or pagoda was also suddenly enveloped in a bright red light, which illumined the foliage around, and had a magnificent effect; on the red light disappearing, a green succeeded, which was scarcely less dazzling. The display ended about half-past ten o'clock, having lasted for an hour, and was succeeded by the gaze of a hundred flambeaux, carried by as many Highlanders, to light the platforms for the Highland dances, which now took place. At each corner of two extensive stages, raised about two feet from the ground, stood a gigantic Celt—eight in all—bearing the gay fluttering pennons which appeared in the ranks when the first royal salute was given, and the torchmen were ranged around outside, keeping also the ground clear betwixt the platforms and the Castle. By this time it was about half-past ten o'clock, when the Queen appeared on the balcony, where a chair was placed, and sat viewing the national dances with evident and delighted curiosity. The Duke, who wore the Order of the Thistle, stood on the right hand of her Majesty, and Sir Robert Peel on the left, with the Royal party on either side; the Marquis of Breadalbane appeared nigh the platform giving directions. In order to shed still more light on the scene, several beautiful portable lamps were brought from the Castle and placed around the platform. The most athletic dances were engaged in by both "gentles and commons," and altogether such a gay scene never before was seen in Majesty. Nearly a dozen of bagpipes gave spirit to the dancers' heels, who, in the Highland sword dance, "Gillie Callum," and the "Reel o' Huilachan," displayed extraordinary feats of agility and grace. After several dances by the men and the officers of the Highland corps, at last the Hon. Fox Maule, Mr. Menzies of Chesthill, and two other gentlemen, all in the garb, took their places on the platform, and executed a Highland reel with rare spirit. Loud cheers followed, and her Majesty and Prince Albert were seen to express their lively satisfaction. Her Majesty retired at a quarter past eleven o'clock, followed by Prince Albert, when they were saluted by a loud cheer from the Highlanders and all present. A few minutes afterwards, Prince Albert returned to enjoy the dancing, which was kept up for some time longer. His Royal Highness then bowed and retired amidst renewed acclamations. Thus this unparalleled fête concluded, and all who enjoyed the sight seemed only at fault in one respect, and that was for words to express their ardent admiration.

Such were the gaieties without the Castle, while all was splendour and festivity within. To say that it was splendid merely, would be a weak phrase; it was absolutely gorgeous in the extreme. The magnificent suite of public apartments were lighted up into a dazzling brightness, and every lobby and recess attached to, or connecting these, was also in a glare of light. Besides the ordinary lamps of the Castle, thirty hundred-weight of additional chandeliers, lamps, and candelabras, of the most superb description, were brought from London for this special purpose. The royal party sat down for dinner exactly at eight o'clock. The table was garnished with the choicest of the culinary and confectionary art, and the sideboards were stocked with every variety of wines of the finest sorts and most delicious flavour. The richness and splendour and profusion of gold plate was worthy to serve, as it did, the mightiest monarch on earth. During the banquet, the powerful band of the 66th performed beautiful airs and overtures in the spacious and splendid apartment used as the dining-hall of the Castle previous to the recent additions to the edifice. The distinguished company who sat at table on this occasion consisted of most of the noble and honourable individuals which are named as constituting the dinner-party the following day. Her Majesty retired to rest a little after eleven o'clock; soon after which the admiring throng of spectators dispersed, and the bustle, din, and buzz of voices for the day settled down into the universal stillness of night. The weather throughout this auspicious day had been delightful; and the magnificent demonstrations and display of the occasion were witnessed under every advantage.

THURSDAY.—Her Majesty was afoot at an early hour this morning, but the weather was not so favourable. The sky was densely clouded, but it did not rain, and as the day rose the atmosphere became lighter. The Queen and Prince Albert breakfasted at eight o'clock. At half-past nine, his Royal Highness rode out with his noble host, equipped for a deer-stalking excursion. He seemed in high health and buoyant spirits, and, previous to mounting, conversed in a lively manner with the noblemen of the party who were sauntering in front of the Castle. He was dressed in a black velvet shooting-coat, neat shepherd tartan trowsers, stout walking shoes, and light-coloured gaiters, with a low-crowned dral-coloured hat. He looked remarkably well. The noble Marquis conducted his Royal Highness to the hills on the south side of the valley, where their sport was exceedingly good. They returned to the Castle at two o'clock, by which time the Prince had shot to his own hand—

1½	brace of black game,
3	brace grouse;
1	brace capercailzie;
1	wood-pigeon; and
12	hares.

This, we think, must be reckoned fair sport for one day. As is well known, the noble Marquis re-introduced the capercailzie into this country; but, as far as is known, Prince Albert has been the first to kill any of the species—the same having been so strictly preserved, that the sportsman is forbidden to kill blackcock on the Breadalbane estates, in case that bird should, in the excitement of the sport, he mistaken for the capercailzie. The royal party returned from the battue before two o'clock. In two hours afterwards, the foresters were seen carrying the slaughtered heap to the Castle. Her Majesty, who was shown the game, was graciously pleased to order a blackcock to be handed to her. Thereafter the officers of the Breadalbanes plucked the feathers from this bird, and stuck the same in their bonnets, to be preserved as a characteristic memorial of this celebrated hunt, and hence as her Majesty's visit to Taymouth.

While her royal partner was absent in the hills, the Queen, accompanied by the Duchess of Norfolk, took a circuitous walk through the grounds, westward to the dairy, a beautiful point of attraction to all visitors. Here her Majesty partook of bread and milk, with other produce of the dairy. So unrestricted and so unpretending was the visit, that the occupants could scarcely believe that it was the Sovereign who was paying this forenoon call. After tasting the milk, and seeing the operation of churning, in a china vase with silver machinery, which was all obtained in anticipation, her Majesty pursued her walk on the ground, and reached the Kenmore gate, which is distant about a mile and a half from the Castle. The inhabitants of this hamlet, with the many strangers who now overcrowded it, were all the while little conscious that her Majesty was so near as to view the village through the bars of the gate. Having enjoyed this walk, her Majesty returned, still on foot, to the Castle, before the return of his Royal Highness from the hills.

During the day, other noblemen and gentlemen of the royal suite rode out to the field sports. At noon, Sir Robert Peel and the Hon. Fox Maule prepared also for a shooting excursion. The Premier frankly said, "Hold my gun, Maule, till I mount." Mr. Maule not only took hold of the gun, but held Sir Robert's bridle till he sprung into the saddle. The two hon. gentlemen then rode off together in high glee, and as if they "lo'ed like ony brithers." The pair and they preferred was Drummond Hill, behind the Castle, and with them also the sport was successful.

About five o'clock in the afternoon, the royal party drove out to an airing about the grounds. The cortege consisted of three carriages with fours. The following distinguished individuals were of the party.

1st carriage. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, with the Marchioness of Breadalbane and the Duchess of Norfolk.

2nd carriage. The Duchess of Buccleuch, the Marchioness of Abercorn, the Hon. Miss Paget, and Lord Morton.

3rd carriage. The Duchess of Sutherland and Lady Elizabeth Leveson Gower, the Duchess of Roxburghe and the Countess of Kinnoull.

The equerries, General Wemyss and Colonel Bouverie, attended on horseback. The Marquis of Breadalbane proceeded on horseback, and Sir Robert Peel rode by the side of the royal carriage.

The route adopted was along the avenue to the Kenmore gate. The carriages were driven slowly through the village, which resounded with the acclamations of the people assembled to greet her Majesty. The cavalcade then crossed the Tay by Kenmore-bridge, where the waters of the river debouch from the loch. The royal pair halted on the centre arch for several minutes, to view the beautiful expanse of the lake. The cortege then entered the grounds by the kitchen garden, traversed the grand avenue and terrace on the left bank of the Tay, passed the Star Battery, and recrossed the river by the beautiful rustic bridge at Inchbaddry, returning by Newhall to the grand approach to the front of the castle.

The next movement of importance was for dinner. This was again announced at eight o'clock, when the royal and illustrious party proceeded to table in the following order:—

The Queen with the Marquis of Breadalbane;
Prince Albert with the Marchioness;
Duke of Roxburghe with the Duchess of Buccleuch;
Duke of Buccleuch with the Duchess of Norfolk;
Marquis of Abercorn with the Duchess of Roxburghe;
Marquis of Lorn with the Duchess of Sutherland;
Earl of Liverpool and Marchioness of Abercorn;
Earl of Morton and Lady Elizabeth Gower;
Earl of Aberdeen and Countess of Kinnoull;
Earl of Mansfield and Lady Louisa Hay;
Sir Robert Peel and Lady Belhaven;
Lord Belhaven and the Hon. Miss Paget;
Sir George Murray and Lady Menzies.

There were besides in this illustrious party, the Earl of Lauderdale; Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Maule; Sir Anthony Maitland; Sir James Clark; Sir John Pringle and the Misses Pringle; Messrs. George and James Baillie, and the officers commanding the military detachments. The entertainment was equally sumptuous as on the previous evening.

Her Majesty retired from the dinner-table at half-past nine, and at ten repaired to the great Hall, for a musical party, where the noblemen and gentlemen also joined the ladies. Mr. Wilson, the vocalist, was then ordered to be in attendance. He had previously, by the Queen's command, given in a list of Scottish songs, from which her Majesty made a selection. These consisted of "Lochabar no more." "The Lass o' Gowrie," "Pibroch of Donuil Dhu," "Auld Robin Gray," "Will ye gang to the Highlands, Leezie Lindsay?" "Flowers of the Forest," which were all very beautifully sung; "Pibroch of Donuil Dhu," was given with powerful energy and effect. No Jacobite song had been given in the list, but after the second song above-mentioned, her Majesty requested "Wae's me for Prince Charlie," as also "Cam ye by Athole." In addition to these were also requested at the time other two included in the list, namely, "John Anderson, my jo," and "The Laird o' Cockpen." We have high authority for stating that her Majesty was pleased to express herself highly gratified, which was also manifested by a special mark of her royal patronage to Mr. Wilson the following day. Several ladies of the party sung some duets, &c., in admirable style the same evening. The pianoforte accompanist was Mr. Land, director of the chorus at the Theatre-Royal, Drury-lane.

FRIDAY.—This morning gave early promises of a fine day, but the clouds soon began to lower again, and a drizzle fell occasionally. The Prince took another day's shooting with equal success, having set out with the Marquis about the same hour as before. Soon after, viz., about ten o'clock, the Queen, attended only by the Duchess of Norfolk, and a single footman carrying their cloaks, took another pedestrian excursion through the sylvan grounds. She took her departure privately, and proceeded by the Chinese bridge to the grand avenue; retracing part of the carriage route of the previous evening. A heavy shower fell during the excursion, and her Majesty must have been partly exposed to it; but she did not seem to heed it much. She returned to the castle before eleven, having made a circuit of at least three miles within the hour. Just as her Majesty was rounding the turn about 300 yards at the castle, the rain came down by the carriage of Sir George Murray, on his departure. The gallant General alighted, and stepped forward to meet his Royal Mistress, with whom he returned up the approach, familiarly talking together. Her Majesty appeared in high spirits, and laughed heartily at some remark made by Sir George. She was dressed in Stuart tartan, with a board set red tartan shawl and a light blue bonnet. The weather, though thus unfavourable, afforded her Majesty the pleasure of witnessing the Highlands in one of their sublimest features—the rising and raking of the mist. This was most conspicuous, too, on a small scale, immediately under the windows of her apartments. Soon after returning from her walk, the sun broke out for a brief period in great splendour, and the heat was excessive. The whole level part of the lawn was now like a sheet of snow, so dense was the mist which rose and swept along its surface, nowhere rising to the height of two feet. This had a most beautiful effect, and we have never seen anything like it before.

It was arranged that another exhibition of Highland dancing should take place at three o'clock, but the rain again fell heavily, and this was interrupted for nearly an hour. It was her Majesty's intention to have again taken her station on the balcony and a chair was placed there for the purpose, but it was at no time sufficiently fair to admit of this. She appeared, however, at the drawing-room window, with the Prince by her side, and a royal salute was given by the military, and Highlanders—the band playing "God save the Queen." The dancing proceeded as on Wednesday evening, but we think the exhibition was much better on this occasion.

Between five and six o'clock her Majesty again rode out with her usual attendants. Prince Albert, the Duchess of Sutherland, and Marchioness of Breadalbane being also in the royal carriage. The party visited the Fort, and afterwards Kenmore, where there was a short aquatic excursion, but for want of time her Majesty did not, as at one time intended, pass up the loch to see the Falls of Achan, at the landing-place to which there was a beautiful jetty prepared, carpetted with heather blossom, for her reception. After dinner this evening, agreeably to the pre-arrangements, the entertainments of the day closed with a grand ball.

In the evening the grounds were again illuminated with lamps, as on the Wednesday evening, the various devices being a second time lighted up. The ball commenced in the great baronial hall shortly after ten o'clock, the first dance, a quadrille, being led off by the Queen and the Marquis of Breadalbane, and Prince Albert and the Duchess of Buccleuch. About 200 were present, including all the company in the Castle, the officers of the Highland corps, the naval officers, who were to conduct the flotilla, the officers of the Dragoons and 42nd, and several of the gentry of the county. The officers of the Highlanders, and the naval and military officers on duty at the castle were, in the course of the evening, presented to her Majesty, and had the honour of kissing the royal hand. There were about fifty presentations. Her Majesty appeared specially delighted with the Highland reels, accompanied by the bagpipes, and in some of which the Marquis of Breadalbane, Mr. Fox Maule, and others, took a part. These were danced with as much liveliness and hilarity in the royal ball-room as were the dances on the platform in the preceding part of the day; and her Majesty was seen talking to the Prince, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Duchess of Norfolk, and those immediately around, with great animation, and was altogether a gladdened spectator of the exhilarating scene. One of the best dances of the evening was the "Rill Thullachan," which was executed with admirable and characteristic spirit by the Right Hon. Fox Maule, Davidson, of Tulloch, Menzies of Chesthill, and Cluny Macpherson. The Queen also led off a country dance with the Duke of Buccleuch, Prince Albert dancing with the Duchess of Sutherland. At twenty minutes past twelve o'clock her Majesty and the Prince retired, but the dancing was kept up by the rest of the company until three o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Dewar of Edinburgh led the orchestra with admirable spirit. The band of the 79th were stationed in the vestibule.

SATURDAY.—A better route through the Highlands, for the purpose of seeing the varied beauties of our Scottish scenery, could hardly have been chosen by her Majesty than the one which she adopted. Taymouth, with its "princely mansion," as it has been justly called, its rampart of mountains, and its magnificent pleasure-grounds, and the Lake of Tay stretching away in the distance, would form matter for a volume of itself. Her Majesty is said to have been delighted with it beyond measure; and, had circumstances permitted, would willingly have prolonged her stay for other two days.

Before leaving Kenmore, her Majesty and the Prince went through the ceremony of planting the trees, which was postponed from yesterday. The trees, as we said, are two Scotch firs and two oak-trees. They are planted on a spot a little to the east of the castle. The spade used on the occasion is an elegant little article, with an oak shaft, the handle of which is encircled with crimson cloth.

Her Majesty and the Prince, accompanied by the Marquis of Breadalbane, left Taymouth Castle a little past eleven o'clock, and embarked on board the royal barge a little to the east of the bridge over the Tay. On her Majesty leaving the castle, a royal salute was given from the battery on the fort. The royal barge was a vessel of singular elegance, and was built on very short notice by Mr. M'Nicol of Greenock. It was thirty-two feet long by seven feet broad. The cushions for her Majesty and Prince Albert were covered with Breadalbane tartan velvet, with the Breadalbane arms beautifully embroidered on it, and over head was a canopy of Breadalbane spun-silk tartan. The barge was commanded by Captain M'Dougall, of M'Dougall; and was propelled by eight stout rowers, arrayed in tartan jackets and white trousers. Several other boats, containing her Majesty's suite, and gaily decorated with flags, accompanied the royal barge down the lake. As the flotilla swept past two barges of the noble Marquis, which were moored a short way above the bridge, a salute was fired from the latter, while the more powerful battery on a height to the westward of the castle, the guns of which were pointed up the loch, also delivered a salute which reverberated among the hills, and had a fine effect. The Marchioness of Breadalbane, accompanied by Viscount Duncan, soon after crossed the bridge in carriages for Killin. In crossing the bridge her ladyship was loudly cheered. The royal party reached the west end of the lake between one and two o'clock. Carriages were in waiting to receive the royal party, who then drove to Achmore House, near Killin, a seat of the Marquis of Breadalbane, where luncheon was awaiting them. After remaining there about three quarters of an hour, they proceeded on their journey by Lochearnhead, St. Fillan's, and Crieff, to Drummond Castle.

The district through which her Majesty passed being a thinly populated one, there were, of course, few crowds along the roadside, except at the villages of Lochernhead, St. Fillan's, and Comrie, and the town of Crieff. At these places, however, there were numerous preparations made for her Majesty's reception, in the shape of triumphal arches, floral decorations, &c.

It was curious to observe the ingenuity frequently displayed by means of bunches of heather and branches of trees, not only in keeping unsightly objects out of view, but in converting them into actual ornaments. Triumphal arches also were very common along the road, especially in Strearhern, where there were no fewer than a dozen. Between Killin and Drummond Castle there might be in all about eighteen.

On reaching St. Fillan's her Majesty was met by Sir David Dundas, Bart., who expected to have the honour of entertaining her Majesty at lunch in Dunira House; but owing to the lateness of the hour (five o'clock) it was found to be impossible to spare so much time. Sir David, however, joined the cavalcade, as did also the other proprietors along the line (viz. Major Moray, of Abercairney, as representing Mrs. Williamson, of Lawers, and Sir William Murray, Bart., of Ochtertyre) at the boundaries of their several properties.

At Turret Bridge her Majesty was met by Lord Willoughby, who, along with the above-named gentlemen, who were all on horseback, conducted her to Drummond Castle. Her Majesty's approach was announced by the firing of cannon from Ochtertyre brae. The town of Crieff was gaily decorated for the occasion with triumphal arches, festoons, and flags; and it was here and on the road down to the castle that the greatest crowds were assembled. Her Majesty reached Crieff a little after six o'clock, about which time a pretty smart shower fell. Her Majesty however, much to the satisfaction of the people, was graciously pleased not to allow the carriage to be closed till she passed through the town, merely keeping up her parasol. We need hardly say that her Majesty's reception was everything that could be desired. It was now getting rapidly dark, and the immense crowd who had assembled along the Muthil-road, and especially in the singularly splendid avenue of a mile and a half, which leads up to the castle, were beginning to fear that, long and patiently as they had waited, her Majesty would be invisible to them when she arrived. This fear was but too well founded, for, in addition to the increasing darkness, the rain had obliged her Majesty to get the carriage closed, so that she passed through the many thousands here collected almost entirely unseen. The disappointment thus occasioned was of course very great, the more especially as many of the Willoughby and Strathallan tenantry, several hundreds of whom were drawn up on horseback on each side of the avenue, had come between 40 and 50 miles, and had sat on horseback from two o'clock. There was also a considerable number of people present from Edinburgh, Glasgow, Paisley, Dundee, and other places, who had waited for several hours, and were similarly disappointed.

The inner court at Drummond Castle was lined with about 120 Highlanders dressed in Drummond tartan, with a detachment of the 42nd Highlanders accompanied by the band of the Carabineers. The Highlanders were commanded by the Hon. Mr. Willoughby, Master of Drummond—the other officers being the Master of Strathallan, Major Drummond of Stuggeith, and Captain Drummond of Megginch.

Her Majesty reached the castle exactly at seven o'clock, by which time it was almost dark, so much so, that a few minutes before the approach of the royal cortege it was proposed to illuminate the inner court with blue lights and torches; but there was not time to get them ready. Her Majesty and the Prince were received by Lady Willoughby. The clan saluted her Majesty in the usual manner; the 42nd Highlanders presented arms; the band of the Carabineers played the national anthem; and the union jack was lowered from the top of the old castle, and the royal standard raised in its stead. The whole passed over, however, without a cheer. The Queen, we are informed, was exceedingly sorry at the disappointment experienced by so many people on the present occasion, and resolved to make up for it as far as possible, by passing through Crieff again on Monday on her visit to Abercairney.

Her Majesty and the Prince soon after dressed for dinner, and the following party sat down at table:—Her Majesty the Queen, Prince Albert, Lord Mansfield, Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe, Sir George Murray, Duchess of Sutherland, Lady Elizabeth Leveson Gower, the Officers of the Guard, Mrs. Home Drummond, Mr. E. Drummond, Sir David and Lady Dundas, the Hon. the Master of Strathallan; and of those residing in the Castle, Lord and Lady Willoughby, Hon. Alberick Drummond, the Master of Drummond, Lord and Lady Carrington, Mr. and Mrs. Heathcote, the Hon. Miss Willoughby, Duke de Richlieu, Lord Ossulston; together with her Majesty's suite.

In consequence of the very limited accommodation within the castle, it was necessary to erect a temporary banqueting-hall at the back of the house. This building was of wood, and plain enough in the exterior: but internally it was fitted up with great elegance and taste, and when properly lighted had a very fine effect.

In the evening the houses of Crieff were illuminated with candles in honour of the occasion; and at ten o'clock upwards of a hundred fires blazed from the neighbouring ranges of hills. The signal for lighting these was given by a blue light from the top of the old castle. The bonfires were seen by her Majesty from the drawing-room windows.

SUNDAY.—This morning, the Queen and Prince Albert walked for some time in the flower-garden, which is reckoned the finest of the kind in Britain, if not in Europe, and which has greatly excited her Majesty's admiration. The Rev. Mr. Giles, Lord Willoughby's chaplain, afterwards read prayers, and preached before her Majesty and his Royal Highness in the drawing-room. Prince Albert also visited the top of the old castle, for the purpose of seeing the extensive view which is commanded from that eminence.

Sir R. Peel and Lord Aberdeen attended service in the parish church of Muthil; Lord and Lady Carrington, Mr. and Mrs. Heathcote, and several of the other nobility and gentry residing at the castle, went to the Episcopal chapel of Muthil.

On Sunday, the dinner party were the Duchess of Sutherland, Lady Elizabeth Leveson Gower, Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, Officers of the Guard, Major Murray of Abercairney, Lord and Lady Kinnoull, Lady Louisa Hay, Hon. James Murray, Rev. Mr. Giles, Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe, &c.

MONDAY.—This morning, about half-past five, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by Lord Willoughby and Mr. Campbell of Monzie, started for the deer-stalking in the forest of Glenartney, a distance of twelve miles. They returned about three o'clock, the Prince having shot a stag and three hinds.

Her Majesty again spent some time this morning in the flower-garden, along with the Duchess of Norfolk. In passing through the inner court, which was lined with the Highlanders, her Majesty walked round the square, and inspected their dresses and accoutrements. About half-past four her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by Lady Willoughby and the Duchess of Buccleuch, in the same carriage, and followed by the Duke of Buccleuch, the Duchess of Norfolk, and the Hon. Miss Paget in another carriage, left the castle, on a visit to Major Moray, at Abercairney, and Lady Baird (the widow of the hero of Seringapatam), at Fernton. The royal cortege left the castle by the east gate, and passed through Crieff, where large crowds were again collected to get another look of her Majesty and the Prince, who graciously acknowledged the plaudits with which they were everywhere received.

The dinner party consisted of Lord and Lady Abercorn, Mr. Campbell of Monzie, Lord and Lady Sefton, Lord and Lady Craven, Officers of the Guard, Lord and Lady Belhaven, Lady Glenlyon, Mr. Gilmour, &c.

A grand ball took place in the evening in the temporary banquet-hall behind the castle. The number present amounted to about fifty, the hall not being able to accommodate a larger number.

TUESDAY.—About nine o'clock, her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by their suite, left Drummond Castle for Dalkeith Palace. The same preparations were visible along the road as on the previous occasions; such as triumphal arches, whitened cottages, floral decorations, flags, &c. About a mile beyond Muthil, was the following inscription on an arch erected there:—"Adieu, fair daughter of Streathern." Between Drummond Castle and Stirling there were in all nine arches. The little villages of Dunblane and bridge of Allen were particularly gay and happy-looking on the occasion. At the bridge of Allen her Majesty was met by the sheriff, the lieutenancy, and gentlemen of the county, who escorted her on horseback to Stirling-bridge.

The ancient burgh of Stirling, from an early hour this morning, was a scene of great bustle and excitement. Crowds were pouring into the town on horseback, in coaches, in carts, on foot, and in all sorts of vehicles. Every avenue into the town was swarming with people. Workmen were also busy decorating the fronts of the houses along the expected line of procession. The quantity of trees, evergreens, and flowers brought into requisition for this purpose was beyond all precedent. Almost every house was like a garden wall, every street like an avenue of trees. Among the most remarkable of the decorations were those in front of Drummond's Agricultural Museum, consisting of large festoons of grasses, a floral crown, two sheaves of wheat, &c. At the foot of Broad-street there were painted in large letters the following lines from the "Lady of the Lake:"—

"Slowly down the deep descent,
Scotland's Queen and nobles went;
While all around the copse and wild wav
Was jubilee and loud huzza.

Two paintings were placed in front of the town-house, containing portraits of the Queen and Prince Albert, with the words, "Welcome to the Queen who rejoices in the happiness of her people." "Hail, Royal Albert, may your union with the Queen be as lasting as it is happy." In front of a house in Bow street was inscribed, "Welcome guidwife of Ballengeich." There was another feature of the streets too remarkable to be omitted, and that was the immense number of tartan shawls of various patterns suspended from the windows in the shape of flags. We counted about a dozen in one house alone in the Bow.

At a little past ten o'clock the provost and magistrates assembled to meet her Majesty at the south end of Stirling Bridge, where a triumphal arch had been erected, formed of heather and bay leaves. After waiting for some time, the cannon from Arthrie Castle, answered by another salute from the Abbey Crag, announced her Majesty's approach. At twenty minutes past eleven, the guns of the castle fired a royal salute, announcing that her Majesty had arrived at the north side of Stirling Bridge, where she changed horses. The cortege then proceeded onwards, when the postillions, thinking the barrier on the bridge only one of the many triumphal arches they had encountered in their route, were about to pass through, but her Majesty catching a view of the magistrates in their official robes, with the high constables and the guildry on each side of the barrier, immediately called to them to stop. The procession then halted, when the provost, followed by the chamberlain and members of the council, advanced, and making their obeisance, Provost Galbraith said—

"May it please your Most Gracious Majesty, I have the honour, in the name of the Magistrates, Town-Council, and whole inhabitants of your Majesty's ancient royal burgh of Stirling, to congratulate you on your visit to Scotland, and to offer you, in their name, our most devoted loyalty and affection to your Majesty's sacred person and throne. We venture to hope that your Majesty has received gratification and pleasure from your short tour in our interesting country, and that at no distant period you will be graciously pleased again to visit Scotland, and to afford to your Scottish subjects another opportunity of testifying their loyalty and attachment to your Majesty's Throne and Government. We humbly pray that your Majesty's life may be long spared to reign and rule over a devoted, a loyal, and a happy people. And now, in the name of the Magistrates and Council, I beg to present to your Majesty the keys of this ancient burgh."

Her Majesty graciously replied "We are assured that they cannot be in better hands, and it affords us much pleasure again to return them to your keeping."

The Provost then turning to Prince Albert, said,—"May it please your Royal Highness, in the name of the citizens, town-council, and inhabitants of Stirling, I do myself the honour to present to your Royal Highness the freedom of this ancient burgh, and to express to your Royal Highness the great honour which we feel in your condescending to accept this tribute of respect. It will be a pride in after days to recollect that the name of your Royal Highness is enrolled in the burgess book of this our ancient and loyal town; and permit me to say that your virtues and amiability of character have won for you the affections of all her Majesty's loyal and loving subjects. Permit me now to present to your Royal Highness the box containing the freedom of this ancient town."

His Royal Highness replied—"I feel myself highly honoured by this mark of your respect, and shall long cherish its remembrance."

On the cortege being about to pass on, the Provost again said, "Permit me one word, your Majesty. I had the honour to serve under your Majesty's lamented father, his late Royal Highness the Duke of Kent, for 24 years. It gives me sincere pleasure that, as Provost of this town, I have had the honour to receive your Majesty, under whose father I have had the honour to serve."

Her Majesty then replied, it gave her great satisfaction to meet in the Provost of this ancient town one who had served under her revered father.

The royal cavalcade then passed along the road leading to the west end of Cowane-street, up Bridge-street, St. Mary's Wynd, Broad-street, and Mar-place, to the Castle, escorted all the way by the Provost and magistrates.

On arriving at the Castle-gate, which they did about five minutes to twelve, her Majesty and Prince Albert alighted, and were received by Sir Archibald Christie, the Governor of the Castle, who conducted the royal pair to his house in the Castle.

The aspect of the old Castle of Stirling, its commanding position, the unrivalled prospects it presents to the eye, the extent of view visible from its walls, including Ben Lomond on the one side, and the whole range of the Ochill mountains on the other, seemed to strike her Majesty with the highest degree of admiration; nor was her Majesty forgetful of the numberless historical associations connected with its ancient walls. At one time the favourite residence of the Scottish Sovereigns, it was at all times an object of the first importance to the possessor. Antiquaries differ as to the date of its erection; but it is clearly proved to have existed as a fortalice of great strength so early as the beginning of the ninth century. Possessed in turn by the Picts, the Northumbrians, and the Danes, it passed ultimately into the hands of the English and Scotch alternately, in those terrible wars of independence waged by Wallace and the two Bruces against our Edward. General Monk reduced it for the Parliament in 1651, while General Blakeney held it out successfully against the Highland army under Prince Charles Edward, in 1746. The knowledge of these mutations in its history gave her Majesty a greater zest for the enjoyment of the scene in all its stern reality.

Her Majesty was followed by her suite, by Sir George Murray, Colonel of the 42nd, several of the clergy of the district, and others. At the lower-barrack square, a party of the 42nd were drawn up, who presented arms to her Majesty in passing. Her Majesty wore a satin tartan dress, white bonnet, and rich Paisley shawl. Prince Albert was dressed in a black surtout and checked trousers. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness were received at the door of the Governor's house, by Lady Christie, who conducted them to the drawing-room, where they partook of a slight refreshment, and afterwards took a short walk in the garden behind the house, from which a fine view of the country to the west is obtained. The royal party afterwards visited the armoury, which contains John Knox's pulpit.

About half-past one, her Majesty, the Prince, and suite, returned to their carriages, and moved slowly down Mar-place, Broad-street, Baker-street, King-street, and Port-street. The scene presented in Broad-street was decidedly the gayest and most exciting we have yet seen in any of the towns through which her Majesty has passed. The natural grandeur of the High-street of Edinburgh was of course wanting; but, in every other respect, it was superior to what was there exhibited. The street, though a short is a spacious one; the houses were most of them white washed for the occasion; all of them were covered with foliage; scores of showy flags were suspended from the windows; eager faces were gazing out of every one; and handkerchiefs fluttered from every hand; and, in addition to all these, there was the ringing of bells, the merry sound of music, and the loud and continued huzzas of the multitude. Even the determined and bitter hooting experienced by Sir R. Peel at this quarter had its effect in adding to the excitement. Sir Robert, by the way, did not seem at all easy at the reception he met with, and frequently endeavoured to curry favour with the crowd by holding his hand out to them to shake; but, so far from abating, the disapprobation seemed to increase the more he became known. It is but fair to confess, however, that the hissers did not have it all their own way. A few lads, who kept around his carriage the whole way, cheered him most lustily; as did also a few groups here and there along the line of procession.

The Provost and Magistrates, with the Council, the Guildry, and various trades, accompanied the royal party to Port-street, the southern extremity of the burgh, where another triumphal arch was erected. Here the boys connected with the Stirling Academy, dressed in Highland uniforms, were assembled under the direction of Mr. Dunlop, the rector of that institution, and saluted her Majesty as she passed. The cheering here, as it had been along the whole route, was immense, and Sir Robert Peel, who was recognised here, came in for his full share of the applause. The Magistrates and their friends then took leave of her Majesty, and returned to Broad-street, where arrangements had been made for all the respectable citizens to drink the Queen's health. Her Majesty was here again joined by the Sheriff and Lieutenancy, and other county gentlemen forming her Majesty's escort, who thence conducted and accompanied her to Falkirk, and onwards to Linlithgow Bridge.

On leaving Stirling, the royal cortege passed through a succession of triumphal arches and other decorations, with which the hamlets and villages along the road were thickly studded. At St. Ninian's bedizened arches were placed at each end of the village; Bannockburn presented no fewer than five of these tasteful erections; Torwood-toll was decorated with an arch of laurel interspersed with fine flowers and mountain-ash berries, which stretched across the road; Glenbervie had a laurel arch; Sir Gilbert Stirling's gate was ornamented with an arch of laurels and a large flag; Larbert, a handsome laurel arch; at Camelon, three arches; Falkirk, at the west end, a motto, "Welcome to Falkirk," decorated with flowers, heather, and evergreens; at the east and north, "God save the Queen and Prince Albert," surmounted by V. R., handsomely done up in flowers, the whole decorated by evergreens. Here her Majesty was received by two companies of the 66th Foot, which came from Glasgow by the railway in the afternoon. This being Falkirk Tryst, the Sheriff of the county issued orders that no sheep or cattle should be lifted from or to the New Market between the hours of twelve o'clock an arrangement wisely made to prevent confusion and interruption to the royal party, and calculated to avoid danger to all.

For several days after her Majesty's route became known, the whole community of Falkirk, and other places along the line of road, were occupied night and day in making such preparations as might be deemed most respectful and gratifying to the royal party. Constables were appointed in large numbers to preserve order; the tenantry of the county were arranged in bodies to accompany the royal cortege, or to act as mounted patrol on the occasion; public meetings were held to devise fit decorations for the adornment of the line of march; and all has been carried into effect in a manner not less gratifying to the Queen and the royal party, than agreeable to those who had the pleasure of witnessing them. From an early hour on Tuesday morning, the whole population of Falkirk were on tiptoe, eagerly looking out from every part whence a view of the approach of the royal party could be obtained; and as the hour of her Majesty's arrival was uncertain, on the appearance of each successive party of horsemen, "the cry was still they come." About half-past one, a ridette of mounted men galloped hastily through the town, causing every heart to beat with expectation; and, in a few minutes more, the first of the advanced guard of cavalry were seen trotting sharply up, and followed at military distance by the remainder of the royal escort, in immediate advance of the royal carriage. On entering the town the pace was slackened; and as the Queen and the Prince passed slowly through the long street in their open carriage, all eyes were gratified by a view of the youthful royal pair; and when her Majesty observed every window and door tastefully decorated with flowers, and called the attention of the Prince to the circumstance, and to the triumphal arches thrown across the street, and to the hundred banners floating in the air, it was not surprising that she cast a gratified eye on the tens of thousands assembled to behold her, nor that she replied with gracious bows and condescending smiles to acclamations which responded from the classic Torwood to Graham's Dyke. The crowd here was greatly augmented by large numbers who had come from every district in the west early in the morning by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway.

At Carbrook, her Majesty was met by the tenantry of Lord Dunmore, headed by Mr. Salmon, his lordship's factor, who escorted her on horseback to Callender. This body, we understand, afterwards dined together in the Blue Bell Inn, Falkirk.

Passing through Falkirk, the royal party wheeled suddenly to the right about half a mile east of the town, and entered the grounds of Callender, the princely seat of Mr. Forbes, the member for the county. The party was followed by nearly the whole tenantry of the west and middle districts of Stirlingshire, on horseback. The number of mounted men must at this time have been at least 500; while the pedestrians scampering through every part of the ground to get in advance of her Majesty, formed altogether a most picturesque and enlivening spectacle. A part of the 53rd was here drawn up, and presented arms on the arrival of the Queen, who entered into conversation with her host and several other gentlemen during the four minutes the carriages were drawn up for the purpose of changing horses. Her Majesty entered at the west gate, and came out at the east gate, near Lauriston toll-bar. It was now precisely two o'clock, and the royal party again set off at a rapid pace. Multitudes of persons were assembled at every part of the road; and at Polmont, where a triumphal arch was thrown across the road, the Earl of Zetland's tenants, ninety in number, decorated with favours, were drawn up on the road, and instantly wheeling into the rear, formed no inconsiderable addition to the immense multitude, every moment augmented by crowds issuing from the cross-roads with which the country is intersected. POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XII.

SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT, M.P.

The journalist who selects, as an attractive feature of public interest, a series of political subjects to discuss upon his page, has seldom the satisfaction of encountering in any public character a man of irreproachable life, commanding talents, and untarnished reputation; who, amid the storms of party warfare, has drawn upon himself none of the invective of the conflict, but has, on the other hand, maintained serene possession of the respect, the regard, and admiration of all interests alike. Yet such a man is Sir William Follett, the present Solicitor-General. Though very eminent, and also very young, he has risen to his position under the universal approval of society, and almost without one shaft of envy from its poisoned quiver. With gentle manners, much learning, a sedate mind, and a reflective disposition, he has taken his stand as a lawyer, a gentleman, and a politician on ground that cannot be shaken under him, and in a position from which he cannot be induced to swerve. He is at the bar one of the most powerful and impressive of advocates; in the legislature one of the most respected and persuasive of orators; in the social circle one of the most winning and amiable companions of life. The only drawback he has felt to an almost undeviating career of distinction has been a delicacy of constitution, which has rendered him frequently subject to ill-health; but this, we hope, will cease entirely to impair his physical strength, and then we may safely predict the future crowning of his moral energies with the Lord Chancellorship of England. If life is spared he will gain this goal

We introduce a brief sketch of his career, premising that he is the son of Captain Follett, once of the 15th Regiment, by the only daughter of John Webb, Esq., of Kinsale, so that he is of Irish extraction by the mother's side. He was born in 1798.

In the year 1815 he entered of Trinity College, Cambridge; and in 1818 took his degree of Bachelor of Arts. His Master's degree he did not take until 1832.

In Michaelmas term, 1814, he entered as a member of the Inner Temple, and in the year 1821 he commenced practice as a special pleader under the bar; but in 1824, severe illness obliged him to leave London, and he was unable to resume the duties of his profession until the summer of 1825, when he joined the Western Circuit, having, however, been called to the bar in Trinity term 1824.

Sir William Follett's rise in his profession has been unusually rapid, he having obtained the rank of Solicitor-General within ten years from his first joining his circuit. The first occasion on which he particularly distinguished himself, and attracted the notice of the profession and the public, was on the argument of a demurrer in an action for an assault brought by a reporter of the press against a Coroner—for the purpose of raising and deciding the question whether a Coroner's was an open court, or whether he had a right to exclude the public. Sir William Follett was counsel for the Coroner, and was opposed to Mr. Baron Parke, then in the height of his practice and reputation.

In this cause Sir William Follett was successful, and other opportunities having soon offered of again displaying his ability and great legal attainments, he rapidly acquired a very extensive practice in the courts of law, and became also much sought after in committees of the House of Commons, where he probably acquired the tone and manner of Parliamentary debate, and prepared the way for the flattering reception with which he was greeted when he became a member of the House.

Sir William Follett was not in Parliament before the passing of the Reform Bill, although it is known that several seats were offered and pressed upon him. On the dissolution immediately following this measure, he complied with a requisition from an influential body of the inhabitants of Exeter, and contested that city with Mr. Buller and Mr. Divett. In this contest the Conservatives were unsuccessful, but were returned afterwards at the general election of 1834. A few days afterwards he was appointed Solicitor-General, and William IV. knighted him on presentation.

During the Whig decade he remained in opposition, but is now Solicitor General once more, and daily acquiring fresh distinction either in Parliament or court. He recently made a most dazzling and eloquent defence for the Sunday Times, in the action brought against it by Colonel Greville for a "horse-race libel," which, for power, argument, and ingenuity, we are told exceeded anything that has been heard within the court for many a long day.

Sir William Follett has already acquired a high rank among the most accomplished parliamentary orators of the day. His style of speaking is eminently calculated to win and retain the attention of a popular assembly. His mind is vigorous, yet strictly disciplined. His arguments are always well connected and judiciously arranged; and the general construction of his addresses is peculiarly correct and finished. His language is, at the same time, nervous and forcible, fluent and elegant. It is also wholly free from redundant figure and ornament. His delivery is manly, frank, and impressive. His voice, too, is clear and melodious, and its intonations strikingly attest his perfect sincerity and good faith.

In October 1830, Sir William Follett married Miss Giffard, the eldest daughter of the late Sir Harding Giffard, Chief Justice of Ceylon, by whom he has two daughters.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

MADAME CELESTE.

Before you, gentle reader, you have "the presentment" of that far-famed and accomplished artiste, Mademoiselle Celeste, in her piquante and saucy character of Margot in the "Pretty Girls of Stilberg," which she renders peculiarly attractive by her naive acting and her exceedingly pretty and correct costume. Indeed, in all she does, her attention to costume and her devotion to her art is worthy the imitation of her less fortunate brother and sister professors. She is perhaps the most generally popular favourite that ever appeared in our United Kingdoms; and in the United States she is absolutely idolized. To the latter country she more immediately appertains, having married an American of the name of Elliot; and whose recent death is the cause of her sudden return, by the Great Western, to look after considerable property she had realized by her sole exertions, amounting at one time to something like 150,000 dollars, and to bring over to this country her only child, a daughter, for the better finishing of her education. She was originally a pupil of the Academie Royale of Paris; and by perseverance and industry, backed by that necessary ingredient genius, has raised herself up to her present elevated position. Whether as an actress, a pantomimist, or a danseuse, she is equally excellent; witness her dashing touches of true comedy as St. Louis in "Foreign Affairs," and her pathos as Marie in "Marie Dorange," her mute eloquence as Maurice in "The Child of the Wreck," or her graceful movements in "St. Mary's Eve" and "The World of Dreams." We wish her safe passage to the other side of the Atlantic and a speedy return; successful she is sure to be as far as the public go. She numbers many genuine friends both here and there; her private worth, amiable manners, and irreproachable character, entitling her to the respect and admiration of all.

TOP OF THE MONUMENT.

We last week gave a view of the Monument in Fish-street-hill, built to commemorate the great fire of London. At the especial request of many of our subscribers, we this week give a view of the top of it, on a more enlarged scale, by which its structure and peculiarities may be more particularly observed.

FLORICULTURE.

THE ADONIS FLOWER, OR PHEASANT'S EYE.

(Adonis autumnalis.)

Though less familiarly known than the flowers already described in our pages, the pheasant's eye is not less beautiful or less deserving of notice. To those who are privileged to leave the crowded suburbs of the metropolis at this season of the year, and wander at their leisure through the picturesque scenery of our western counties, it may have happened (as was the case with the writer of this notice) that the attention has been suddenly arrested by what seemed a gem among the flowers, so deep, so ruby-like in its tints, and these so much enhanced in brilliancy by the charming vesture of minutely-divided bright green leaves by which it was surrounded. Who but those that have made the study of plants their recreation and delight, can understand the pleasure which is experienced on such a discovery as that to which we have just alluded. To behold for the first time so lovely a specimen of the simple grace and beauty which adorn our country's wild flowers as that presented by the adonis, or pheasant's eye, is, to the admirer and collector of plants, a source of real delight. The circumstances attending the discovery become inseparably connected in his mind with the flower himself; and in turning over the leaves of his herbarium he has a little history to read in every page; a "language of flowers," not fanciful, ridiculous, and offensive to his taste; but appealing in all its truth and reality to the better feelings of his nature, bringing back the memory of those who shared in his country rambles, and calling up the very words, and looks, and scenes, endeared by the ties of friendship, or hallowed by the love of home.

The pheasant's eye belongs to a very extensive tribe of plants, distributed throughout the temperate regions of the globe, but most abundant in moist climates. This is the ranunculus, or crow-foot tribe, of which the common yellow varieties give the golden hue to our pastures in the spring season, and are generally known as butter-cups. But the pheasant's eye is not so easily recognised by its likeness to these, as by the resemblance it bears to another group of plants in the same tribe, i. e. the anemones. Though considerably smaller than even the lesser species of anemone, the form of the blossom, and the richness of its colour, together with the multiplied divisions of the leaves, remind us of the dark-coloured varieties of that flower. The pheasant's eye generally attains rather more than a foot in height, and opens its blossoms earlier or later in the season, according as it is exposed to, or sheltered from, the direct influence of the sun. Corn-fields may be considered as the usual habitat of this plant; and there the deep red colour of the blossoms causes them to be easily perceived, especially when the corn is in its green state. A specimen of this plant now lying before us was gathered, or rather plucked up by the roots (for we prefer the whole plant for botanical purposes), in the commencement of June 1841, and we do not perceive that the ruby cup has lost aught of its brilliancy, though the light and elegant leaflets have exchanged their emerald for a topaz hue. The pheasant's eye is not so common in England as in many parts of the continent; but it is rather abundant on the banks of the Medway, in Kent, and may be found partially distributed in several other counties. It seems to have been first deemed worthy of cultivation in gardens during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Gerarde, the quaint, but generally accurate historian of English plants, writing in 1597, says that he brought the seed from the west of England, where it was growing wild among the corn, and sowed it in his garden on account of "the beautie of the flowres." Speaking of the plants of the ranunculus tribe generally, he fails not to notice their acrid properties, and says, that "all and every of them do blister and cause paine wheresoever they be applied, and pain doth draw unto itself more pain." This is quite true of the tribe in general, and more particularly so as it regards some of the species, which are irritating and highly poisonous in their qualities. The garden spoken of by Gerarde, in which he raised the pheasant's eye from seed, was situate in Holborn, which was in his day considered as forming part of the suburbs of London. The common names of the adonis at that time were "red chamomile" and "rose a rubie."

The fable connected with this flower is, that it sprang from the blood of Adonis when he was wounded by the boar; and hence it received its Latin name. The English appellation of pheasant's eye is derived from a supposed resemblance between its dark-red petals disposed around a black centre, and the eye of that beautiful bird.

This plant might be introduced more frequently into gardens with advantage. It is fully worthy of a place there, and has the recommendation of being easily raised, in almost any soil, and of accommodating itself to every situation. It has even been found to thrive in shrubberies, under the drip of trees, though in such situations, as it might be expected, the flowers are not produced until late in the season. Young plants raised from seed soon become bushy, and require to be thinned out, until only three or four plants are left in one spot. The seed may be sown early or late, according to the time the plants are required to be in blossom; but the natural period of blossoming in this flower is in June, July, and August. Plants raised from seed late in the year stand the winter well.

This plant was formerly held in some estimation on account of its medicinal qualities. The seeds were bruised and given in wine; and an infusion of the whole herb was deemed beneficial as a sudorific. But the preparations of the Adonis, together with many other ancient supposed remedies for disease, have been superseded, in modern practice, by more effective agents; and we are not aware that the name of the plant has been admitted in any of the recent pharmacopœias.

To see the pheasant's eye in perfection, we must seek it in its native fields, where it enjoys a proud pre-eminence over the less richly clad blossoms in its vicinity, and where even the scarlet poppy, though so greatly superior in size, will not bear a comparison with it as to beauty of colour. It appears to less advantage in a garden (though, as we have said, it is quite deserving of a place there); and it is not, if bruised, an agreeable addition to a bouquet, on account of the acrid quality already alluded to. This reminds us of an admirable comparison by the poet Cowper:

"Man in society is like a flower
Blown in its native bed: 'tis there alone
He both expands in full bloom.
So we, it, are only reach their proper use,
But more associated and combined with man
By real warrant, or self-pro ned by bond
For interest sake, or swarm ... into clans
Beneath one head for purposes of war,
Like flowers selected from the rest, and bound
And bundled close to fill some crowded vase,
Fetch rapid ... and, by compression marr'd,
Contracts dem... not to be endured."

ROYAL BOTANIC SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The annual meeting of this society having been fixed by the charter of incorporation at this season of the year, there were but few members present upon the occasion at the gardens on Tuesday morning. The report of the council for the past year showed that there had been a large accession of members, and that a very considerable sum had been expended upon the gardens, which are laid out with great judgment, the several parts to suit the objects of the society, and the whole forming an excellent specimen of landscape gardening. The Duke of Norfolk was re-elected President of the Society. Specimens grown in the gardens of various kinds of grass and other plants, lately introduced from New Holland and elsewhere for agricultural purposes, were exhibited at the meeting.

A single out-door vine, belonging to Mr. Candy, of Truro, is now loaded with 875 fine bunches of grapes, and, at a low average, there will be depending from its branches, when the fruit comes to maturity, the enormous weight of nearly nine cwt. of grapes.

Wild fruit of all kinds was never more abundant than during the present season—bramble-berries, sloes, hazel-nuts, blackberries, walnuts, hips and haws. The mountain-ashes, everywhere are beautiful to behold, covered as they are unprecedently with a profusion of fruit, so far as our recollection can penetrate. The crop of mushrooms has also been great in situations favourable to fungus culture; and but rarely has ketchup been sold cheaper or of better quality.—Dumfries Courier.

LITERATURE.

COMIC NURSERY TALES, by F. W. N. BAYLEY, Author of "The New Tale of a Tub." No. II. LITTLE RED RIDING HOOD. London, 1842: Orr and Co.

We have here, by favour of the publishers, the proof sheets of the second number of Mr. Bayley's "Nursery Tales," and, to judge by the long interval which the author has allowed to elapse since his production of the first, we are afraid to pay any distinguished compliment to his punctuality. His verses nevertheless have the dash-off air of rapidity about them, and now that the book is come it makes, like its predecessor, a very presentable appearance. For this it is in a great measure indebted to the admirable designs of Pinwell, one of the pencil-kings of the Paris Charivari, who has given a most picturesque air to his designs, and invested his heroine, in spite of touches of comedy, with all the artless and genuine simplicity which she wears so gracefully in the English nursery tale. "Little Red Riding Hood" is here painted with all the poetry of childhood about her; and we suspect that this has tended here and there to seduce the muse of Mr. Bayley away from drollery, and to throw in touches of nature in accordance with the characteristics of the artist's style. The result is the production of an ensemble neither so broad nor so burlesque as "Blue Beard" (though still here and there preserving outlines of caricature), but not less attractive on account of its simplicity, and perhaps even more tempting to the eyes and hearts of children. Now and then, of course, the fun runs riot, for it would never do to despoil youth of its laugh; but upon the whole, the narrative descriptive prevails over the ludicrous. We shall however allow plates and poem to speak on their own behalf. Here is the heroine being sent upon her journey.

"Then spoke mamma
With a look serious, sir,
And 'Little Red Riding Hood, dear, my dear,
I have something for you: bleached grandmother here,—
It's a pot of fresh butter as ever was seen,
And that you'll carry a-top of your head—
It's a cake—the sweetest that ever she kneaded,
And that you'll put 'neath the fresh butter pot;
And last of all, if you mean to be good,
You'll cover your scones with your red little hood.

"You'll go,
I know,
And not very slow,
By the dingy wood where the tall trees grow,
And the dark-green water whose rivulets flow
Where no pretty wood-nymphs shall ever be seen
But you'll not be afraid,
For an intrepid maid
Has little to trouble at, whether or no;
And when you get to your grandmother's door,—
Who is easily found,
For she lives on the ground-
Floor,
You'll go quietly in; for no noise you must make,
But put down your butter, and put down your cake,
And say,—'Grandmother, mother sent these for your sake.'"

Then, curtseying sweetly,
As I told ye,
As you would to a beau, whom you wanted to marry you.
You'd take care to tuck,
And come sudden-y back,
As fast as your dear little legs, love, will carry you.'
"The pretty child,
With her ringlets wild—
And her eyes of blue, that were always so mild;—
Mouth, the sweetest that ever so called
And a heart more free,
In its artlessness,
Than man's ... opposition out of revelry.—
To do ... thy duty
Was ... her natural story,
That was sung to the wise words, as fell to the throng,
In a tone that seemed to ... ve of love,
When the wings of the angels were waiting above.

"It was no disaster
To hear Madame Pasta,
It isn't so easy
To outdo Catalani;
Rafanelli charms men, or
I don't know his tenor;
And Malibran's Lullaby
Doesn't sung 'Canzone amorose!'
Which I vow, as I'm a bachelor, he doesn't know how To astonish the natives, and chant like a crow!
Even Adelaide Kemble,
Now Countess Sartoris,
May her voice not dissemble,
Unless her throat sore is;
But sing to her best
To the ears of the blest,
I doubt whether she, in the height of her glory,
Or any of those who before her I've named,
Could sing like the beauty of my pleasant story,
Or be half so gentle, or half so far famed;
In a sentence I could,
Most, might, can will, and would,
Declare that they none of them e'er were so good
As my fair little,
Rare little,
Red Riding Hood!

Suppose we now bring her to the point—

Where a wolf, whose jaws
Cleared the forest chasms,
Came after her lamp,
With all ... ire and kisses!
Yes! a wolf, who so short
Frightens her, that she says
He is, to make out,
The great test of his species.

When Wolf has finished his confab, and is off after the grandmother, "Little Red Riding Hood" loiters by the way,—

Pretty maid! she idly fingers,
As young thoughtless children will,
By the wood-wild path of flowers,
Through the valley, o'er the hill;
Now a little playful trifler
Of some carol-music fragment—
Now a sport and laughing whisper
Of some gaudy, happy thought.
Careless of her very errand,
Free and fear of all long far,
With the dauntless heart of childhood,
Playing with her cake and jar
Look! they are in the careful keeping,
Now to throw them up and all,
To, or are falling, as Lord love her!
She would never let them fall!
Her blythe spirit—who it control it?
Who would dim its joy with wrath!
Ha! the cake is round, and rolls it
Like a hoop upon the path.

There! the clangful creature flies!
Cake and jar are both laid by,
And a warring top is spinning
Underneath her merry eye.
Chasing every sportive vision
That before her fancy stirs,
What world-heart is so Elysian
In its happiness as hers!

Stay! a cloud comes o'er her spirit
One grey little tiny cloud
First, with just a feather's trifle,
Not more roughly, nor more loud,
Moves—yet to staid reflection—
Of her gleeful heart to-day,
Hinders,—Why has galamelon loitering—
What a careless child am I

Soon no more of playful frolic—
Old-thought looks does she sip,
But with sweet demureness wonder,
And a gravely pointed lip.
She re-finds the path she scattered;
Pauses there to ponder fain,
Like a butterfly back flitted,
Resting on its rose again.

Thought and breath they come together,
She hath scattered all her woes
In one moment, and now fresh
Sin ling on her way she goes.
Her young steps have made the journey,
Skipping on more fast than far,
And she gains as her Granny's cottage
Safely with her cake and jar.

The remorse of the wolf, after he has swallowed the grandmother is sufficiently touching:—

But now his sin
Soon worked within,
Remorse did make him weep:
With sorrow and with supper crammed,
His head between the sheets he rammed,
And then he fell asleep.
He fell asleep, but soon did dream:
His tears they poured out in a stream,—
His groan out in a snore,—
And, as digesting grows more hard,
A thousand horrors and regrets
Beset his mental powers.

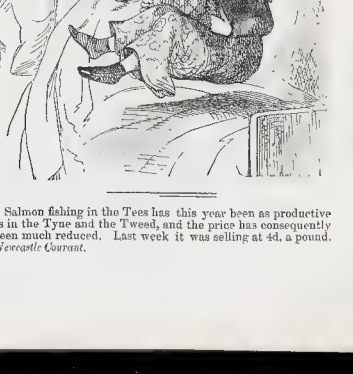
Greatly his vision did extend,—
He saw grandmothers without end,
Whose moans did daunt and dismay him;
To all repenting of his sup,
He almost wished he could bring up
The one he had within him.
As he dreamt on; oh, well-a-day!
One supper on his conscience lay
More heavy than ten dinners.
He leapt and barked, and howled,
He suffered pangs, and no relief,
So ever may grandmothers ea
The wolf inside of sinners.

When he wakes, and his pretty little follower is admitted,

She didn't sit upon a chair,
Because she didn't see one there,—
She saw it was all ... ated,
There was ... she won't make,
She didn't like any such seat,
She trotted at once to where
There was one, upstairs ... ted,
We don't know why he began to dwell
Within the text,—and now if you discern it, you're
A clever person:—to this touch
That, Wolf's great appetite was such,
Not to ... Grandmother and child,
He ate—I CALL THE FAIRIES!

So the pretty mother, when all's done and said,
And I tell it to Ruby Hood, sat on the bed:
And was very soon puzzled to know, because,
What kind of a grandmother she'd got there!

All the rest of the story, up to its appalling climax, is told with due regard to decorum; and now we leave author and artist in the hands of the reader. The work is beautifully printed in three tints, and got up with much taste and elegance. It is indeed a cheap half-a-crown's worth for the juveniles. We are informed that the "Sleeping Beauty" is in the press.



Salmon fishing in the Tees has this year been as productive as in the Tyne and the Tweed, and the price has consequently been much reduced. Last week it was selling at 4d. a pound. Newcastle Courant.

Dalkeith it was a complete holiday, the whole of the shops being closed, and business completely suspended. The road also, for a great distance, was crowded with spectators anxious to have a passing view of her Majesty, and the regular escort was followed by a great number of the yeomanry of the county on horseback. In the evening the church steeple was illuminated at each corner by large oval-shaped gas lights; and over the shop of Mr. Haig, plumber, were a "V" and an "A," with a star in gas, which had a very brilliant and beautiful effect.

The following were the dinner party at the Palace in the evening:—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, the Duchess of Norfolk, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Aberdeen, Sir Robert Peel, the Earl and Countess of Cawdor and Lady Mary Campbell, the Earl of Hardwicke, General Wemyss, Colonel Bouverie, Lord and Lady John Scott, Lord and Lady Emlyn, Sir James Clark, Hon. Miss Paget, Captain Warren, Lieutenant Fenton and Lieutenant Atkins, of the 53rd; Captain Barber and Captain Ingram, commanding the escort of Dragoons; Lord Frederick and Lady Augusta Fitzclarence.

WEDNESDAY. The Queen and Prince Albert walked out in the grounds of Dalkeith Palace, altogether unattended, and remained for some time. About half-past two o'clock, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, Bailie Richardson, and Sir William Dyradale, Treasurer of the city, arrived at the Palace in the carriages of the Lord Provost and Sir William Drysdale, for the purpose of presenting his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Sir Robert Peel, his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch, and the Earl of Aberdeen, with the freedom of the city, which had been voted at former meetings of the Town Council. The addresses were beautifully written on vellum by Mr. Forrester, lithographer, St. Andrew-square, and were in every respect a model of caligraphy. That to his Royal Highness, the principal words of which were inscribed in gold, and that to the Duke of Buccleuch, were perhaps the most tasteful; but all four were exquisite, and unequalled, we should suppose, specimens of penmanship. The cases were manufactured by Mr. Williams, case-maker, North Bridge. That enclosing the burgess ticket to the Prince was made of crimson velvet, lined with orange silk (the city colours), and had the arms of the city exquisitely chased in gold on the top of the case.

The preamble to the burgess tickets was the same in each. That to his Royal Highness ran as follows:—

"At Edinburgh, the third day of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, on which day the Right Honourable Sir James Forrest of Comiston, Bart., Lord Provost; John Richardson, David Jugurtha Thomson, William Johnston, and Andrew Wilkie, Esquires, Bailies; John Ramsay, Esq., Dean of Guild; Sir William Drysdale of Pittenchar, Knight, Treasurer; and the other Members of the Town Council, in Council assembled, admitted and received, and do hereby admit and receive his Royal Highness Prince Albert, &c. &c. &c., the Consort of her Most Gracious Majesty, in testimony of the respect entertained by the Magistrates and Council for the public and private virtues by which his Royal Highness adorns his exalted station."

The presentations to the three Cabinet Ministers contained, as we have said, the same preamble, but were dated on the 6th September. That to Sir Robert Peel bore to be "in testimony of their sense of the distinguished talents which have raised him to so high a station as that of Prime Minister of the Crown, and of the manner in which, in that capacity, he has discharged his duty to the Sovereign, on occasion of her first visit to this metropolis."

The ticket of presentation to his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch bore to be "in testimony of the sense entertained by them of the virtues which adorn his high rank—the patriotic improvements he has accomplished and the manner in which his Grace has discharged the duty of host of her Majesty the Queen, on her first visit to this metropolis."

That to the Earl of Aberdeen bore to be "as a mark of their approbation of the manner in which his Lordship has discharged his important duties while in attendance, as one of the Principal Secretaries of State, on her Majesty during her first visit to the metropolis of Scotland."

The deputation, on their arrival, were first introduced to his Royal Highness, and the splendid case, containing the freedom of the city, was handed to him by the Lord Provost; on which his Royal Highness, in a few well-chosen expressions, expressed his deep sense of the honour which was done him by this mark of respect from the Magistrates and Town Council of the city.

The deputation were then introduced to the Cabinet Ministers; and the Lord Provost presented each of them with their respective tickets, accompanied with some appropriate remarks.

Sir Robert Peel, in returning thanks for the honour done him, remarked that he had now had the honour and the gratification of accompanying two British Sovereigns to the Scottish metropolis. On the first occasion he was comparatively new to public life; but he should never forget the kindness he had even at that period received. Since then, many changes had occurred, and he was glad to observe that the city had experienced many improvements. He had recently been honoured by his Sovereign with the direction of her councils; and if anything could add to that honour, it was that, on returning to Edinburgh in her service after an absence of twenty years, the magistrates had honoured him with the freedom of the city. This was a mark of respect for which he felt deeply grateful; and whatever might be the course of his after life, he should never cease to feel proud of being enrolled a citizen of Edinburgh.

The Duke of Buccleuch and the Earl of Aberdeen also briefly expressed their thanks for the honour conferred upon them.

The deputation then bowed and withdrew.

Soon after, the Rev. Principal Lee was introduced to his Royal Highness, and presented him with the diploma of LL.D., in a case elegantly ornamented, which had been conferred on him at a full meeting of the Senatus Academicus, on Saturday week, when his Royal Highness visited the College. The diploma was graciously received by his Royal Highness, who expressed his deep sense of the honour thus conferred upon him.

Between three and four o'clock, her Majesty, Prince Albert, and their suite, visited Roslin, and viewed the chapel and grounds. Her Majesty appeared to be much gratified with this interesting monument of ancient taste, and with the beautiful finish and fine preservation in which the workmanship still remains.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Duchess of Buccleuch and Colonel Bouverie, drove round by Loanhead and Lasswade to Hawthornden, the seat of Sir Francis Walker Drummond, Bart., which having reached about five o'clock, the royal visitors entered the remains of the old Castle, where they had a view of the romantic glen towards the north. They then proceeded to examine several of the ancient relics which remain in possession of the family; namely, the old table which belonged to Robert III., who married one of the family of Drummond, and the sword of King Robert the Bruce. Her Majesty remained some time at the poet's seat, at that part of the Castle commanding a view of the splendid scenery of the glen below, which excited her admiration, and she expressed herself highly delighted with this fine specimen of natural beauty. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness were also much interested at viewing the celebrated plane tree, under which the poet Drummond and Ben Jonson met 250 years ago. The caves that are cut out of the solid rock below the castle, the ancient retreats in cases of need of those who lived in those disorderly times, were viewed with equal marks of interest. Though no intimation was given of her Majesty's intention to view this romantic spot, yet such is the deep and general interest which her presence has excited, that, from a report that a visit was intended to Hawthornden, a numerous concourse of people had assembled, consisting of the tenants and villagers in the neighbourhood, to whom the grounds were liberally thrown open; and her Majesty slept into her carriage and drove off, amid the enthusiastic cheers, of the assembled throng. In absence of Sir Francis and Lady Drummond, who were unfortunately from home, her Majesty and his Royal Highness were conducted over the Castle and grounds by Mr. Henderson, chamberlain to Sir F. Drummond, Bart.

At the dinner party last night covers were laid for twenty-seven. Among those present, in addition to her Majesty and her Royal Consort, and their noble host and hostess, there were the Duchess of Norfolk, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Aberdeen, Sir Robert Peel, the Earl and Countess of Cawdor, and Lady Mary Campbell, the Earl of Hardwicke, General Wemyss, Colonel Bouverie, Lord and Lady John Scott, Lord and Lady Emlyn, Sir James Clark, Hon. Miss Paget, &c. &c.

The following notice was issued by the Lord Provost and magistrates, in reference to the embarkation of her Majesty:—

"Council Chambers, Edinburgh,
Wednesday, 14th Sept., 5 o'clock, P.M.

"The Lord Provost and Magistrates have to announce to their fellow-citizens, that her Majesty intends to leave Dalkeith Palace to-morrow morning, at eight o'clock, and to enter the city by Nicholson-street, passing down to Granton Pier by the South and North Bridges, Prince's-street, Hanover-street, and Canon-mills-bridge.

"To prevent accidents, no persons will be permitted to stand on the North-bridge or Canon-mills-bridge until her Majesty has passed; and it is particularly requested that the carriageway along the whole route shall be kept perfectly clear."

Very judicious arrangements appear to be made by the magistrates, to prevent accidents from the rush of persons upon the line of the procession at the different points. In such cases the great danger arises from the lateral movement of a crowd down the cross streets, by which the line is broken, and order altogether interrupted. To prevent this, two barricades were erected across the High-street, and one above and one below the Tron Church, thus stemming the tide of population that would otherwise flow in both directions upon that point of the line between the South and North Bridges, and which might, if not prevented, throw the whole into inextricable confusion. For the same reason, another barricade has been erected at the foot of the Mound, between the Institution Buildings and East Prince's-street-gardens, thus turning to the westward the throng of persons that are sure to issue upon Prince's-street by that outlet. Another has been erected from the east side of the Register-office to the Duty-house, thus shutting out the crowd issuing from Leigh-street and the Regent-road. At Canon-mills again, another barricade has been erected from the south-east end of the bridge to the buildings opposite, stopping all egress from Broughton, Bonnington, &c., and bringing the whole multitude to arrange themselves quietly along the line down Pitt-street, Brandon-street, &c. In addition to this, parties of military, both cavalry and infantry, will patrol the North-bridge and Canon-mills-bridge, to prevent persons from standing upon either.

THURSDAY.—At the early hour of seven o'clock this morning, her Majesty and Prince Albert partook of breakfast in a room in the west wing of the palace, to which they were received in the marble hall by the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch and the other nobility assembled in the palace. Her Majesty entered into an animated conversation, expressing the great gratification she had experienced throughout the whole of her visit, and especially remarking upon the kind and very warm reception that had everywhere greeted her in her progress.

A few minutes after eight her Majesty took her departure from the palace, and was assisted into the carriage by the Duke of Buccleuch and the Earl of Liverpool. The Duchess of Buccleuch, who was specially requested to take her seat in the royal carriage, then followed, accompanied by Prince Albert. Immediately on the appearance of her Majesty the salute was given by a large detachment of the 53rd, drawn up in front of the palace, the band at the same time playing the national anthem. The royal party then proceeded along the carriage road, and left by the Queen's-gate, escorted by a party of the Enniskillen Dragoons. Another carriage followed, containing Lord and Lady Emlyn and some of her Majesty's suite. The Duke of Buccleuch, Lord John Scott, Mr. Anson, and other gentlemen accompanied the royal party on horseback. When her Majesty had finally quitted the park the royal standard was lowered on the palace.

A notice was published last night that it was her Majesty's intention to set off from Dalkeith at eight o'clock this morning and to sail from Granton Pier about nine; and at an early hour the whole intervening route—the windows, the roads, and every spot raised above the common level, was lined with crowds of spectators, anxious to catch a departing view of their Sovereign. It was fully as interesting a spectacle as was yet witnessed; and the fineness of the day, being one of the most delightful we have had, even in this remarkable season, gave peculiar splendour and interest to the whole scene.

In Edinburgh, along the whole line of her Majesty's progress, the streets presented a most pleasing and animated appearance. From Preston-street, along Clerk-street, St. Patrick square, Nicolson-street, the South-bridge, and down to the arches of the North-bridge, the streets were lined with anxious spectators; here and there, and wherever any spot presented a secure position for tables, or other articles that could in any way raise them above the level of the street, the masses were more dense, but in general the appearance was regular and orderly, while the windows, crowded with ladies in all shades of dress, presented a gay and animated prospect. As her Majesty approached, which she did at an easy pace, the cheering was most enthusiastic, and along her whole course, we might say, it was one continued acclamation. The castle commenced to fire a royal salute immediately on her advancing to the open part of the North-bridge.

Along Princes-street, Hanover-street, Dundas-street, and Pitt-street, every spot was in like manner occupied; and the enthusiastic acclamations of the assembled multitudes, and the waving of handkerchiefs, were begun the moment the approach of the royal train was descried. Her Majesty was seated in an open carriage, on the right hand of Prince Albert, and looked extremely well; the expression of her countenance was remarkably sweet and pleasing. She was dressed in a bonnet of pale pink, and a splendid tartan shawl.

In crossing George-street, a detachment of the Archers, under the command of Sir John Hope, were drawn up, and received her Majesty, who desired the carriage to stop, while she conversed for a few minutes with Sir John. She appeared to be in the highest spirits. From this point the cortege proceeded slowly down North Hanover-street and Pitt-street, on account of the immense pressure of the assembled multitude, which here seemed to be greater than at any other part of the line, owing to the blocking up of Cannon-mills-bridge, which forced back the crowd upon the centre. After all, the efforts of the dragoons to keep the bridge clear were ineffectual, the multitude burst through all restraint, and occupied the bridge in such a dense mass, that her Majesty, with humane consideration for the safety of the people, ordered the procession to halt for a short time till the road became gradually clear.

The grounds around Granton Pier were the great point of attraction, as from thence a fine view of the embarkation and departure of her Majesty could be seen; accordingly, before eight o'clock, many of the places were occupied by ladies and gentlemen, and crowds of people were hurrying towards it along all the roads, on foot, on horseback, and in every description of carriage. Some interruption, however, took place soon after eight o'clock, from a detachment of dragoons having been stationed at Canon-mills-bridge who allowed no carriages or passengers to pass, consequently the people were obliged to make the best of their way across the water of Leith by any outlet which they could discover, many scrambling up steep banks and over walls, at considerable risk to themselves, and no little damage to their clothes. A great number, however, got across in these ways, and continued to swell the multitudes around the pier; but few carriages followed, as they had to make a long circuit before they could get into the Granton road.

At nine o'clock, when the guns from the Castle announced her passage through the city, every one pressed forward to procure proper stances for viewing her Majesty, but, from the obstruction at Canon-mills-bridge, the number of people assembled was not so great as might have been anticipated. About twenty minutes past nine the royal cortege was seen advancing at a quick pace; her Majesty's carriage, surrounded by a detachment of Enniskillens, and followed by a great many gentlemen on horseback, a number of carriages, and an immense crowd of people, many running and keeping pace with the carriage. As her Majesty passed the densely crowded sloping bank overlooking Granton Pier she was received with the most enthusiastic cheers, and as the carriage proceeded along the pier the cheers were renewed with increased effect, and amid the firing of the artillery from the height on the shore.

The multitude that gathered round the embarkation was immense, and they exhibited a peculiarly striking and picturesque appearance, as, from the nature of the elevated ground which rises from the shore, they were marshalled in a sort of orderly array on the ridge of two terraces, in distinct ranks, with a crowd of irregulars on both sides; and the shout of this multitude when her Majesty embarked was heard from afar, and had a singularly fine effect.

The Trident, which was destined to the high honour of conveying her Majesty to London, was lying moored alongside of the outermost wharf on the eastern side of Granton Pier. Her fittings up were of the most superb description, and altogether worthy to receive the Queen of England. It is matter of proud boasting to the enterprising company to which this vessel belongs, that one of their ships has been selected for this high honour; and it shows the activity of the officers connected with it, that on so short a notice all things were made ready for her reception. Admiral Sir Edward Brace was in command, and Captain Bullock under him as chief pilot to her Majesty; Commander Crouch, admiral's secretary; Lieutenant Cauham, and Mr. Inglefield, as signal mate; Dr Greenish, R.N., surgeon, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence acts as Commodore of the squadron.

About eight o'clock, a body of the Royal Company of Archers, in full field uniform, appeared on the pier, and a detachment of the same body was left in Hanover-street, to receive her Majesty there, under the command of Sir John Hope. This body was under the command of Lord Elcho, in the unavoidable absence of his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch, who was in waiting on her Majesty; Major Pringle, Adjutant-General; and the other officers were, the Earl of Dalhousie, Sir John Hope, Sir John Stuart Forbes, and Sir George S. Mackenzie, of Coul. Claud Russell, Esq., accountant, and Alexander Thomson, Esq., of Whiterigg, were the standard-bearers. This fine body of men, whose picturesque uniform set off to great advantage the athletic forms of many of them, have been throughout her Majesty's visit in constant attendance whenever their services were required, and have uniformly shown a zeal and devotion in the service of her Majesty which must have been peculiarly gratifying to her.

About half past eight o'clock a guard of honour, composed of a detatchment of the 53rd Regiment, now in the Castle, marched down to the pier, when the archers also took up their position on each side of the platform, by which her Majesty was to enter the vessel. The guard of the 53rd lined the side of the wharf, and across part of the pier, thus forming, along with the Archers, three sides of a square, in the centre of which room was left for the royal cortége. The band of the Enniskillens was in attendance, and from time to time played several exquisite airs.

A few minutes before nine o'clock the boom of the Castle guns was heard, and was immediately answered from the Daphne and Jasseur sloops of war, then lying in the roads. This was the signal for bustle and commotion on the part of all those along the pier, and the most anxious expectation for her Majesty's coming. After some minutes' eager anticipation, the cheering of the assembled multitude along the works at Granton, and the running of those who, having seen the Queen at one point, were eager for another view, announced the near approach of the royal cortege; and soon after her Majesty, escorted by the dragoons, reached the pier, and rapidly drove down to the point of embarkation. She was received with deafening cheers: every scrap of bunting was run to the mast-head of every vessel in the harbour, the royal standard flying at the main-mast of the Trident: the yards were manned with seamen in their holiday attire, all combining to form a scene which, for animation and excitement, has rarely been equalled. The royal procession was preceded a few yards by his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch, who, dashing down the pier, sprung from his horse, threw the reins to a servant, and hat in hand, stood to receive her Majesty on her embarkation, as he had received her at her landing. Sir Neil Douglas was also at the platform. The archers and the military saluted her with military honours, the band playing "God save the Queen," and the yards of the steamer's foremast manned with the seamen. Her Majesty alighted from her carriage, and walked down the platform, leaning on the Duke of Buccleuch. Prince Albert gave his arm to the Duchess, who accompanied them in the carriage, and they proceeded through the line of the archers amidst cheers and waving of handkerchiefs to the vessel.

The Earls of Liverpool and Morton, and several of the royal suite followed. At the foot of the gangway stood Sir Edward Brace, with Captain Bullock and Commander Crouch on his right and left; and the other officers of the vessel were stationed on the larboard side of the deck. Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence received her Majesty and the Prince on board, and the admiral and his officers saluted her Majesty in the usual form, all which was graciously acknowledged. We also observed Sir Neil Douglas, Mr. Sheriff Speirs, Sir Philip Durham, and R. W. Hamilton, Esq., on deck. The cheering was now deafening, during which her Majesty stood conversing with Admiral Brace and those immediately around. The Queen and Prince Albert were then conducted into the saloon, and in a few minutes afterwards reappeared on deck, when her Majesty expressed herself highly gratified with the accommodation provided. The band of the Emiskillens, who struck up the national anthem on her Majesty's arrival at the pier, repeated it at this stage. Her Majesty then proceeded to take leave of her noble host and hostess, and other distinguished individuals, cordially shaking the Duke of Buccleuch by the hand, and affectionately saluting the Duchess, as also the Countess of Cawdor, Lady Mary Campbell, and Lady John Scott.

At exactly half-past nine o'clock, her Majesty ascended the poop, followed by Prince Albert, amidst renewed cheering, the band playing the national anthem. The Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, the Earl of Morton, Viscount and Lady Emlyn, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, the Earl and Countess of Cawdor, Lord and Lady John Scott, Sir Philip Durham and others, then came on shore. As the vessel was getting under weigh, her Majesty stood for some time on the quarter-deck, no one being immediately around her, and surveyed the scene with a most lively expression of countenance. Every one was delighted, and the whole spectacle was animating and imposing in the extreme. The Prince then piped her Majesty's eldest son to attention to the seaward prospect, and the admiral and his officers having taken their respective stations, the vessel got under weigh, and the royal pair coming close to the larboard quarter, and with singular earnestness acknowledging the parting greetings of the thousands on the pier and in the steamers and other vessels around, who lingered in their places watching the progress of the noble vessel as it advanced down the Frith.

The Trident, in passing the sloops of war and the royal yachts, was received by them with a royal salute. The Trident, as she moved down the Frith, took the lead of all the other vessels. Nothing could surpass the animating scene that was displayed. Crafts of every kind floating around, and flags and streamers waving in the breeze. The spectacle will long be remembered by the thousands who were present, and who united as with one heart and voice in wishing her Majesty a safe and happy voyage.

Woolwich Dockyard, Saturday, 12 P.M.—The scene here during the past night has been one of extraordinary excitement and interest. The general belief that her Majesty would arrive before day-break this morning, had the effect of keeping the whole of the garrison in a state of activity; and although the military authorities appear to have been as much taken by surprise at the unexpected change in the arrangements of her Majesty as the worthy ladies of Edinburgh were on a recent occasion, by the promptitude and decision of the Queen, no lack of zeal or attention has occurred, and the various posts of the attendant officers have been filled with an alacrity highly honourable to their military character and discipline. An intimation having been received from the Admiralty on Friday afternoon, to the effect that her Majesty would probably arrive at Woolwich by ten o'clock at night, the most careful arrangements that time would permit were made under the superintendence of Sir Francis Collier. The whole of the marines at present in garrison were marched into the dockyard at five o'clock in the evening, under the command of Colonel Parke, and two field batteries of four guns each were stationed on the upper and lower wharfs, under Major Anderson, of the Royal Horse Artillery. The troops remained drawn up in a line for a considerable period, but were afterwards allowed to file arms, and break off in small companies.

Nine of the royal carriages arrived before nine o'clock in the dockyard, and drew up on the grand parade, to wait her Majesty's arrival. Shortly after midnight Lord Bloomfield, Commanding Superintendent of the Royal Arsenal, the Earl of Haddington, and a number of staff officers, who had been in attendance for several hours, retired into the residence of Sir F. Collier at the dock-gates, but the gallant captain remained in the yard nearly the whole night. The military, who were, by necessity, greatly exhausted, were compelled to keep their posts, the whole garrison having been called out at five o'clock on Friday night. In every part of the yard soldiers might be seen extended on the ground, their knapsacks serving for a pillow, and the various officers on duty dismounted, and bivouacked in detached groups, the pale reflection of the moon contrasting the while with the glittering piles of arms and waving plumes of the Royal Horse Artillery. The General Steam Navigation Company's ship Princess Royal, which arrived from Scotland on Friday morning, came down about nine o'clock in the evening with a party of the directors on board. This vessel was beautifully illuminated, and presented an interesting sight from the dockyard parade, opposite to which she took up her station to await the arrival of her companion ship the Trident.

The company who had thronged the dockyard up to nine o'clock a.m., anxious of witnessing her Majesty's arrival, began to leave about this time; but the outer entrance and the London road were thronged during the whole night. The police arrangements were made by Mr. Superintendent Maleiieu, whose directions were well carried out by Inspectors Robinson and Feltham, with a body of 150 constables at their command.

Up to eight o'clock this morning, no intimation of her Majesty's arrival in the river had been received at Woolwich. The Monkey tug-boat had been stationed in Erith-reach last evening, to throw up rockets, should the Trident heave in sight during the night, and the anticipated signal this morning was the firing a gun from the same vessel. The appearance of the river at this time was extremely brilliant. The flag-ship William and Mary, decorated with a variety of streamers, occupied a prominent situation in the offing, and the gay liveries of the Admiralty bargemen, who had remained on their oars the whole night, the cutters of the harbour-masters, Captain Fisher and Lieutenant Stone, and a variety of attendant boats, contributed with the brightness of the sun, which now shone forth in meridian splendour, to produce a scene of the most beautiful description. The period of her Majesty's expected arrival being now long past, the greatest anxiety prevailed, and the parade was again crowded with an assemblage of elegantly dressed ladies and officers in full uniform.

At a few minutes past eight o'clock, Lord Jersey and Lord E. Bruce arrived at the dockyard in one of the royal carriages. The preparations for the morning were then announced, and the dock-gates carefully secured with guards, under the direction of Mr. O. Lang. Among the officers present were the Earl of Haddington, Sir W. Gage, Lord Jersey, Sir George Hoste, Brigade-Major Cuppage, Major Sandilands, Sir Hugh Ross, Major Strangways, &c.

The company upon the pier was numerous, and highly respectable. The public generally appear to have received admission to the west side; but as all the avenues between the two sides were closed, this caused no inconvenience to those whose duty it was to attend to the embarkation. Among the distinguished persons admitted to the east side of the pier were—the Lord Provost, the Lord Justice-Clerk, the Rev. Principal Lee, Lord Robert Ker, Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, Sir William Dyscale, Sir Neil Douglas and Staff, Sir George Gunn Monro, of Poyntzfield, the Provost of Leith, &c.

Precisely at nine o'clock the Rhadamanthus government steamer was observed rounding Ball-point, about two miles below Woolwich, and as it was known that she had left Granton shortly previous to the vessel destined to convey her Majesty to England, Lord Haddington and Sir W. Gage went off in the flag-ship barge to gain intelligence of the royal squadron. The result of these inquiries proved that the Rhadamanthus left Granton-pier at ten p.m. on Wednesday with the royal carriages. She was overtaken and passed off Cromer, on the Norfolk coast, last evening, about eight o'clock, by the Trident, with her Majesty and Prince Albert on board, the latter vessel having left Edinburgh on Thursday morning at ten a.m. The Rhadamanthus came up with the royal party about five o'clock in the morning, where it appeared the Trident had laid to. The Rhadamanthus was ordered to make all speed to Woolwich, and the report was that her Majesty would certainly arrive within half an hour. Scarcely had the noble lords returned to the dock-stairs, before the signal gun in Erith-reach gave notice that the royal party were at hand, and immediately after the towering masts of the noble vessel were seen making rapid way up the river.

The squadron consisted of the Black Eagle (government steamer); the Trident, one of the last and most beautiful boats belonging to the General Steam Navigation Company; the Monarch, also belonging to the same company, and the Trinity-house yacht. Each of the attendant vessels were gaily decorated with flags from stem to stern, and the royal standard waved from the mainmast of the Trident, which also carried the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Brace, K.C.B., who accompanied her Majesty from Scotland. Captain Bullock, of her Majesty's steamer Fearless, was also in charge of the vessel. The guns from one of the batteries had continued firing a salute in slow time as the squadron approached, and before ten o'clock the Trident was safely moored off the lower Water-gate. The Admiralty barge, with Sir Francis Collier at the helm, put off, and all was bustle and excitement in every direction. The Fame, Ramsgate boat, and the Eclipse, both crowded with passengers from London, lay to off the Trident for some time, and welcomed her Majesty by loud and continued cheers. The Mercury steamer was also in attendance, with a party from Gravesend. An accommodation ladder, covered with scarlet cloth, was now dropped from the bulwarks of the Trident, and the Admiralty barge pulled alongside.

At twenty minutes past ten o'clock the Prince stepped into the boat, and was immediately followed by her Majesty, who was assisted by Sir E. Brace and Captain Bullock. The yards of all the vessels in the offing, as well as those of the Trident, were immediately manned by their respective crews, and the debarkation of the royal party was a signal for a cheer of the most spirit-stirring nature, which must have clearly indicated, by its thrilling tones, the heartfelt gratulations of all at the safe return of the "Queen of the Isles."

On nearing the dock-stairs, Lord Jersey and the Earl of Haddington advanced to receive her Majesty, accompanied by Lord Bloomfield and several staff-officers. The Queen was attired in a beautiful silk tartan dress, with a shawl of the same material, and wore a white bonnet. Her Majesty, though apparently fatigued by the voyage, looked remarkably well. The Prince wore a black frock-coat and Tweed trowsers, with a figured silk waistcoat. The complexions of the royal pair were evidently tinged by the northern sun, but both of them looked much better than when Lord Woolwich threw eyes on since. The Prince shook hands heartily with the Earl of Haddington and Lord Bloomfield as they proceeded towards the royal carriage, and her Majesty acknowledged with the most marked condescension the loyal vociferations which resounded from the spectators on every side.

Before half-past ten, the royal party were on their way to Windsor, in an open baroueche, escorted by a detachment of Hussars.

Her Majesty has signified her approbation of the conduct of the authorities in the several places she visited in Scotland, as appears by the following communication to the Lord Advocate.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM THE EARL OF ABERDEEN TO THE LORD ADVOCATE OF SCOTLAND.

"My Lord, I have received the Queen's commands to signify her Majesty's most gracious approbation of all the arrangement made for her reception, and that of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, in Scotland. I am to request that your lordship will communicate to the sheriffs and magistracy of the different counties through which her Majesty has passed, the sense entertained of the judicious measures adopted by them for the preservation of order and regularity during the progress of her Majesty in this portion of her dominions.

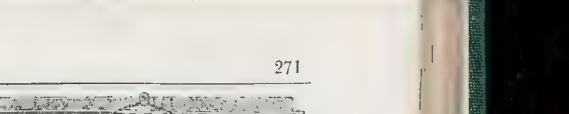
"The Queen will leave Scotland with a feeling of regret that her visit on the present occasion could not be further prolonged. Her Majesty fully expected to witness the loyalty and attachment of her Scottish subjects; but the devotion and enthusiasm evinced in every quarter and by all ranks have produced an impression on the mind of her Majesty which can never be effaced.

"I have the honour to be, &c. &c.
(Signed) "Aberdeen.

"Dalkeith, September 14, 1842.

Her Majesty an Annual Visitor to Scotland.—We are assured that her Majesty seriously contemplates making an annual visit to Scotland, not merely for personal gratification, but for the health of her children. Cragmillar Castle is to be rebuilt for her accommodation, if it cannot be repaired, and fitted up as a royal residence, in which her Majesty and family will pass some months every season. Mr. Little Gilmour, of Inch, whose property the Castle is, will be constituted keeper of this royal palace. Craigmillar may be said to be the centre of the residence of a large portion of the Scottish aristocracy—the Dukes of Buccleuch, Argyll, and Hamilton; Lords Abercorn, Dalhousie, Melville, Stair, Wemyss, Rosebery, Torphichen, Blantyre, Buchan, Cathcess, Elibank, Hopetoun, Haddington, Lauderdale, Lothian, Wharton, and Sinclair, have seats, or occasionally reside in the Lothians; and, if Fife is added, the names of Lord Rosslyn, Elgin, Leven and Melville, Glasgow, Moray, and Rothes, fall to be included among our resident nobility; and a great number of baronets and gentlemen of large property, live constantly in this vicinity.

The accuracy with which her Majesty's progress to and from the north was timed, has frequently been remarked upon; but when the number of horses employed, and individuals having charge of these animals are considered, it is truly surprising that only in one instance we believe (at Lnlithgow), and that only for a few minutes, did the slightest delay occur. There were no fewer than 656 post horses engaged in conveying her Majesty and suite to and from Taymouth. From Dalkeith to Scone 164, Scone to Taymouth 152, Taymouth to Drummond Castle 136, and Drummond Castle to Dalkeith 204—in all, 656 horses.



MANUFACTURE OF PALMYRA SUGAR IN MADRAS.

The Madras presidency has hitherto reaped but little benefit from its produce of sugar; but the time we believe is fast approaching when it will be much enriched from this hitherto neglected source. The tract of country around Ganjam is extremely well adapted for the production of sugar, and extensive preparations have for some time been in progress by a mercantile house at the presidency to establish works for the manufacture of this article. The late valuable discovery of a gentleman of Pondicherry, M. Cafferill, of an exceedingly cheap process for manufacturing excellent sugar from the Palmyra aggery, promises also to produce important results, since it will be the means of converting extensive tracts of barren land in the Carnatic into valuable Palmyra topes, capable of supporting an industrious community, and affording a profitable article of export. For this invention a patent has very properly been applied for to Government, to which we can conceive no objection to exist; such being the customary and appropriate mode of rewarding the inventions of ingenious men in Europe, and long practised with the best results in our own country. Our Government has, we believe, proceeded with a proper degree of caution and discrimination in this business; and we feel assured that its decision, while it affords a just and liberal reward to M. Cafferill, will neither prejudice existing interests, nor deprive the community of every reasonable present and prospective benefit from the discovery.

INDIAN BURIALS.

Many tribes of Indians bury their dead beneath the huts in which they die, and daily, for some time subsequent to the funeral, bring to the grave provisions, which are, of course, devoured by monkeys and wild dogs. As they believe that their deceased friend makes the grave his temporary abode, previous to taking his departure for the island of spirits, they tie a piece of twisted hide, or grass rope to the body, on laying it in the earth, and pull it occasionally, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the defunct be yet there. When the rope decays and easily comes away, they cease to mourn; believing their friend to be finally departed to enjoy a state of happiness, and again return to inhabit the hut, being no longer under any apprehensions of being haunted by his ghost.—Travels.

PROSPERITY OF CEYLON.

The island of Ceylon affords a pregnant illustration of the advantages to be derived from the settlement of Europeans. A few years ago there was scarcely an European planter in the island, now they amount to a considerable number, and every month brings an increase, and by late letters we observe that several of them are gentlemen from the West Indies who have sold or abandoned their interests there, and selected the "utmost Taprobane" as their future home. The increased value of coffee from Ceylon bears witness of the change this infusion of Western energy and enterprise has produced; and a correspondent informs us that two coffee plantations in the neighbourhood of Kandy "are this year yielding immense crops, although not five years old." Again, if we regard the effect on the natives produced by this settlement of Europeans—what is it, we would ask, but one of unmixed good, whether as it affects their physical or moral condition?—the value of their labour is enhanced, and a new field for exertion is opened to them, and the competition of successful industry in their European competitors cannot fail, in the end, to prove a strong incitement to imitate their example. In Ceylon the increased circulation of money caused by the settlement of planters in the interior is just so much added to the comforts of the people, and when they show that the export of treasure from Bombay alone to Ceylon—which has risen chiefly on account of new settlers—has increased from Rs. 36,05,300 in 1836-7, to Rups. 919,0[illegible], in [illegible], it may afford some idea of what that increased circulation must be.

ESTCOURT AND KNOLLER.

Secretary Craggs, when a young man, in company with some others, introduced his friend Dick Estcourt to Sir Godfrey Kneller, as a person who could give such a representation of many of his friends as would surprise him. Estcourt, on this, immediately began, and mimicked Lords Somers, Halifax, Godolphin, and others of his acquaintance, so very exactly, that the knight (though otherwise a grave character) was in convulsions of laughter. While all this was at other people's expense, it was very entertaining; but when Craggs gave him the wink, and he began upon Sir Godfrey himself, he instantly sprang from his chair in the greatest passion imaginable, exclaiming, "Nay, nay, there you are out young man, that's not me!"

CHILS' FESTIVALS OF THE TARTARS.

The birth-days of their lords are celebrated with great reverence among the Tartars. That of Kublai-khan, their great Emperor, is held yearly, on the 28th day of September, and is kept with greater solemnity than any other festival, except that of the new year, which is celebrated on the 1st day of February, when the Tartar year commences. On his birthday the great khan is clothed in a most splendid robe of cloth of gold, and about 2,000 of his barons and soldiers receive, on this occasion, silken garments of a golden colour, and girdles wrought in gold or silver, with each a pair of shoes. Some of those who are next to the khan in dignity, wear pearls and jewels of great value. The birthday of the great khan is celebrated by all the Tartars throughout his extensive dominions; and on this day all the kings, princes, governors, and nobles, who are subject to his authority, send presents to him in honour of the day, and in token of submission. On the 1st of February, which is the commencement of the Tartar year, the great khan, and all the Tartars, wherever they may happen to be at the time, observe a very solemn feast, and all of them, both men and women, are desirous, on that occasion, to be clothed in white garments, that fortune may be favourable to them the remainder of the year. On this occasion, the governors of provinces, and rulers of cities, and all who are in office or authority, send presents to the khan, of gold, silver, pearls, and precious stones, likewise of many white cloths of various kinds, and other white things, and many white horses. It is the custom of those who bring presents, if they can, to present nine times nine of every particular article, whether it be gold, or silver, or cloths, or horses; and on the occasion, the khan sometimes receives 100,000 horses. Those who serve the khan, or who sit at his table, have their mouths covered with silken veils, lest their breath should touch the meat or drink which he is to use. When he drinks, the damsel who carries the cup kneels down, and then all the barons and others present kneel likewise, and all the musicians sound their instruments, till the khan has done drinking.—Marco Polo's Travels.

MRS. JORDAN.

Those who remember how that delightful woman seemed made for every trusting enjoyment—how she could unite boisterous animal spirits with a tranquil sensibility—how she would come dancing on the stage at forty, a girl still, in spite of her fat—what a breakfast and music there was in her voice, and how the people loved it the moment they heard it—how she would wear a huge buxom pinafore, divide sobs of sorrow with the comforts of a great slice of bread-and-butter, anticipate a world of delight with rubbed hands and huddling shoulders—and with what a cramming of all the powers of conjoining into one little syllable she would utter the word "bed," while taking her guardian's cheeks in her hands, as though it sprang out of the fulness of her heart, and formed her lips into the very thing it spoke of—will sigh to think that circumstances rarely produce creatures made of such cordial human clay; or that anything could have made a life close in sorrow, which had given to others nothing but happiness.—Leigh Hunt.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, 30 August, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Would that I could teach your English belles to pay some little more attention to the fitness of things, by which I mean the adaptation of costume to the exigencies or circumstances of the season. In Paris each month has its fashion, varying according to climate, as each season has its fruit; and with us it would be thought as monstrous to wear a pelisse in summer, as with you to eat hot rolls at a June breakfast; yet have I always noticed, that in London the fashions are at least three months behind those of Paris, so that in autumn evenings your ladies shine in our summer muslins, and in winter you freeze in our autumn costumes. Let me hope that these letters of mine, and the illustrations which you weekly present to your fair readers, will reform this practice altogether, and, by affording the milliners of England an insight weekly into the fashions of Paris, tend more rapidly to reform the lagging modistes of your slow-paced fashionables. Look at the two costumes I send you—admire the perfection of the canezou in the one—the bonnet, the scarf, and the dress in the other; but I will give you milliner's description of them. The style of cap now worn is entirely different from any we have yet seen. It is composed of blond or lace, and arranged so as to form a single border in front, which is disposed in deep flutes far back on the head, and terminates in four rows of lace, very full, falling just below the ear. This cap is worn without lappets or strings, with a full-blown rose on the right side placed beneath the border, and smaller sprays of various flowers intermingled with the lace on each side. The canezou is novel, and the most elegant article of dress we have seen this season. It is made of lace, somewhat in the form of a spencer, with collar worn low in the neck, which ends in lappets, thrown back so as to show the front of the dress. The sleeve is very graceful, being formed of nine rows of lace, flowing like water in a cascade over each other till they reach the wrist, where they are left unconfined. The dress is composed of rich material of a brown colour, the body tight, the sleeves short, and the skirt very full, with three deep tucks put on. The bonnet of the other figure is of Italian straw, trimmed and lined with a deep shade of lilac; the ribbon on the outside is placed near the centre of the bonnet, over which is worn a veil of paler lilac hue; the inside of the brim is ornamented with brides of ribbon of the same colour as the veil. The dress is composed of material having a delicate shade of lilac and green intermixed. The corsage is made full, and confined by numerous bands, either of velvet ribbon richly embroidered, or of gymp, which entirely encases the body. The dress is worn with deep shoulder-straps, after the fashion of a corset, the sleeves are tight, and trimmed to correspond; the skirt full, and trimmed with robings made of a puffing, confined the same as the body, the scarf is of lace, edged on one side with a border of lace put on full, and mittens of velvet, with cord and tassels, complete the costume. JULIE.

In accordance with the wish of several correspondents, we give the Queen's visit complete in this Number: for engravings illustrative of the whole journey, see Nos. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1842.

We believe we may, without too much of egotistic presumption, point with no small satisfaction to the magnificent display of illustrations which open upon the reader in the centre pages of this week's LONDON NEWS. It is our first indication of the style in which we intend pictorially to record the visit of her Majesty to Scotland, and we trust that it will not be held as an unfavourable earnest of what may yet be expected from us in reference to that most propitious and interesting event. For the future we have provided, by securing to a distinguished artist a position near the immediate escort of our Sovereign during the whole progress of her journey, and the drawings of every circumstantial adventure will be given, we are sure, with spirit in the delineation and accuracy in the detail. For the present, we are content to let what is present speak. In other columns of our paper we have merely introduced the minor "incidents of travel," which befel with the first blush of the Queen's departure; but our opening pages present a brilliant array of illustration of a different order, and only prepatatory to the expensive realities that will follow. The device of the Throne-room at Holyrood, with, beneath it, a view of that fine old historical mansion which has so often given to royalty the shelter of a palace, and to subjects the refuge from a prison—all surmounted by the antient regalia of Scotland—affords, with its features of interest on the opposing page, a coup d'œil more imposing than modern art has ever before presented to the readers of a mere newspaper. The throne-room is represented such as it was on the occasion of the famous visit of George the Fourth to his Scotch dominions, the artist having made the only variation that is likely to transpire, by the introduction of her Majesty and Prince Albert, instead of the handsome though burly figure of the bygone King. The presentation scene is therefore given as it—by this period—has actually taken place.

On the other hand, the Highland clansman and piper are characteristic introductions; while in princely Dalkeith, the Duke of Buccleuch's home of regal hospitality; the old familiar face of modern Athens, with its glorious steep of crag; and the white-towered sunlit palace of Scone; we have the very localties of all the festivity that is to stir the heart of the kingdom—the high places of the joy and tumult, and revelry of the land. Thus appropriately gathered we trust we may consign these subjects to public approbation (perhaps even not unmixed with surprise); and in the meanwhile, we may fix the cap of merit upon the right head, and award the credit of the drawings to Mr. William Dickes, the gentleman to whom the survivors of Sir Walter Scott thought fit to commit the arrangement of the art department of the Abbotsford Edition of the Waverley Novels.

The distressing disturbances of the manufacturing districts are far from subsiding nearly so speedily as we had hoped. Agitation, although here and there rebuked and quelled, is yet in many guises rampant in its vehemence, and the spirit of turbulence is still full of obstinate and over-boiling wrath. The great evil and the great wickedness of the excitement is, that the sullen labourers who still "hold out,"—the mill-stoppers who have been taught to believe that their vocation is moral revolution, instead of the peaceful and honest earning of their daily bread—exercise a physical control (contradictory, by the way, to the very terms of their own doctrine) over those who, being poor and penitent, either have returned or wish to return to their legitimate employment. Thus, the very will of the pliable is curbed, and a sort of passive anarchy, now and then whetted with an episode of plunder, may be said to reign in many of the discontented districts. In the meanwhile the Anti-Corn-Law League is very earnestly defending itself against the grave charges that have been brought upon it; and there are many who think that much of its defence is made good. Indeed there seems a general impression that at this stage of the trade-convulsion which has occurred, Chartism is the loudest in retarding the return of tranquillity. The question of "prevention" too is abundantly discussed; and perhaps it is a good sign that this formidable strike will soon be over, to see how vigorously public writings are reverting to its origin, and to the conduct of the local magistrates and the police, in reference to the presumed knowledge of which they should have been possessed. But it nevertheless is not over yet; and it is clear that very persevering influences must be exercised upon the deluded labourers, or that they must have a strong and appalling sense—which we pray heaven may not be a just one of sadly pressing grievances. The very worst feature of the whole condition of things—the one most fraught with lamentably miserable results to the manufacturing poor themselves—the most recoiling in its punishment, and we may add the most hopeless and despairful in its obstinacy, is the claiming of the saving banks of the little pittances that have been hoarded in them, to find subsistence for those who have ceased to work, and to feed a little longer the dogged determination of those who will nurse their anger till it is starved. In Stockport we find that thirteen hundred pounds have been drawn out, and notice given of the intended abstraction of eighteen hundred more on Monday next. The fact that there should be so much in does not indicate that the most extreme distress is existing amongst those who are most persevering in their complaints; but the fact of its being drawn out is a sure omen of misery to come, for which, unhappily, the provision will be gone. Why, this step is ruin! The men, when their savings are expended, must either break out into open revolution or go back penniless to their looms. And how lamentable is this! Why waste the little treasure upon sedition which economy and forethought had taught them to lay up against the evil day? Why despoil their homes and unsettle their condition, to crown the noisy boast of brawling demagogues? Why not believe, as our poorer brethren in all parts of the country now surely should, that the national mind is awakened to inquire not only into the oppressions that they may endure, but of the means to allay and redress them; that the public, the Government, the Legislature, are all directing their energies to this point; and that the surest and most insane way of retarding its achieval is by impeding the progress of tranquillity, and seeking to keep up a hopeless excitement throughout the land? We would almost condescend to implore the political agitators to have mercy upon their victims, and to allow reason to resume her sway. The cry of "Run to the Savings' Banks" is but the cruel invocation of a fiend.

ANGLING.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

THE SALMON.

This beautiful fish, which will grow to the size of fifty or even seventy pounds in weight, is esteemed by anglers the prince of freshwater fish. It is always bred in rivers having a direct communication with the sea. It lives a part of the year in the sea, or in the mouths of rivers running into the sea, and about the end of autumn or the beginning of winter, runs up rivers to spawn. They go up so far, that there is no tincture of salt or brackishness in the water, and deposit their spawn in holes which they dig in the gravel, and there leave it to become smelts early in the spring. In the months of March and April, numbers of these smelts may be taken in rivers as far as fifty miles from the sea, with the artificial fly, and after that time they go down to the sea, and there remain until the autumn, when they will return to fresh water, and will be found to have grown to the weight of six or seven pounds, and are called grilse. The fine flavour of salmon may be attributed to the richness of the food on which they feed. Dr. Fleming says their favourite food is the sand-eel, which is used in some parts as a bait, but the principal baits used for salmon are worms and artificial flies, and they are sometimes taken with a minnow.

SALMON FISHING.—STRAND'S BRIDGE; VALE OF RUTLAND.

Hofland relates an anecdote of an extraordinary salmon. He says:—"When I visited Loch Awe, in the year 1835, I met an intelligent Highlander (of course in that district a Campbell), who related an anecdote, connected with the weight of a salmon, which I shall repeat, and leave my reader to his own share of credence. A tall, stout, young Campbell from Glenorchy, celebrated for his success as a salmon fisher, left his native glen for the river Awe, which runs from the loch of that name to Loch Etiva, through a narrow ravine at the foot of the hill by Ben Cruachan. The bed of the river is stony, and in many parts the water is rapid and turbulent; but it subsides occasionally into deep pools, which are the favourite resorts of large fish. Our experienced Highlander reached a well known deep of this description, with a strong eighteen feet rod, and an immense wooden pirn on which was wound eighty yards of strong line, and had only cast his fly a second time when he struck a fish. The fish ran out his line with such furious rapidity, that he was obliged to follow with his utmost speed over rocks and stones, and frequently through the water also; for he soon found that he should have no chance whatever of turning his fish until they should reach a broad deep pool above a mile below him. At this haven he at length arrived, much exhausted with fatigue; not so the fish, for he seemed to be as vigorous as ever, and the angler, on finding he had room to try his skill and the strength of his tackle, soon recovered his spirits, when, as if in derision of both, the fish, after a violent plunge or two, took to the bottom, and there remained immoveable, resisting every effort to rouse him. Suddenly, however, he again ran up the stream, carrying the Highlander after him through the same rugged route, to the imminent peril of life and limb, till he reached the pool where he was first struck. After a short struggle, in which the angler at so far succeeded as to turn the fish down the stream, or rather submitted to be hauled taken down, and that as before in no gentle fashion, they reached the deep pool once more, when after a few fruitless efforts on the part of the Highlander, the fish again took to the bottom, where he lay in the most dogged sullenness, defying all the powers of his enemy to drag him from his retreat. Night was now coming on, and even our hardy angler was exhausted by his long contest; he therefore sat down between two rocks on the bank of the river, in a secure place, and determined to wait there till certain fishermen arrived, as was their custom, at break of day, from whom he might obtain assistance. He fixed his rod in security, and contrived that his pirn should give out the line freely, and then placed the line between his teeth, so that if the fish should leave the bottom, the running of the line might awaken him. In this situation he slept soundly till three o'clock in the morning, at which time the fishermen found him—the rod and line were undisturbed, and the fish still at the bottom; but the Highlander was now awake, and with the assistance of the friends in question, he soon succeeded, with their nets, in capturing this doughty fish, which proved to be a fine salmon weighing seventy-four pounds."

Most of the Scotch rivers produce salmon; and the lakes and rivers in Ireland abound in fine salmon and trout.

Your rod for salmon fishing should be from seventeen to eighteen feet in length, and your reel should contain at least seventy yards of strong silk line. In baiting with a worm, you must use it in a similar manner to that described in barbel fishing, but should have a much longer gut tackle, and a weight attached in proportion to the stream. Salmon are sometimes (but rarely) caught when barbel fishing, and baiting with a worm, which must be very well secured. The best time for worm fishing is after a fresh, and if the water is thick, use two worms. Flies for salmon are made much larger than for other fish, generally on No. 7 and 8 Limerick, and may be bought at most of the fishing-tackle shops.

MAGISTERIAL LAW.

There is no question upon which a community should be more carefully or tenaciously jealous than upon that which involves the due and just administration of its Magisterial Law. In the police offices of the metropolis the magistrates are, as it were, the familiar interpreters of justice to the people: they expound the common-sense view of disposing of minor civil wrongs and grievances—they direct the simpler powers of the Constitution for preserving the peace and order of every-day life—they are the admitted arbiters of all those minor points of trouble which ruffle the mere surface of the social world—and they are the natural protectors of the well-disposed of the community against every violence and tyranny, whether individual or congregate, whether springing from the strife of persons, or the exercise of authority by the police. Perhaps, however, while thus alluding to their proper functions, we are describing less what they are than what they should be. It is a matter of regret that cases in which they mistake the obvious direction of justice, and misapply all the powers with which society has invested them, are now of such frequent occurrence, that we can hardly take up a newspaper without finding one of them recorded, and that, in colours which leave the reader's opinion of the magistrate only the alternative of disgust or contempt. It is degrading enough to find that your English Midas will not sit in his justice-seat without the ears of an ass; but it is still more painful to see his obstinacy, his stupidity, or his partiality inflicting real wrongs and punishments, and assisting in acts and instances of oppression, which he ought to be the very first to repudiate and put down. The many decisions in police cases which have recently called for public remark—we mean decisions with the most gross and barefaced turpitude staring anything like a principle of justice out of countenance—seem to point to a necessity on the part of the Secretary of State for the Home Department for exercising a more influential surveillance over the practical administration of those paid functionaries who occasionally measure the interests of the public with so much impertinence of opinion, and so little regard for what is right. We regret to find that the current week affords us an instance of apparently shamefully abused authority, which will illustrate the entire spirit of our preliminary remarks. The locus in quo is Clerkenwell, and the hero who "does Midas," is a magistrate of the name of COMBE. We will give an outline of the affair. A lady, somewhat advanced in years, and of highly respectable appearance—a housekeeper, with a reputable residence and fair position in society—is brought up among the night charges by a police sergeant, and accused of having been drunk and disorderly, as well as of annoying him and interrupting him in the execution of his duty, at an unseemly hour of the morning. The police sergeant swore pretty lustily to his case, and Mrs. Knight, the lady in question, might have been mulcted in a fine—treated with an admonition—and decorated with a character for insobriety to the heart's content of her officious police accuser, but for the proper intervention of evidence which completly demolished the case. A gentleman casually passing at the time when the policeman interrupted Mrs. Knight in the street, swore that the lady was sober, and that the policeman was not: moreover, that he was not only drunk, but very much excited; that Mrs. Knight, who was going peaceably home from a friend's house, appealed to him for protection at what very naturally wore to her the aspect of a brutal and unjustifiable interference—in fact, that the whole disturbance originated entirely with that party who was employed to see that public tranquillity should not be disturbed. Another gentleman and his wife, whose residence Mrs. Knight had just left, corroborated the evidence of her sobriety, and swore that during the many years they had known Mrs. Knight they had never seen her intoxicated. In the face of this evidence Mr. Combe "felt it his duty" to dismiss the case.

Now there is no fault to find with this decision. The only regret is that the tables were not turned, and the drunken policeman charged, as he ought to have been, by the abused and assaulted lady who had suffered irritation, annoyance, and exposure from the vagabondism of a fellow, whose business lay in the protection of the public peace, and who most certainly himself deserved dismissal and disgrace. The whole affair, however, took a very different result—a result that will astonish all with its flagrant delinquency—and which, we must confess, created in our minds, after the decision we have recorded, feelings of blended mortification and dismay. This result arose out of a second case consequent upon the production of the first.

Four respectable-looking young men, named Neale, Hughes, Gibson, and Fitzroy, who from their manner were undoubtedly persons of education, and were described in the charge-sheet as gentlemen, were placed at the bar for an alleged obstruction of the constables in the discharge of their duty in the case of Mrs. Knight. Included in the charge was a young man named Negus, a brushmaker, of No. 18, Charles-street, St. John-street-road.

Again the constable swore vigorously, and his companions, whom he had summoned by an ominous spring of his rattle, backed him up with as much esprit de corps as the police usually exhibit when they have insulted the public. The points of defence, however, were even stronger than in the previous instance, and only put the conduct of the policemen in a still more odious light. First take the statement of Neale, who was a stranger to the other prisoners.

Now we shall print the several assertions of all the other parties. They appear to be made frankly and without concert, and completely corroborate each other.

Returning home on the previous evening he saw the lady in the custody of the constables, and heard her exclaim, that if they pinched her arms so she should faint. He told the constables to use no unnecessary violence, and that she would go quietly with them, but he was told to go about his business. He then said he would see her to the station-house, but did not call in question the propriety of their taking her there, and begged of her to go quietly. The constables, however, rolled her from one to the other; and when he (Neale) requested them not to abuse her, the sergeant, 10 G, seized him violently by the collar, and witness seized the rails to sustain himself; when the sergeant kicked him severely on the legs, as the marks would still show. He fell from the pain, and the sergeant tore off his stock and shirt collar. He (Neale) then called upon the other constable to protect him, as he considered the sergeant infuriated from drink. When thrown by the sergeant, his (prisoner's) head was lying in the gutter, and his body across the pavement.

Hughes stated, that he and Messrs. Gibson and Fitzroy being attracted by the noise, came up and asked what was the matter, but received no answer. They then walked in the direction in which the party were proceeding, when Mrs. Knight recognizing him, requested that he would go to her friends in Perceval-street, and tell them she was taken to the station-house, to which he replied, "Oh, they will not take you to the station house." The sergeant (10 G) then desired them to be off, when Fitzroy replied, they had a right to go which way they pleased, and they were proceeding on to see the issue of the charge, when policeman 10 G suddenly seized Fitzroy behind, and, tossing him up, flung him with great violence. Witness went to take the sergeant off his friend, when he was himself thrown by the former.

Gibson said, that he had not been taken into custody until his arrival at the station-house, and on arriving there he was refused admission. On requesting to go in with his friends, the sergeant took him by the collar and pushed him to the ground, and threw the hat off his head and the cigar out of his mouth. The sergeant appeared insane. He used no discrimination, and was decidedly maddened by liquor, which was the only excuse for his conduct.

Fitzroy's statement was similar to that of Hughes; what he principally complained of was the dastardly manner in which the attack had been made on him from behind.

Negus, who stated that all the other prisoners were total strangers to him, said he was only a witness of the transaction, and whilst standing in the road looking on he was knocked down by the sergeant.

All the most important features of these statements being substantiated by Mrs. Knight upon oath, Mr. Combe then decides "that the prisoner had no business to obstruct the police in the execution of their duty; that he should fine Neale, who was first in the affray, forty shillings, and the other prisoners twenty shillings each." The fines were paid, and the parties left the court.

Now we indignantly declare our conviction, that this case was one of unmitigated atrocity. It began infamously with the assault by a policeman upon a respectable lady—it grew worse under the effect of mere civil and fairly provoked remonstrance—it still progressed, when it involved several gentlemen in the ruffianly treatment which these defendants experienced—and it received something like a crown of depravity from the oral wisdom of the impartial Mr. Combe, who, by his decision in Mrs. Knight's case, implied a belief that the constable was not doing his duty when he took that lady into custody, and immediately fined others for obstructing said constable in the execution of that duty which he was not doing. A man might grin through a horse collar, and not look more absurd than our magistrate appears to do between the horns of this dilemma.

But the affair, in its serious aspect, is grievous to contemplate. Are women to be ill-treated and alarmed, and men buffeted and abused in the streets, at the whim of any surly ruffian in uniform who chooses to get mad or mischievous with drink? Are two or three round official oaths to overweigh the corroborative statements of several persons of unquestioned respectability? Is the aggrieving party to obtain a triumph beyond even the wrong he has inflicted, and are the aggrieved to pay for their grievance like a luxury; and shall the magisterial law which admits of such results be deemed tolerable by thinking and civilised people? A few more such cases of "justice," and these police-offices will be regarded with abhorrence and contempt. Moreover, if the magistrates do not protect the people from wanton stretches of power of their own paid servants and constables, they will fall into a hatred and detestation of the very force which they employ for their safety, and begin to regard that as unconstitutional which need not even have made itself unpopular. There is no end to the evil to which such abuses as we have recorded, backed by the support of the magistrates, would lead; and yet, if our limits did not now press us, we could prove by other examples that it is only one of very many instances that are daily occurring around us of the mal-administration of magisterial law.

DEFEAT OF THE AFFGHANS AT CANDAHAR.

INDIA—General Nott has achieved another gallant victory at Candahar. An attack was expected to be made on the city during the absence of Colonel Wymer at Kelat-i-Ghilzie with a large portion of the force. On the 29th May the Affghans made their appearance in considerable numbers, and General Nott moved out against them. But we must let the General tell his own tale. Here is his despatch to Government, penned on the conclusion of the battle:—"To T. H. Maddock, Esq., Secretary to the Government of India, with the Governor-General. Head-quarters, Candahar, May 29, 1842. Sir,—Akfar Khan, Chief of Zamindawur, having assem bled 3000 men, crossed the Helmund and joined the rebel force under Prince Suftur Jung and Atta Mahomed, on the right bank of the Urghundab, taking advantage of the absence of Brigadier Wymer, who had been detached into the Ghilzie province with a large portion of my force, and nearly the whole of my cavalry. The enemy, under an impression that we had not a sufficient number of men to hold the city, and at the same time to attack them in the field, took possession of some steep rocky hills within a mile of the city walls. I instantly moved out with the troops noted in the accompanying field return, leaving Major-General England, K.H., in command of the city. The Ghazees had about 8000 in position, and 2000 men guarding the Babawullee pass and roads leading to their camp. Our troops carried all their positions in gallant style, and drove them in confusion and with great loss across the Urghundab river. I was ably assisted by Brigadier Stacey and every officer present. Major Rawlinson, political agent, with his accustomed zeal, was in the field, and gallantly led a small body of Persians and Affghan horse to the charge. I am, &c., (Signed) W. Nott, Major-General commanding Lower Affghanistan and Scinde."

Lieut. Chamberlain is reported greatly to have distinguished himself, but was unfortunately wounded by a dagger thrust in the thigh. Captain Mainwaring, of the 43rd Native Infantry, was also wounded. Suftur Jung and several of the rebel chiefs gave themselves up to General Nott on the 19th June. The garrison of Kelat-i-Ghilzie has been relieved by Colonel Wymer, and the whole of the fortifications dismantled and destroyed. Wymer's brigade and the Kelat-i-Ghilzie garrison returned to Candahar on the 7th June; 400 Sepoys belonging to the 27th Native Infantry are said to be in confinement at Ghuznee, and much dissatisfaction was felt and expressed by the troops at their not being allowed to advance to the rescue. General Nott is represented to have destroyed Kelat-i-Ghilzie most reluctantly.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Paris, Sept. 3.—The Constitutionnel of this morning, in a letter from Berlin, states that an almost open quarrel between the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia has taken place. The chief causes are said to be the refusal of the Emperor to accede to a proposition by the King of Prussia for an amnesty to the Poles, and for modifying the prohibitive tariff of Russia as regards German produce. The latter part of the statement does not all all agree with a letter from Berlin in the Augsburg Gazette, which states positively that during the visit of the King of Prussia to St. Petersburg an arrangement was come to for the abandonment of the prohibitive system in Russia, as far as Germany is concerned.

An official return of the state of the works of the fortifications of Paris has just been made, from which it appears that they are in a much more forward state than was supposed possible, and it is asserted that they will be completed in two years. This announcement, and the fact that an extraordinary increase has just been made in the number of artillery officers of the French army, have caused the war partisans to raise their tone. It is difficult to account for this augmentation of the artillery force, for Ministers talk peaceably; and it is affirmed by the friends of M. Thiers that he is more than ever anxious for the duration of peace. Contracts have also been entered into by the Minister of Marine for some more war steamers; but as this was fully expected it excites no surprise.

The last news from India has filled some of the war papers here with rapture; but they are inconsistent in what they say, for they assert that the French Ministry has no desire of going to war, and that the misfortunes of England will prevent her from doing so.

The following account of Prince Gagarin's death is from a letter in the Constitutionnel of Saturday:—"An enormous corruption reigns in the Russian administration, and embezzlement in finances, and venality in the highest functions, have become quite a sore. The Emperor Nicholas has no power to remedy it, even should it be his interest to do so; the evil is too great. Very recently Prince Nicholas Gagarin, master of ceremonies at the court, and chief of the administration of the domains and expenses of the court, discovered numerous deficiencies, which compromised not only subalterns, but persons high in office. One of the subalterns, instigated by some person yet unknown, but equally compromised, went to the prince's cabinet, which is situated in the imperial palace. M. Reimann, a Finlander by birth, employed in the department of the royal forests, entreated Prince Gagarin not to implicate him in the discovery then making. The prince said he would make him an example. Reimann then exclaimed—"I am lost; prince, would you ruin me?" The prince again answered—"I must do my duty, and denounce you with the others to the Emperor." Reimann immediately drew a pistol from his belt and shot the prince dead. He then endeavoured to escape; but the report had been heard, and he was seized and imprisoned. He had been condemned to receive 5000 lashes, and to be banished for life to Siberia. It is thought that Reimann has not been condemned to death, because the Emperor expects some important revelations. At present, however, nothing has transpired on the subject."

Recognition of Spain by the Northern Powers.—A Bayonne journal gives the following details respecting the diplomatic negotiations which have been entered into with the Northern Powers, with a view to the recognition of Queen Isabella of Spain:—"The initiative of the negotiations was assumed by England through the enlightened communications of M. Sancho, the Minister Plenipotentiary of her Christian Majesty to the Court of London. France is stated to have joined frankly in the proceedings commenced by Lord Aberdeen, particularly since the deplorable accident which gives a chance of a royal minority in the Orleans dynasty. England, without imposing any political condition, shows clearly that she desires to obtain the treaty of commerce now under discussion as the settled price of her patronage. The Regent, Espartero, appears disposed to listen to reason, but he constantly turns a deaf ear, it is said, to all suggestions about a constitutional matrimonial alliance."

Madrid, August 26.—We understand that Colonel Bristow, an English gentleman, well known amongst us as having served in the war of independence, and for his zeal in the cause of Spanish freedom, has arrived in this city on the important mission of arranging with our government, on the part of several most respectable mercantile houses in London, the establishment of an Anglo-Spanish bank in one of the southern provinces of Spain, with a capital of £2,000,000 sterling.—Madrid Gazette.

The Madrid Gazette of the 28th announces the opening of a loan of forty millions of reals, payable on the products of the quicksilver mines of Almaden. Proposals were to be made before the expiration of 30 days. The amount was to be paid in monthly instalments.

Brussels, Sept. 3.—M. du Jardin arrived at Brussels yesterday from the Hague. The weather, which for more than two months has been constantly fine—too fine, indeed, since great injury has been done in consequence to the standing crops—has changed within these few days; there are frequent storms and heavy rains. The government has received, and the Moniteur publishes, the new law for the organization of the customs in Greece. The Belgian Consul, transmitting this document, announces the speedy publication of the Tariff of Customs, and of a new sanitary law.

Hanover, August 29.—It is said that the marriage of the Crown Prince and Princess Mary of Altenburg will take place in February next.

Reported Death of the King of Hanover.—(From the Standard of Wednesday.)—"We have just received the melancholy intelligence of the death of the King of Hanover, from a gentleman who reached London this afternoon direct from Dusseldorf. His Majesty attended a review on Saturday last at that place, and appeared in perfect health during the day; but, having taken some ice, or other refreshment, was suddenly seized with illness, and died either on Saturday night or early on Sunday. The melancholy fact was matter of conversation at Cologne." We possess no other information upon this subject. [The Dutch and German papers of the 6th instant make no allusion to this report.]

Cologne, August 29.—The Earl of Westmorland, British Ambassador at Berlin, arrived here on Saturday last; and Earl de Grey is expected either to-morrow or the day after, on his return from Weisbaden. It is not thought that the Kings of Bavaria, Hanover, and Wurtemberg will be here the day that his Prussian Majesty enters the city. It is now understood that neither the King of the Belgians nor the King of Holland will be present. The melancholy death of his royal brother-in-law, the Duke of Orleans, is more than a sufficient excuse for the absence of the former; no reason is assigned why the latter does not make his appearance, though various conjectures are hazarded which it would neither be seemly nor just that an impartial writer should notice.

During the month of August last, 134 ships entered the port of Antwerp, of which 31 were English, 29 Belgian, 16 Hanoverian, 6 French, &c. Only 88 ships arrived in 1841. The Chamber of Representatives have not yet decided on the convention between the Government and the city of Brussels. The Courrier Belge is of opinion that it will be rejected. If it should be so, the capital, it says, will immediately declare itself insolvent.

The Jews in Baden.—At the sitting of the Chamber of the States of Baden, at Carlsruhe, on the 22nd ult., the question of the emancipation of the Jews, and granting to them civil and political rights, was debated with great animation, but negatived by a majority as in 1831. On the 25th the Chamber passed a bill for laying a tax on dogs. On the same day a motion was made for remitting the first year's duty on beet-root sugar manufactured in Baden. This was strongly supported on the ground of the depressed state of this branch of industry in the country, but opposed by the government as a violation of a treaty with other powers, and the deprecation of colonial sugars. Notwithstanding these objections the motion was carried.

Leghorn, Aug. 19.—Yesterday three steamers arrived. They came from England and made the voyage through France; for they first ascended the Seine and then passed by the way of the canals to the Mediterranean. This is the first voyage of the kind that ever was made. These steamers are small iron boats made for the Papal Government, and destined as tugs for the Tiber, to tow merchant ships up the river. They sailed again yesterday evening for their destination.

Egypt.—Alexandria, August 21.—On the 14th the Emineffee came into port, bringing most important news from Beyrout. It appears that the Persians are advancing rapidly upon Bagdad, and that the governor, Ali Pacha, has declared himself independent of the Porte; in consequence of which step he has invited the Persians to consolidate his position by taking him under their immediate protection. Damascus seems to be in a very critical state, as Ali Pacha has there a very strong party in his favour, who are sighing to be under Persian rule. Part of the English and French squadrons had appeared off Beyrout, and are waiting orders how to act towards the mountaineers. Omar Pacha, the Austrian renegade, is furnishing the Druses with arms and ammunition, and it is supposed that he is trying to persuade them to attack Zahle, one of the principal Maronite villages. The Albanians, on dit, will all be off to Bagdad soon. On the 15th her Britannic Majesty's steamer Vesuvius arrived from Beyrout, bringing the accounts of an outrage committed on the person of a French officer, who appears to have been hung by the Albanians; no satisfaction has as yet been given. After landing some despatches for Colonel Barnett, she left the same day for Malta. On the reception of this news the French corvette Diligente, on station here, left for Syria.

There appears to be no doubt but that Ibrahim Pacha was offered by the Sultan the command of the Syrian army, and that it was not accepted by the former, as he prefers a quiet life to one of bustle.

The Egyptian fleet will be going out on a cruise in a couple of days; they are taking three to four months' provisions with them. The Pacha has promised to pay all his employés ten months—a little less than about half of what is due to the poor fellows.

Prussia and Russia.—The Constitutionnel publishes a long letter from Berlin dated the 26th ult., the object of which is to show that a serious misunderstanding has arisen between the King of Prussia and the Emperor of Russia. Alluding to the report of a conspiracy against the Emperor in the Russian capital, the letter says,—"There has been no explosion or disturbance at St. Petersburg. It is true enough that several regiments of the Guards in garrison at St. Petersburg were tampered with by the disaffected. Money was distributed, and pretty considerable sums were found on officers, sergeants, and men. The secret police of the Emperor, under the command of General Benkendorff, received information from the conspirators themselves; and to the disclosures then made we must attribute the terrible duel between the Princes Dolgorucki and Laschwyl, which took place without seconds, and in which the former was left dead on the spot from his adversary's ball. In fact, the conspiracy failed completely; the well-inclined regiments were informed of what was going on; the people of St. Petersburg, meanwhile, remained completely neuter, or rather fascinated by the ascendancy of the Emperor, so that the conspiracy was purely confined to the military and the nobility. If you desire to know what was the aim of this movement, I think I am able to inform you: that the life of the Emperor was in danger, and that the intention was to proclaim the young Grand Duke Alexander, now 22 years of age, and to form for him a council of regency to direct his affairs, whilst the young prince would only reign in form. The danger has been averted for the moment, but the position of the Emperor Nicholas remains exceedingly critical, having on one side a disaffected nobility, and, on the other, Poland held in subjection, and Germany tired of the Muscovite influence, and slipping away completely from the Russian alliance. Add to this, the unfortunate war in the Caucasus, which annoys in no small degree the national pride, and that ambition which desires to plant the Russian flag at Constantinople, and you will have a tolerable idea of the actual state of the colossal empire of all the Russias."

The following from Berlin, August 25th, in the Augsburg Gazette, throws some discredit on the above, as regards the difference said to have arisen between the two Sovereigns on the prohibitive system of Russia:—"We are assured that great modifications are about to be made by Russia in her prohibitive system, the Emperor himself having made promises to this effect to the King of Prussia during his Majesty's late visit to St. Petersburg."

A letter from Dusseldorf, 28th ult., announces the arrival there on the preceding afternoon of the King and Queen of Prussia by the railroad. They were received at the station by the authorities, and attended to the hotel of the regency, where all the persons of distinction in the town, including several foreigners, were admitted to pay their respects to them. A grand fête was to have been given on the occasion, but was deferred on account of the King being slightly indisposed. Prince Charles of Bavaria, his Majesty's brother-in-law, had also arrived at Dusseldorf.

Russia.—Breslaw, August 25.—The assemblage of Russian troops on the Polish frontier adjoining us is greatly diminishing, a proof that Russia fears nothing from her western neighbours. The Poles too, it would appear, must be considered pacifically disposed, since it is not deemed necessary to overawe them by a vast military force.

Cairo, July 28.—Admiral Napier, who had been ordered to demand from Mehemet Ali the Syrian soldiers who were in his service, did his utmost to have them back, such as were in Egypt; but he quite forgot the unhappy men who were in Senaar—perhaps he met no person who had any knowledge of such being the case. The 18th regiment of the line, consisting solely of Syrians, the greater part Druses, had received, in 1837, marching orders for Senaar. At that time it numbered about 2000 men, but according to late intelligence from that quarter, the men are now reduced to 500, owing to bad climate and bad food. The Gasul, or slave-hunting, is just as bad as it has been heretofore. Achmet Pacha, governor of Sudan, is supposed to have determined on advancing, in a short time, with hostile intentions, either against Darfur, or, it may be, on the province of Ambara in Abyssinia. He had lately formed two new regiments in Senaar, and had from here (Cairo) reinforcements, in the shape of a cohort of marauders, consisting of Arnauts and other rabble. The cruelties to be perpetrated by these brigands, it is frightful to reflect on beforehand. The troops of Mehemet Ali have attacked Abyssinia on the side of Kalabat, and taken many Christians into slavery. In the year 1837, the troops under Kurshid Pacha advanced as far as the frontier, and only five days' march from Gondar, but he did not feel himself strong enough to venture further. But there exists at this time a cause for this movement. In the beginning of the present year, Ras Ali was in a bad way. He was attacked on one side from Esbie on Tygre, whilst in the south he had the Galla tribes as enemies. Under these circumstances he sought for assistance from Achmet Pacha, which was at once given him, and then attacked the Galla. This, no doubt, was the cause of the entry of Mehemet Ali's troops into Abyssinia. At present we must wait for intelligence from that quarter whether they will remain there or return; the result may be of great importance.

Jerusalem.—We learn from the current month's number of the Jewish Intelligencer, published by the London Society for promoting Christianity amongst the Jews, that letters have been received from Jerusalem down to July 1, at which time all the members of the mission were in the enjoyment of good health; and the bishop had recovered from an attack of fever from which himself and some of the younger members of his family had suffered during the preceding month. Dr. Macgowan writes, in his letter of July 1, 1842;—"We are going on wonderfully well in Jerusalem, and only wonder at the absurd reports of the opposition and insults we are said to have met with. I can most truly say, that since our arrival here we have not experienced the least annoyance or disrespect from either the public authorities or the inhabitants. On the contrary, we are in terms of charity with all men; they have got accustomed to our faces, and we to theirs. In fact, we feel ourselves quite at home, without being so unnatural as to forget old England. The bishop is quite recovered, except feeling a little weak from his late illness. With the blessing of Almighty God, he and his family are preserved in peace and safety. The climate is much better than I had expected; we have always after sunset a fine cooling land breeze, which takes off the extreme heat of the day." "Our prospects," says the doctor in another part of his communication," are very encouraging; everything seems to be overruled for good by a gracious Providence. Trials may be in store, but we have had none as yet; and, when they come, we trust that strength and grace from above will enable us to bear them. I feel an increasing interest and delight in my department. It is a laborious one, but health and strength have not failed me hitherto. I have much encouragement in my work, for I see that our mission is slowly, but surely, producing a favourable impression on the minds of the people among whom we live." This gentleman gives additional testimony, if that be requisite, of the gratitude with which medical treatment is acknowledged in the east, and speaks very sanguinely of the good that will result from the proposed establishment of an hospital at Jerusalem.

United States and England.—Galignani of Saturday publishes prominently the following article:—"In addition to the fact of the treaty between Great Britain and the United States having been signed at Washington, as stated in the American papers, we are enabled positively to state that the treaty for the suppression of the slave trade has also received the signatures of the respective Ministers, and had likewise been referred to the Senate. Among the provisions is one, that both governments are to have vessels carrying in the whole at least eighty guns. A treaty has also been agreed to for the mutual surrender of fugitive criminals. The long-disputed question of impressment, and those of the Creole and the Caroline, are likewise arranged. It is also, we have reason to know, expected that the tariff, probably with modifications, will pass during the present session of Congress."

India.—The following extract of a letter from Jellalabad, dated May 25, possesses some interest:—"Poor Elphinstone was a martyr to chronic gout, and was in consequence incapacitated from command. Instead of resigning, as he should have done, he succumbed to undue influence, and losing all confidence in the troops, whose conduct was in some cases sufficiently bad to justify that loss, he acted injudiciously. Sir W. M'Naghten's conduct was faulty, in so far as he did not command the best information, or demand the best security that Cabul afforded for his magazines; they should have been in the Bala-Hissar. But when the insurrection broke out all his efforts were paralysed by the bad spirit and conduct of the troops. In such an emergency hope reasonably enough was placed in the Europeans; from them was expected an example which would animate the whole force. I must not omit to tell you the heroic conduct of the men of the 1st troop of 1st Brigade of Horse Artillery. Testimony is unanimous in describing them as perfect heroes; neither ancient nor modern history can present deeds which excel theirs—under circumstances the most dispiriting, the very elements being at war with them—they fought till strength failed. While they could serve their guns, the enemy drank their fill of the British grape; when ammunition failed and the horses were exhausted, they rendered the guns unserviceable; and while so occupied they constantly charged the enemy; a dozen men putting to flight hundreds who attempted to prevent their work of destruction. They were at length, faint and wounded, hewn to pieces, while, with their remaining strength, endeavouring to cut the spokes of their gun wheels. Gallant and honourable men of fine feelings can scarcely restrain their tears when they describe the conduct of these noble men. Poor M'Kenzie, a prisoner on parole from M. Akhbar's camp, every inch a soldier and a gentleman, entreats not to be talked to on the subject, as he cannot command his feelings. I feel quite honoured in being in the same service with such heroes. By the by, I must not forget to mention that your friend Eyre behaved nobly at Cabul; he was wounded, but has recovered. He and his family are prisoners of Akhbar Khan, and were quite well when M'Kenzie left. He has written a long account of the whole catastrophe, which he intends to publish."

THE CHURCH.

Preferments.—The Rev. T. Watkins, to the vicarage of Crickadarn, Brecon. The Rev. J. Mason, to the curacy of Great Malvern. The Rev. I. H. La Mothe, to the vicarage of Lezayre, Isle of Man. The Rev. H. Dale, to be Principal of Bishop's College, Bristol. The Rev. I. Moore, to the perpetual curacy of St. Bartholomew, Salford, Lancashire.

New Church.—On Monday morning the Lord Bishop of Oxford consecrated an elegant church, recently erected at Shawcum-Donnington, near Newbury. A large number of the clergy were present, including Dr. Binney, the rector of Newbury; Rev. Henry Majendie, vicar of Speen; Rev. Samuel Slocock, rector of Shaw, &c. The Bishop of Oxford preached an eloquent sermon, and alluded with satisfaction to the progress of church extension, and the consequent erection of schools, in which the youth of both sexes received instruction in the doctrines and duties of Christianity, as taught by the Established Church.

The Bishop of London arrived in the city of Durham on Saturday last, on a visit to the Bishop of Chester. His lordship attended divine service at the cathedral on Sunday, both in the morning and afternoon, and was also present at the evening service at the Galilee. The right rev. prelate proceeded northward on Monday morning.—Newcastle Journal.

The Rev. W. Hodgson, M.A., of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and perpetual curate of Whitewell, in the parish of Whalley, has been presented to the incumbency of Brathay, near Ambleside, by G. Redmayne, of Brathay Hall, Esq.

The Venerable John Moore Stevens, Archdeacon of Exeter, was on Saturday last elected a canon residentiary of the cathedral, in the room of the Rev. Whittington Landon, D.D., deceased. This election, we understand, has taken place in pursuance of an arrangement entered into by the church commissioners and the bishop of the diocese, under the authority of the act of Parliament lately passed in reference to cathedral chapters. The effect of this arrangement is, that in future the Archdeacon of Exeter will always be a canon, a stall in the cathedral having been permanently annexed to that office. The archdeacon, however, will only receive two-thirds of the revenues of the canonry, the remaining one-third having been appropriated to the endowment of a new archdeaconry, which is to comprise a portion of the very extensive district now under the jurisdiction of the Archdeacon of Cornwall.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Portsmouth, Sept. 6.—The Firebrand, first class war-steamer, built on the plan of Captain Sir William Symonds, Surveyor of the Navy, was launched from this dockyard yesterday, in presence of numerous spectators; she will shortly proceed to Glasgow to receive her machinery, and return to this port for commissioning. Sailed yesterday for Woolwich, to be paid off, the Gleaner steamer, Lieut. Jeayes; this vessel has lately returned from the West Indies, on which station she was employed conveying the mails between the intermediate islands. The Raven cutter, Lieutenant Shiells, arrived yesterday from Sheerness with disposable seamen. The Jaseur, 16, Commander Welles, arrived late on Saturday evening from Gibraltar, and sailed yesterday for Leith, to join the royal squadron. The Racer, 16, Commander Thomas Harvey, is hourly expected at Spithead from the West Indies; and the Curacoa, Captain Jenkin Jones, is expected next month from South America, having on board a large freight, on merchants' account. The Orestes, 20, Commander the Hon. S. I. Carnegie, M.P., is the only vessel of war fitting at this port for service. The Warspite, 50, Captain Lord John Hay, C.B., from New York, having on board Lord Ashburton, is reported to be in the Channel, with light winds and calm; she is hourly looked for at Spithead. Ships in harbour: St. Vincent, Victory, Orestes, Imaum, and Excellent. At Spithead: No vessel of war.

On the 2nd instant an experiment was made at Spithead in the afternoon, on board the dockyard lighter, moored over the wreck of the Royal George, in the presence of Admiral Sir Edward Codrington, commander-in-chief, Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker, superintendent of the dockyard, General Sir Hercules Pakenham, and other distinguished naval and military officers. The diving-bell having been selected for the purpose of trying Dr. Payerne's invention, of preserving life under water, without having communication with the external air, was found, so far as the present experiment, to answer. General Pasley, under whose plan the wreck of the Royal George has been removed, attended on the present occasion, and accompanied Dr. Payerne in the diving-bell, which was under water upwards of 20 minutes in 13 fathoms, during which period the apparatus for supplying purified air was worked by Dr. Payerne in the diving-bell, without the assistance of the air cylinders or boxes attached to the bell, or the customary hose from the air-pump. It is expected, from the favourable result of this day's experiment, a repetition will take place daily.

Plymouth.—Launch of the Albion.—This magnificent vessel built to carry 90 guns, was launched on the 6th. We have been furnished with a beautiful sketch of the ceremony, which we are for the present prevented from giving. If the all-engrossing topic of the Queen's tour will permit it, we shall give it next week.

On Friday last a detachment of the 42nd Highlanders, consisting of 150 rank and file, besides officers and non-commissioned officers, left the Castle for Perth, to serve as guards to her Majesty while in the Highlands; 50 of them will be stationed at Scone, 50 at Taymouth Castle, and 50 at Drummond Castle; and on Tuesday and yesterday the 6th Dragoon Guards (Carabineers) from Glasgow, arrived here on their way to the same place, to serve as escorts to her Majesty in the Highlands. One squadron will be stationed at Perth, one at Dunkeld, and one at Aberfeldy; while the Enniskillen Dragoons will escort her from Dalkeith to Perth, and meet her at Crieff on her return.—Stirling Observer.

The court-martial, which in July last found Ensign Armstrong, of the 41st Regiment, guilty of a breach of gentlemanly conduct unbecoming the character of an officer, has remitted its former finding, and in lieu thereof find him guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer, in going behind and striking off the hat of Ensign Lee at a public ball; and further, that he is guilty of omitting to report to his commanding officer that Ensign Lee had thereupon kicked him, or to take any other steps to cause such indignity to be properly noticed, but acquit him of the remainder of the charge. The sentence was, that the said Ensign Armstrong be admonished.

By the death of General Lord Robert Edward Somerset, which took place on Thursday at his house in Grafton-street, the colonelcy of the 4th Dragoons, which he held since March, 1836, is vacant. The date of Lord Robert's latest commission as a general in full is November 1841. His lordship served at Waterloo.

New Barracks.—The Ordnance department has issued bills, stating that the board is ready to receive tenders for the building of barracks in Ashton and Bury. They will be on a very extensive scale. Those who have seen the specifications, assert that the outlay at each place will be £5000 or upwards. This resolve on the part of Government has not taken place in consequence of the late and continued strike, but had been previously determined upon.—Macclesfield Chronicle.

Suicide of a Private of the 2nd Dragoon Guards.—One of the privates belonging to the 2nd Dragoon Guards, now stationed at Newcastle, and who took an active part in the affray at Bursleem, put an end to his existence on Friday night, by discharging a loaded carbine immediately under his chin, having pressed the trigger with his foot, by which the top of his head was blown to pieces. The deceased, whose name was Knight, had formed an intimacy with a woman at Newcastle, representing himself as an unmarried man; but his wife, having been apprised of the connection, came to Newcastle, and frustrated the intentions of the deceased.

Royal Military College.—Two of the commissionerships are vacant by the deaths of Lord Edward Somerset and Lord Vivian.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

The Great Western steam-ship, Lieut. Hosken, sailed from Liverpool on Saturday afternoon for New York, with above 100 passengers. The British and North American royal mail steamer Acadia, Captain Ryrie, sailed from the same port on Sunday morning for Halifax and Boston. She carried out between 70 and 80 passengers.

American Mail Steam-ships.—The British and North American Royal Mail Steam Company's new steam-ship Hibernia will be launched at Greenock on Thursday next. The Hibernia is 200 tons larger and of greater power than the present mail steamships. Capt. Judkins takes command of the Hibernia. Captain E. Ward C. Miller, formerly of the Acadia, will now command the Columbia.

The Hindostan Steam-ship.—This most splendid steam-ship made an experimental trip to Holyhead Bay, on Friday last, and performed to admiration. She left the George's pier at eight o'clock A.M. She went into Holyhead Bay and saluted the town, and was again at the George's pier at 6h. 45m. P.M., thus accomplishing the entire distance in ten hours and 45 minutes, although she had an hour's flood against her at starting, and an hour's ebb when returning to Liverpool. She made the run from the Skerries to the George's pier in four hour and forty-nine minutes, and from Point Lynas to the Floating Light in two hours and forty-two minutes, the latter a distance of 41½ statutes miles. Her engines of eight feet stroke, made fifteen revolutions per minute. —Liverpool Albion.

Southampton, Sept. 5.—Arrived at one o'clock the Oriental and Peninsular Company's steam-ship Montrose. The Montrose left Gibraltar August 25th, Lisbon 29th, Oporto 31st, Falmouth noon of the 4th instant. She brings 25 bullocks from Vigo, and 10 packages of Spanish hams, with a full cargo of fruit, and 16 passengers. On making the dock, in consequence of the wind blowing fresh against the tide, she ran on a mud-bank, but was soon released, and entered the dock, taking the place of the Liverpool, which sailed on her outward-bound voyage to Lisbon, &c., on Saturday last.

Alexandria, August 22.—The Great Liverpool arrived here on the morning of the 18th, bringing with her 56 passengers for India, amongst whom were the Marquis and Marchioness of Tweeddale and suite, on their way to Calcutta. The Pacha has lately been taking into consideration the improvement of the transit through Egypt. At one time he talked of having a railroad laid down between Suez and Cairo, but the difficulties and expenses attending this work would be so very great, that he now seems determined to cut a canal through the Desert, thus having an easy and free communication by water all the way across the country. Prices of all seed and grain have declined from 12 to 16 per cent. since the arrival of the English steamer. Hopes are entertained of having a good Nile this year.

Falmouth, Sept. 4.—The Thames, West India steamer, received her mails yesterday morning, and proceeded for Corunna, Madeira, and the West Indies. She had about 14 passengers. The passage-money and freight of the Trent, the last which arrived, have been estimated at £800. According to the calculations of an experienced steam-boat engineer, the aggregate annual loss to the West India Steam Company, incurred by their vessels in proceeding up channel after landing their mails at this port, is not less than £20,000. The Liverpool, Captain Evans, will leave tomorrow with the mails for Vigo, Lisbon, &c. The Montrose arrived this afternoon at one P.M., Captain Lewis, and Lieutenant J. Wise, R.N., in charge of the mails. She quitted Gibraltar, having received a Malta mail by the Electra, government steamer, on the 25th of August; left lying there the Formidable, Thunderer, Belvidere, and Lizard, with the United States frigate Congress. Left at Cadiz, on the 25th, a French line-of-battle ship, a frigate, a brig, and a war steamer; passed the Royal Tar, steamer, when going into Lisbon; the Lynx was left there on the 27th; the Bellona, Austrian frigate, was soon to take her departure. At Vigo, on the 31st, met with the Lady Mary Wood. The Montrose had a large number of oxen from Spain.

Lisbon, Aug. 29.—The British schooner Ashburton, Bulkeley, master, from Villa Nova de Portimao to London, with a cargo of cork, took fire at sea on the 22nd instant, when about 90 miles to the westward of this port, and was completely destroyed. The master and crew were picked up and brought here by the Spanish schooner Restaurador de la Paz, Gonzalez master, which was fortunately in sight at the time, and promptly bore down to their assistance. The flames spread so rapidly to the sails and rigging that the crew had barely time to escape; and the moment after they had pushed off in the boat, both masts fell overboard.

Surveying Service.—Her Majesty's ship Fly, despatched for the purpose of surveying Torres Straits, and to offer some protection to the British merchant vessels against the various pirate prows on that ground, arrived on her way there at Table Bay on the 20th of June last.

New Zealand.—The emigrant ship Prince of Wales, chartered by the New Zealand Company, sailed on Friday for the company's settlement at Nelson, having on board 170 steerage and upwards of 30 cabin passengers, many of the latter being purchasers of land. Mr. Heaphy, who went out with the company's preliminary expedition to Wellington in 1839, as draughtsman, and lately came back to this country, returns to New Zealand in the Prince of Wales, intending to remain as a permanent settler.

Falmouth, Sept. 6.—Intelligence has reached here that the captain and all the crew of the Marquis of Queensberry, a merchant vessel belonging to the firm of Pollock and Gilmore, in Glasgow, died of the fatal sickness prevailing at Havannah. The Spanish authorities at Havannah took temporary charge of the Marquis of Queensberry.

The late Niger Expedition.—Her Majesty's steamer Albert, one of the vessels composing this unfortunate expedition, was lying at Ascension (previous to July 2), along with her Majesty's ships Rapid and Waterwitch.

THE STATE OF THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.

Manchester, Tuesday Morning.—The operatives are but slowly resuming their regular occupations in Manchester, and a week or two must probably elapse before the great mass of the "turn-outs" will be again in employment. However, in Salford, the whole of the weavers belonging to one establishment have gone in at the masters' prices, thus showing that they no longer submit to be guided by the resolutions and proclamations of the "committee," who have hitherto dictated what course they were to pursue.

Mr. Owen's dye-works continue in operation. The new hands engaged at this establishment, not belonging to the "Union," remain at work, and the business, notwithstanding the turn-out of some of the old hands, goes on now without interruption.

From the neighbouring towns no accounts have been received differing from those which have appeared. In some, as then stated, all the mills are at work; while in others no business is stirring. In the neighbourhood of Mottram and Glossop, where the outrage on Mr. Shepley's mill occurred, the public peace has not been again disturbed, but all the hands are out.

Stafford.—A meeting of the magistrates and deputy-lieutenants of Staffordshire was held on Monday, in the Grand Jury Room, at the Shire-hall, for the purpose of taking into consideration the present state of the county. An unprecedented number of magistrates attended, amongst whom were Earl Talbot (the Lord-Lieutenant of the county), Viscount St. Vincent, Lord Wrottesley, Viscount Newport, Mr. J. E. Piercy (the High Sheriff), Major Chetwynd (late M.P. for Stafford), Mr. E. Buller (present M.P. for the borough), Mr. C. S. Forster (late M.P. for Walsall). Resolutions were entered into to preserve the peace of the district.

Stockport, Wednesday Morning.—The town continues in an excited state, owing to the indisposition of the working classes to the resumption of employment at the old prices at Messrs. Bradshaw's factory, St. Peter's-gate (the only one at work), which was guarded during the whole of yesterday by the magistrates, police, and special constables, and last evening a party of firemen had charge of the premises, lest the incendiary might be at work. No mischief, however, has been done; and the increased number of those employed only serves to provoke the malignity and imprecations of the disaffected, who yesterday threatened us with another visit from "the Ashton boys." The military have not been called out; and the mayor, on this occasion at least, manifests a laudable disposition to preserve the peace. It is now generally understood, from some communications received by the borough magistrates yesterday from the Home-office, that a special commission will be issued for Cheshire, for the trial of prisoners committed for offences connected with the turn-out. At present the number is considerably below one hundred. The commission will be held in October.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

On Tuesday the members of the corps dramatique assembled on the stage at 12 o'clock. Among those present were Mr. Harley, Miss Romer, Mrs. Nisbett, Miss Horton, and Mr. Morris Barnett. It was communicated to the performers that the theatre would not open until Saturday, the first of October.

COVENT GARDEN.

Miss Adelaide Kemble.—We are glad to hear that this favourite cantatrice is fast recovering from her late indisposition. A severe sore throat was the immediate cause of her inability to appear on Saturday at Covent Garden, but there is every reason to expect that she will sing this evening. Her physician (Dr. Wilson) has advised her not to go to Brighton on Monday; consequently the concert which had been announced for that day has been postponed to the 19th inst., when Miss Kemble, Miss Dolby, Giubilei, and John Parry will sing.

HAYMARKET.

A new comedy, by the author of London Assurance, is to be produced on Monday. The house has been well attended during the week.

THE STRAND.

The new piece at this house, called Leyerdemain, is from the pen of Mr. Oxenford. It is by far the best of the season, and has drawn crowded houses since its production.

THE ENGLISH OPERA.

Carter, the lion-tamer, is performing here at present. On Saturday an encounter took place between the Kentuckian professor and the king of the forest; it arose from a quarrel between the lion and tiger. Carter went between them, quelled the latter, but had a terrific skirmish with the former. He was bitten in the arm and thigh, but ultimately beat the beast to a stand still. A surgeon reported that Mr. Carter was severely injured in the biceps and sartorius muscles; he was, however, enabled to appear on Monday.

The Glove Trade.—As an instance of the state of depression of this branch of manufacture, we may state that a manufacturer recently sold 470 dozens of gloves at 6d. a dozen, the mere cutting of which, let alone all the other numerous operations requisite to complete the glove, did not cost less than 8d. a dozen.—Worcester Chronicle.

Smuggling.—There have been some pretty doings at the Custom-house, in Thames-street, in importing foreign manufactures into this country. So imprudent have these officials been, that they have actually sent circulars round to the lace and silk houses, offering to insure the importation of foreign goods at about one-third of the duty. One of these circulars being sent to an honest townsman of ours, he took the liberty of enclosing it to Sir Robert Peel, who, upon receiving it, instituted an inquiry, the consequence of which is, that about eight of the landing-waiters have been suspended—some of their names are before us. The Customs board are now making inquiries, but strictly private.—Midland Counties paper.

VIEW OF PRESTON.

PRESTON GUILD.

We last week announced the celebration of the Preston Guild. A part of the ceremony is here completely exhibited, together with a view of the place, and such a description of the origin of the Guild as will afford a key and clue to all the accounts that follow.

Preston, in the centre of Lancashire and hundred of Amounderness, is a place of great antiquity, and until the commencement of the last century appears to have stood first in the county for wealth, although inferior to Manchester in population. Charles I. made a greater demand on Preston for ship-money than upon any other town in the county. It derives its name from having been once much occupied by ecclesiastics, at the time when the hundred of Amounderness belonged to the cathedral of York. The celebrated guild of merchants, called "Preston Guild," had its origin about 1329, though some think it to be of a much older date; and the Customale of this town is a curious document, securing privileges, some of them of a very singular kind, nor are the penalties annexed much less so. Debtors, being burgesses, were, it appears, to be ducked on the cucking-stool for the fourth offence; but to be at mercy for the sum of 12 pence for three offences, provided the debt were incurred for bread and ale. If a man's wife be lying in of a son, and he pleaded it, he was excused from obeying a justice's summons to go upon an expedition. If any one called a married woman a naughty name, and no witnesses were forthcoming, she might clear herself upon oath; and then he who was guilty of so calling her was "to take himself by the nose, and say he had spoken a lie." The document, 700 years old, declares it to be the law of Peston "which they have from the law of the Brettons." There were formerly two monastic institutions in Preston, one called the Hospital of St. Mary Magdalen, the other a monastery of grey friars; the last was a prison until about fifty years ago, and traces of it yet remain. In the war between Charles I. and the people of England, Preston was first occupied by the royal party, but was quickly captured by the Parliament forces, and the mayor killed in the storm. The Earl of Derby afterwards retook it, and demolished the defences; and it was close to Preston that Cromwell routed the Scotch army in 1648, after Sir Marmaduke Langdale had joined. The battle was fought by the Ribble, and, though Cromwell's strength was not half that of his opponents, they lost in two days 15,000 men out 26,000, the remainder being nearly all taken or slain soon afterwards,

Preston, Monday Night.—The Guild-merchant of this ancient corporation commenced this morning with the accustomed ceremonies. At an early hour the day was ushered in by merry peals from the bells of the parish church, the streets being crowded by multitudes of strangers from various parts of the country. Cricket matches and boat races were the principal public amusements up to mid-day, when the business of the Guild formally commenced. At two o'clock, the mayor (Mr. Samuel Horrocks), the corporation, and officers of the Guild, assembled at the Guild-hall, Church-street. When the authorities had taken their seats, the town-clerk (Mr. Palmer) opened the Guild by proclamation; after which the court adjourned to the Corn Exchange, Lune-street, whither they marched in procession, preceded by the mace-bearers, and the magnificent band of the 60th Rifles. The Corn Exchange, which had been covered in a very elegant and tasteful manner for the occasion, and for the purposes of the subsequent public balls, was crowded long before the hour appointed, by an assemblage of the haut ton and beauty of Preston. At the extreme end of the Exchange, upon a raised platform, seats were provided for the mayor and corporation, and the other officers of the Guild. The coup d'œil at this period was most imposing, the body of the hall being filled by fashionably-dressed ladies, whose personal charms were of a character to leave no doubt of the proverbial power of the "Lancashire Witches" over the opposite sex. The band of the Rifles was stationed in the orchestra over the principal entrance, and added much to the effect of the proceedings by some occasional performances. On the entrance of the mayor and corporation, the band struck up the national anthem, the assemblage being uncovered. The recorder (Mr. T. B. Addison) then announced the nature of the business that had called them together, expatiating upon the rise and progress of the borough, and coupling its success, in a commercial point of view, with the public services of the mayor's ancestors. The learned gentleman concluded by calling upon the town-clerk to read the guild proclamation, which was in the form of a precis and record of all the guilds that had been held ab initio. This concluded, the clerk received from the mayor, stewards, and aldermen, their ancient fee of seven pennies each, and from the other burgesses the ancient fee of one shilling each. Mr. T. Humber, a scholar of the Grammar School, then mounted a platform in the centre of the Exchange, and recited a Latin oration appropriate to the occasion. Although not marked by any extraordinary originality, it was well suited to the character of the festival, and accorded due merit to the mayor and corporation, as well for the manner in which they acquitted themselves of their municipal functions, as for their regard for the advancement of education and the accomplishments of polite life. It was entitled, "Oratio in Curia Prestoniensi Habita; S. Horrocks, Armigero, Prætore Urbano. A.D. 1842." As being most pertinent to the occasion, and as conveying in a comprehensive form the sentiments of the school towards the mayor and corporation, we give the concluding sentence:—"Quapropter nunquam ex animo effluent vestra erga nos merita, sed, usque dum vivimus, semper in memoriam non ingratam redibunt. In referenda autem gratia res, ut adhuc, vobis prospere eveniant: sint vobis bona, fausta, felicia, fortunatæque omnia. semper hominesque omnia volvendis mancant: hi dies festi, per totam vulgati Britanniam atque amplissimis laudibus ab antiquis scriptoribus celebrati, lætissime agantur: optimates, insignibus titulisque conspecti, nitent; pompa, magna comitante caterva, splendida incedat: lyra et tibia laborces fallito. Opimis epulis onerentur mensæ: procul nigræ curæ, procul ira, invidia, omnesque pectoris tumultus: adsint fama, decus, fides, virtus, et concordia." At the conclusion of this address, the Recorder delivered a short reply in Latin; after which the proceedings terminated, and the corporation returned in procession to the Town-hall. In the evening there was a brilliant display of fireworks in the Market-place, which attracted a dense, but well-ordered, multitude of spectators. Although the Premier, as one of the patrons, cannot be present, his eldest son, Mr. Robert Peel, has taken lodgings in the town, and will appear at the bal costumé, together with the other noble and distinguished patrons. The "swell mob" have their representatives at the Guild, but as the police, both of London and the various towns in the county, have also their representatives here, the swell gentry are not unlikely to find "an officer in every bush."

Preston, Tuesday evening.—The celebration of this ancient Lancashire carnival was continued this day, and the town was crowded to excess with strangers from all parts of the country. The attendance of persons of rank and others from a distance, both yesterday and to-day, was limited to a few, which was probably owing to the recent riots in the borough. It had indeed been rumoured that the Chartists would endeavour to get up a meeting or counter demonstration; but, from the excellent arrangements of the mayor and magistrates, any such attempt would have been immediately frustrated. The railroad trains from Manchester, Liverpool, Fleetwood, Lancaster, &c., under the able superintendence of Mr. Pickard, were crowded with passengers whose destination was the guild: one train contained no less than 1000 persons. The festivities comprise every description of amusement, both for the higher and lower classes, viz., boat races, regattas, balls, bazaars, concerts, processions, fancy fairs, public breakfasts, masquerades, horse riding, exhibitions, &c., the profits of which (if any) are to be devoted to charitable purposes, as has been the custom since the reign of Henry II. Amongst the visitors may be enumerated a large concourse of the London swell mob, and last evening a respectable countryman was hustled by one of these gentry, and a female robbed of no less a sum than £1999, with which the thieves got clearly off. It appears that the victim had just been selling an estate for £4000, and having received one-half that sum in payment, had come to Preston from the neighbourhood of Blackburn to lodge it in the bank. The day's business of the guild commenced at 11 o'clock, by the mayor and corporation going in procession to the parish church, where the guild sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Parr, vicar, and chaplain to the guild. At the conclusion of the church solemnities, the mayor and magistrates headed a grand procession of the gentlemen, clergy, burgesses, and trades, which perambulated the town during the greater part of the day. The pastimes were wound up by a grand miscellaneous concert being given in the theatre, which was crowded to excess by fashionables, amongst whom were a number of members of Parliament.

The Harvest.—We have had a week of unsettled weather. The crops have not in the least suffered as yet, but a great deal will depend on the next ten days, and the farmers begin to look with considerable anxiety on the probable state of the weather during that period.—Doncaster Chronicle.

The harvest in the south-western district of this county—indeed, we may say throughout the whole of Monmouthshire—is now very nearly concluded, without a day's interruption from the commencement to the present. Comparing the produce of this year with that of 1835, we think we may state that the quality is superior but the quantity is not so great. On the whole we are happy to be enabled to give so cheering a report of the produce of our district.—Monmouth Merlin.

The harvest is now in its height, and more than half cut down, and about half of the winter wheat is in the barn-yard. About half of the barley and oats have also been got in. The wheat and barley, although thin on the ground, are of first-rate quality. Oats are small in the kernel in general. Beans on strong land are not half a crop. The weather is still fine.—Berwick Warder.

The weather still continues most propitious for the harvest operations, and shearing is now quite general. A great proportion of the crop has been cut, and some of it secured in excellent order. —Montrose Standard.

Harvest is now general, and in many districts reaping is over. A considerable portion of the grain is even stacked; for the weather has been so warm and favourable that the intermediate stage of drying on the field is soon accomplished. A great deal of corn has been thrashed out, and in quality realises the most sanguine expectations of the farmer. The want of pasture is, however, much felt, and some farmers have been compelled to order oil-cake for their stock. Inverness Courier.

The country has been blessed with a continuance of the same favourable weather which characterised the early part of the autumn. Wheat, in many places, has turned out from 63 to 65lb.; barley, 56 to 60lb. per bushel. Those are results unexceeded, if ever equalled, by any preceding crop in this part of the country. The wheat of 1820, 1821, and 1826, was of perhaps equally fine quality, but not so heavy.—Perth Courier.

Since the date of our last, the weather has been uniformly favourable for bringing the crops to maturity. The heat was excessive in the early part of the month, but from the 8th to the 15th we had copious rains, which proved very beneficial to the turnip crop and pasture lands, and retarded the premature ripening of the grain crops. Harvest became general in our district about the 17th, and, having no interruption, the stack-yards on early farms assume the appearance of October. The potato crop promises fine in quality, but it is the general opinion that it will be deficient in quantity. Pasture lands are bare everywhere. It is rare to see stock with a full bite; notwithstanding, the improvement in condition is wonderful. Orchards and gardens have realised our utmost expectations.—Ross-shire Advertiser.

Newton Abbot.—The Chartists have begun to agitate the agricultural districts of this county. Powell, the Chartist missionary, attended here on Friday, the 26th ult., and addressed the working men near the tower. He was very favourably received by them, and promised to pay another visit in about a fortnight or three weeks. Western Times.

Charges for Stamps.—The ship-masters of Liverpool are now in the full enjoyment of the promised advantages regarding the charge for stamps required in the pursuit of their occupation. The stamps for charter-parties are obtainable at 5s. each, in lieu of 30s.; and for bills of lading at 6d. each, instead of 3s. This is a very important and valuable concession, which we have no doubt will be appreciated, and placed to the credit of the Conservative government.—Liverpool paper.

Town-Hall, Windsor.—On Monday a charge against policemen, named Brown and Horton, for violently assaulting a young man named Gray, was investigated, and terminated in the dismissal of Brown from the police force and the suspension of Horton.

VIEW FROM THE COFFERDAM NEW BRIDGE OF HUNGERFORD.

As we have adopted the system of representing the progress of Public Works in the Metropolis, we here present one of the aspects of London from the cofferdam of the New Foot Bridge which is to be thrown from Hungerford-market across the Thames. The bridge in question will add one more proof to the hundred that are multiplying around us of what wealth and enterprise are capable to effect—and some convenience may also fairly be expected from its erection. If it be half so handsome a structure, when completed, as the beautiful bridge at Hammersmith, we shall have no reason to regret its suspension even over that most busy thoroughfare of the river. As yet it has been once impeded in its progress by floodings arising from a storm; but we believe the works are now being actively forwarded, and "all in good time," we presume, we shall have "a new footing" over the water. Even the French who visit London may then admire it without wounded vanity, for, although we are told that no Frenchman could ever persuade himself into an encomium upon the Bridge of Waterloo, yet there is nothing repulsive to his amour propre or national pride in the title of Hungerford, and should there be anything like beauty about it, Monsieur will be able to share his admiration of it with the rest of the world.

CARRON WATER.

We have elsewhere given the principal localities of her Majesty's visit to Scotland. We here subjoin a short article from a correspondent, giving three views and an account of some of the romantic scenery in the immediate vicinity of Stirling Castle.

Reader, we would venture a guess, that the days have been, when you were wont to rise betimes, and throwing your satchel across your shoulders, trudge your weary way to school. Furthermore we would speculate, that consequent upon your going to school, you have stood forth, and with mingled feelings of the comically heroic, you have announced to your grinning school-fellows—

> My name is Norval. On the Grampian Hills
> My father feeds his flock, &c.

Doubtless, too, your youthful brain glowed with imaginings of valour when you described how > —— the fierce barbarians from the hills

> Rush'd like a torrent down upon the vale;

and how you alone—

> With bended bow and quiver full of arrows,
> Hover'd about the enemy, and mark'd
> The road he took ——;

and when you told how

> Returning home in triumph, I disdain'd
> The shepherd's slothful life, you might well be excused the supposition that you personified a warrior of the first water!

It is not unlikely that the lines,

> —— —— —— having heard
> That our good king had summoned his bold peers
> To lead their warriors to the Carron side, conveyed to your intelligence for the first time the fact that there existed a river Carron, and if since the days of your school-boyhood the Carron has ever been recalled to your remembrance, the recollection has probably brought with it many pleasing associations. Supposing as much, we may fairly presume that the invitation we give you to take a ramble down the "bonny banks o' Carron water," will be readily accepted.

The Carron is a small river, which has its beginning and its end in the county of Stirling. Rising in the parish of Fintray, and entering the magnificent Forth at Grangemouth (entrance to the Forth and Clyde Canal), its length does not exceed fourteen miles, while its width is so contracted, that it cannot measure many yards in any part. Notwithstanding its insignificance, however, the Carron is, in many respects, highly interesting, and much of its scenery very romantic. Many memorable transactions have taken place on its banks. The Romans, unable to penetrate further into "the land o' cakes," wisely built a wall parallel with the river, to defend their newly-possessed territory against the encroachments of the unconquerable Scots, who, with their confederates, the Picts, fought bravely against the invaders, proving their patriotism at the expense of their blood, and warning the Romans that ambition's career might be limited. Near the Carron, too, and not far from the town of Falkirk, is the spot where, in the fourteenth century, Sir William Wallace fought an important battle with the southern Britons.

Pity that the days should ever have been when they who ought to have considered themselves brethren, thirsted for each other's blood, and would have trampled on each others' neck. Joyous that the days are now when brethren agree, and, standing side by side, defend themselves against the world, whenever the world declares itself their foe,—long may the rose, the thistle, and shamrock, be strong in their union!

But it is not for its battle scenes alone that the Carron is remarkable. Famous as it was in olden times for deeds of violence, it is no less famous in these days for its contributions to the arts of peace. Reader, examine the stove or grate in the fireplace of your parlour, and we bet ten to one that you will find thereon impressed the mystic word Carron! Have we won?—Ay, to be sure we have! and, would you believe it, that grate actually came from the banks of Carron water? If you be a metropolitan, and were translated to the spot where it was manufactured, you would probably feel yourself shrink into a nutshell at the terrific sounds you would hear, and the blaze of burning matter to be seen. And how great would your surprise be when you learned that the unearthly sounds were the result of the concussion of tremendous hammers, and the blasts of immense bellows. Yet such is the case; and who can doubt it, that knows that at the works of the Carron Company 2000 workmen are constantly employed, while the furnaces consume on an average annually "100,000 tons of coals, 400,000 tons of ironstone and ore, and 100,000 tons of limestone!" In this enormous consumption above twenty furnaces are continually blazing, while machinery of the most extensive kind, driven both by steam power and Carron water, is ever in motion. Comparatively powerless as man is as an animal, what cannot his genius accomplish!

Carron (the village) is situated three miles above Grangemouth; and, if we ascend further up the river, we shall pass the mills of Dunipace (Dunes pacis), i. e. the hills of peace, which are nothing more or less than mounts raised, according to tradition, to commemorate a treaty of peace between the Romans and Caledonians. Many other spots of historical interest are to be seen in the neighbourhood of the river, which we must leave the tourist to discover, while we go still higher, till we reach the village of Denny, passing, on our way, two or three large printfields, which employ the water of the river to good account. At Denny the Carron runs under a neat bridge, over which passes the road from Glasgow to Stirling. Denny is a populous little place, being in the vicinity of several paper and other mills, which employ many of the inhabitants. We were in it several times two years ago, and could not help remarking that nearly every alternate house displayed a board, with this inscription, over the door:—"Licensed to sell spirits, pepper, and tobacco." We overheard two villagers in conversation, one day, on the subject of teetotalism, and one of them calculated the number of teetotallers in Denny, but he could not remember more than eight!

Above Denny the Carron is much more romantic; and at the distance of a mile, near the paper works of the well-known Messrs. Duncan, it runs, "bubbling and boiling," between the precipitous rocks, and dashing over its rocky bed in the most gallant manner. At this place, and for some distance, the banks on the north side rise to a considerable height, covered with wood. Tamaree Linn is here; and, though small, and, compared with other waterfalls, insignificant, it adds interest to the river, and contributes to diversify the scenery. A little on the left is the old corn-mill we have sketched, and a mile and a half further up the river is the view given at the head of this article. J. T.

CORN-MILL.

HUCKNALL TORKARD CHURCH.

The unpretending structure of which we this week present a view to our friends, is rendered sacred by being the depository of the remains of that transcendant genius and poet—Byron. From Moore's "Life of Byron," we find that, "It was on Friday, the 16th of July, 1824, that in the small village church of Hucknall, the last duties were paid to the remains of Byron, by depositing them close to those of his mother in the family vault. Exactly on the same day of the same month in the preceding year, Byron said despondingly, to Count Gamba, 'Where shall we be in another year?' The gentleman to whom this foreboding speech was addressed, paid a visit some months after the interment to Hucknall, and was struck on approaching the village, by the strong likeness it seemed to bear to his lost friend's melancholy death place, Missolonghi."

In the church is kept a book to register the name and residence of visitors. It contains the signatures of distinguished men and women from all parts of the civilised world. The village of Hucknall is about seven or eight miles from Nottingham, and about three from Newstead Abbey. The surrounding country is rich in natural beauty, and full of poetical associations.

All that is raised to the memory of Byron is a plain tablet of marble in the chancel of the church, a correct representation of which we give below.

EXPORT OF MANUFACTURED GOODS TO THE UNITED STATES.—At no period for many years has the quantity of British manufactures shipped to the United States been so small as it is at present. If even a packet ship gets a freight of £250 or £300, it is considered very good as things go now. Passengers are the most profitable kind of freight, and they continue to be very numerous. The packet-ship Patrick Henry, which sailed on Friday, carried out 20 cabin and 250 steerage passengers, whose passage money would yield not less than £800. Her freight on goods did not reach £300. Sheffield Iris.

PROPERTY AND INCOME TAX.—Persons whose incomes are under £150 a year from all sources, in making their returns, have in many cases omitted to apply to the collectors for an exemption form, No. 38, to be filled up with a statement of particulars; this form should be immediately obtained, otherwise the parties will in all probability be obliged to attend and get their claims allowed before the Commissioners.

THE LATE MARQUIS OF HERTFORD.—The personal property of the late Marquis of Hertford has been sworn under £700,000, the duty on which will amount to £10,000. It is stated on the best authority, that the report of the executors being about to commence a civil action against Suisse is totally without foundation.

"R. Y. W." is thanked for his communication, and will see it as a Nook and Corner in an early number.

"O. P." is informed that every department is filled.

"Ignoramus," Bristol, shall be answered in our next.

"Joseph Hetherington."—The portraits in question will some day appear; we have them. The Colosseum print can be had, when out, of any country bookseller. The newsman ought to supply the wrapper.

"T. W. A Subscriber from the Commencement."—We will inquire.

"F. H. Dayrolles."—We will inquire into the subject of the letter, which shall receive attention and notice. In its present form it is too long for insertion in a weekly paper.

The "Country Clergyman," who writes to us on the subject of the New Poor-Law, shall have his suggestions considered with care, attention, and respect.

"A Land-Agent," Bath.—Thanks.

We have received, too late for the present number, a view of the Lady Mayoress's procession at Preston, and which we shall present to our subscribers and readers next week; when we shall also select from papers just come to hand some of the particulars respecting the Guild Festival.

Moulton Church will be the subject of our "Nooks and Corners" next week.

NOTICE TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The magnificent drawings by the artist especially appointed by us to accompany her Majesty in her Scottish tour have come safely to hand; but to do justice to these elaborate and characteristic details, we find it impossible to publish them this week. We promise our friends, however, that our next number shall be even more beautiful than any which has yet appeared, and will present accurate delineations of the regal solemnities, civic pageants, and noble festivities of the royal progress.

NOTICE.—On and after the 22nd of this present month of September, "THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS" will be published at 198, STRAND, where Books for Review, Advertisements, and all Communications are requested to be sent.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1842.

The proprietors of this journal having taken the lease of the extensive premises known as No. 198, Strand, we are, upon the eve of a removal, in a twofold measure called upon to address a few words to our readers. In the first place, it is necessary that, in a mere trade sense, the fact of the change should be announced, as the interests and convenience of the many wholesale news-vendors who supply the "ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS," by hundreds of quires to the public are implicated in the alteration. The new arrangements have, of course, been made with a view not only to the much increased but rapidly increasing circulation of the paper, and the facilities of supply will be for the future proportioned to almost any suddenness of demand. Little trivial conveniences, too—such as folding-room, &c.—which so much forward publication, will be abundantly provided, and we have every reason to believe that "the administration of the affairs" of our new office will leave less ground of complaint than that of any Government which has yet been brought to bear upon the national destinies.

But, apart from the mere technical advantage incident upon special and extensive publication, we owe an address upon our change of office to the great world of readers. We cannot lose sight of the knowledge that they are the cause of our widening the field of enterprise, and bringing fresh energies to work in the larger arena that we shall now have for our labour. There is more in this than at first will reach the reader's glance; it is not a boast of quack ambition, nor a mere idle vaunting of intoxicating success; it is a true and gratifying result of a very anxious desire on the part of the paper to meet with becoming spirit the very kindly and active encouragement of those who take it in, and we are grateful to know that they are largely numerous in proportion to their influence and respectability. We are vain enough to believe, too, that they have acquired just so much interest in the prosperity of our journal as will induce them to feel gratified with whatever seems either to assure or confirm it.

It is, in plain terms, true that we have been only able by most strenuous and difficult exertion to keep pace with the success of our enterprise, owing to the rapidity with which events have followed each other since we commenced it; the number of interests and curiosities which every event involved; the consequent week-upon-week accumulation of demand; and, latterly, the almost rush for supply which brain-industry, aided by the wings of steam, has been almost inadequate to meet. Merely to state that within two months we have three times reprinted the first number of this paper, only proves that those who received recent copies have been active to procure all that preceded them; and that in so doing, if a joke be permitted us, they left us very little opportunity of "taking care of Number One." But when we report that, over and above all back demand, there is still a rushing influx of new readers—that thousand mounts upon thousand in the order list with an almost incredible rapidity—that from the public there are letters, and suggestions, and requests, which assume all forms and varieties, and take a broad and endless range—that the aristocracy have patronised us, perhaps because we are not revolutionary, and the lower classes, perhaps because we are not aristocratic—above all, that the strong middle classes (and this is what we are exultingly proud of) have received us in their families, have filed and kept, and do file and keep the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, because it affords palpable instruction in a pure and virtuous form, and administers to the gratification of innocent and civilizing taste a pictorial index of the history, the manners, and the adventures of the age—when we declare that the clergy, in large numbers, have given it their high sanction—and that, from the army and navy, letters innumerable have poured in with courteous offers of the exercise of amateur talent in our behalf, in sketching and describing interesting scenes of service in almost every quarter of the globe—when these truths are recorded by us with more pride, perhaps, than is compatible with the humility which we would fain preserve;—it will at least be readily believed, that almost every moment of our existence presents a new claim upon our energy and exertion; and that no idleness is permitted to us in the task of providing resources for the now leviathan engine we have to work. We believe that so simple an act as that of taking the enlarged premises in the Strand will greatly aid these resources. We shall be able to keep our wood-engraving department further in advance, by (independent of our present out-door employment of the most eminent men in their vocation) the retention of permanent artists upon the establishment, ready at a moment's notice for the contingencies of every public event: Literary facilities will naturally combine with the embellishing progress of the journal; and a practical smoothness of operation will ensue, that will not only ensure correctness of illustration, but a rapidity of production, that, in its application to the events of the moment, might almost be characterized as the "improvisation of art!"

We cannot conclude so favourable a glance at our prospects without a strong and earnest expression of gratitude for the almost wooing patronage that has placed us in a position which we are about so vigorously and so expensively to maintain.

It will be seen that we continue to illustrate the visit of her Majesty to Scotland with drawings of nearly every locality to which she makes a casual excursion, or which she honours with more permanent stay. In our arrangement of subjects with reference to the entire event we have been necessarily guided by circumstances. We have received from one of our artists (we have now two directly present and engaged upon the task of illustration at every event in which the royal visitors take part) several spirited subjects, which are in immediate progress of engraving, and will be presented in our next number, together with others of the splendid series, which will be furnished to us within the interval of two or three days. No occasion will be lost that can serve to interest any class of our readers; and it is presumed that our pictorial record of the royal journey, reception, and entertainment will be such as was never before presented in any previous channel of public intelligence or current history of the times. We hope, however, not to omit other features of attraction; and, as the Preston Guild has not gone unillustrated in our present number, so we will make in our next "a grand stand" for the Doncaster Races, that those who have sport otherwise than in the Highlands may not get it spoiled by our neglect.

There have been no political agitations during the week that require one word of comment at our hands. The leaders of the daily journals are almost entirely devoted to abstract questions, or to speculative discussions upon the cause and consequences of the turmoil in the manufacturing districts; where, however, we are happy to be able to report a further progress towards tranquillity, and something like the signs of an exhaustion of the elements of disturbance and misrule.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

During the week the Prince and Princess have been driven, in an open carriage, through the Long Walk, in the neighbourhood of the Great Park, attended upon each occasion by the Dowager Lady Lyttleton. Their Royal Highnesses are in excellent health.

His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, Lieut. General Sir Andrew Barnard, G.C.B., Lieutenant General Sir Henry Bethune, Sir William Macbean, and Prince Gustavus of Hohenlohe Langenbourg, have arrived at the Prussian camp at Dusseldorf, on the Rhine.

Prince Esterhazy may shortly be expected in London for the purpose of taking formal leave of her Majesty upon relinquishing the post of ambassador, which he has so long and so honourably held. It is the intention of the cabinet of Vienna to appoint a successor to Prince Esterhazy forthwith; until then Baron Nieumann will continue to discharge the duties of the embassy.

The Marquis of Waterford, whose accomplished marchioness is quite restored to health, has removed his splendid hunting stud to Rockwell, where he will hunt the county during the ensuing season.

Lord and Lady Powerscourt are expected to return home shortly from their tour to the German Spas. Her ladyship has quite recovered from the effects of her long and severe illness.

Count and Countess Esterhazy have arrived at Dover, on a visit to their relatives, the Prince and Princess Leichtenstein, who intend to remain there for the bathing season. The count has been mistaken for Prince Esterhazy, the Austrian ambassador.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.—The most gratifying intelligence has been received from Addington-park of the improved condition of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who continues daily to make some progress towards a restoration; and if the right reverend prelate happily escapes a relapse, it is to be hoped he will ere long be in a state of convalescence.

The President of the Board of Control had an interview with Lord Stanley on Tuesday, at the Colonial Office.

We learn that the Earl of Coventry's health has not improved. The noble lord, who is attended by several members of the faculty, is staying in the Regent's Park.

The splendid gifts presented to her Majesty by Baboo Dwarganauth Tagore consist of a most magnificent Indian shawl, of a bright torquoise blue, with the richest palms, of an entirely new and original pattern, and a dagger, meant for the Prince of Wales, the handle of which is of rock crystal, mounted in black enamel, incrusted with diamonds of rare water, and the sheath studded with rubies.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent left Bushey House, Bushey Park, the residence of her Majesty the Queen Dowager, on Wednesday, for her residence, Frogmore Lodge, near Windsor.

Sir James Graham has arrived in town from Cowes, Isle of Wight. Lord Fitzroy Somerset, military secretary to the Commander-in-Chief, visited the right hon. baronet yesterday afternoon at the Home Office. The Attorney-General and Mr. Maule had also interviews with Sir James at the Home Office yesterday afternoon.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE LATE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.—This valuable preferment, which has become vacant by the demise of the Very Rev. Dr. Ireland, is the most lucrative deanery in the church, its revenue, we believe, exceeding many of the bishoprics. The late dean was dean of the order of Bath. The senior prebendaries, the Rev. Dr. Causton and the Rev. W. N. E. Bentinck, administer the affairs of the deanery until the appointment of the late dean's successor.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—The works of the Victoria Tower are in such a state of forwardness, that the architect, Mr. Barry, is in hopes that in six weeks or two months they will be sufficiently advanced for the first stone of the new Houses of Lords and Commons to be laid. This great tower, which, from its altitude, about 300 feet from the ground base, will constitute, it is expected, the leading feature of the new edifice, is constructing over the central hall, immediately between the House of Lords and the House of Commons. Into this structure all the ventilating flues of the entire building will be carried, to enable the accumulated foul air to escape from its summit. The ceremony of laying the first stone will probably be performed by her Majesty or her royal consort.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY, SOMERSET HOUSE.—The collection of celebrated portraits belonging to this scientific and literary body has recently received some valuable and interesting additions. Mr. Vignoles has presented one of the finest original portraits yet known of Sir Isaac Newton, one of the early presidents of the society. This portrait is by Vanderback, and was long in the family of the great founder of the Newtonian system.

The director of the French Customs has granted Messrs. Waghorn and Co. permission to send the baggage of Indian passengers through France via Marseilles, under their seal, provided an inventory be previously handed to them for transmission to the authorities at the port of landing, who have received directions to despatch them without being opened.—Times City Article.

The committee appointed to receive subscriptions for the relief of sufferers from the fire at Hamburgh have just published their report, by which it appears that the whole sum which has passed through their hands is £27,567 19s. 7d., besides contributions made in different parts of the country, amounting to about £13,000, exclusive of clothing and other articles; and that the total amount received by the committee at Hamburgh from all countries, up to the 5th of July, is £268,890. Great as these contributions are, the committee remark, while expressing their gratitude, that but little assistance has as yet been afforded, in comparison with the damage done.

A memorial to the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London, to pave Old Broad-street with wood instead of stone, signed by the professional gentlemen and merchants occupying houses therein, has been presented to Mr. Corney, deputy of the ward, who has promised to do all in his power to satisfy the wishes of the memorialists.

THE NEW BOCCIUS LIGHT, OPPOSITE NORTHUMBERLAND HOUSE, STRAND.—This splendid light has been exhibited, and fully answers the expectations which have been formed of it by the inventor, and by the scientific and practical gentlemen who have had opportunities of inspecting its qualities previously. It is supported on a lofty column, and irradiates the entire space between the Post-office and Cockspur-street, the Strand beyond Craven-street, and as far as St. Martin's Church on the north. Nelson's column, in Trafalgar-square, though masked at present by the scaffolding, appeared as if standing out in broad moonlight; and the gas-lights surrounding King Charles's statue, Charing-cross, were found to be quite unnecessary, and were accordingly extinguished, with the exception of one on the shadow side, towards Whitehall. The light of this lamp is peculiarly white and soft, and free from all quivering and unpleasant effect on the eye from its intensity.

The stoppage of the old and highly respectable firm of T. W. Smith and Co., in the commission trade, is said to have arisen from their having given too extensive credit to a party speculating in corn, though they themselves were not engaged in the same speculation.—Times.

ST. MARTIN'S CHURCH.—The workmen employed in taking down the steeple of St. Martin's church, have accomplished their labours, and began on Saturday to enter on the reconstruction of it. About forty-five feet have been removed, at which point the electric fluid was found to have passed off. The stones of the steeple were discovered to have been in a very shattered state. One which had been removed from its position was about two feet six inches long, and projected the whole length, with the exception of about an inch and a half, and if that had fallen out, several others would have followed. Several of the stones will be rechiselled and again put up, but the greater portion will consist of new Portland stone. They will be joined together by strong cement instead of mortar, with which the steeple was formerly constructed, and slate dowels will be used instead of cramps. It is expected that the steeple will be rebuilt in the course of six weeks. Since the gilt ball and vane were removed they have been measured, when it was found that the latter was eight feet four inches long, and the ball about three feet in diameter. The bar of iron, by means of which the vane works, is nearly twenty feet long, and weighs 11 cwt. The stones that formed the late steeple, though they have been there above 130 years, with the exception of their external surfaces, are but little damaged by the hand of time. As they are taken down they are placed together as they were situated in their respective courses in the steeple, so that comparatively but little trouble will be had in the re-erection of the steeple. The height of the scaffold from the clock is about 220 feet. The same tradesman, Mr. Hemmings, who was appointed by the Sun Fire-office to repair Brixton church after it was damaged by lightning, is employed in the reconstruction of the steeple.

POST-OFFICE FRAUDS.—The fraud discovered to have been committed a day or two ago by a clerk in the money-order department in the General Post-office, by forging money orders and advices as if drawn on Camberwell Post-office, at Sittingbourne, has suggested a very simple plan which would effectually prevent all frauds of the same kind. The plan is for the Postmaster-general to issue orders to his deputies to pay no order, nor enter any advice, unless each bear the stamp of the office at which the order is drawn. At present any clerk could forge orders and advices on a neighbouring office for £100 or £200, and get them cashed without exciting the least suspicion.

The Postmaster-general has decided on returning to the old method of paying the guards on mail coaches 10s. 6d. per week, and allowing them to take fees from passengers. The guards on railways are still to be paid salaries, without fees; but such salaries are to be on a reduced scale. The cause of the contemplated alteration in the mode of paying the mail-coach guards is, the continued discoveries that they receive fees. Six of them are now suspended for taking fees, but Lord Lowther has resolved not to dismiss them, because he declares it impossible to prevent persons who are paid only £70 or £80 a-year, from taking gratuitics from passengers, when, as in most cases, it has happened the gratuities have been voluntarily offered.

FILTHY AND DANGEROUS STATE OF THE METROPOLIS.—That London is not at this very hour the scene of a fierce and deadly epidemic is in no degree attributable to the wisdom or humanity of the various parochial authorities. There is scarcely a parish in which there is not a disgusting and constantly maintained emporium of malaria, and, singularly enough, these superterraneous receptacles of all mentionable and unmentionable abominations are usually in the immediate vicinity of squares and streets inhabited by the wealthy and luxurious. From the large, airy, and apparently salubrious square called Lincoln's Inn-fields, two minutes' walk will conduct any gentleman curious in contrasts to the nevercleansed centre of Clare-market, or to the fetid and fever-scented Clement's-lane, which, in addition to all the abominations collected by a filthy population in filthy houses, has at one end Enon Chapel, where the dead rot within a few inches of the feet of the living. Again, Great Russell-street and Bloomsbury-square have for their immediate neighbours George-street and Buckeridge-street, with all their tributary lanes and alleys, places so horribly filthy that all attempts at description would be vain!

HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—Late on Saturday night, a youth about 16 years of age, named Frederick Cook, residing at No. 1, Nottingham-place, Kingsland-road, left his home for the purpose of visiting his parents, who are residents at Thames Ditton, Surrey, carrying with him a small brown portmanteau, containing a few trifling articles of body linen. About three o'clock on Sunday morning, whilst walking along Putney Heath, he was assailed by two ruffians, dressed in fustian dresses, one of whom wore a mask over his face. He was immediately knocked down by a violent blow, and while the masked man held a pistol to his head his companion ransacked his pockets, taking from him four sovereigns and 3s. in silver, with which, and the portmanteau, they made off in the direction of Wimbledon.

The Atalanta, Gravesend steamer, barely escaped an accident of a serious nature on Sunday last. Upwards of 400 persons were on board the vessel, which is an exceedingly small one, and incapable of carrying more than half that number with safety. On arriving at Erith, the vessel ran violently against the new pier, and sustained very serious injury. The alarm created induced all to rush as far as possible to one side of the boat, when she was nearly overturned. Had it not been for the exertions of a gentleman on board, who prevailed on the people to stand steadily in the middle of the vessel, a serious accident must have occurred.

On Saturday morning a large sailing barge, navigated by two men and a boy, while coming up the river, was sunk by the heavy swell caused by several vessels going down the river at full speed. She went down nearly opposite the St. Katharine Dock entrance. The people in her were saved by the watermen, who rowed from Alderman's Stairs to their assistance. The barge was laden with 70 tons of coals. The damage sustained is estimated at £300.

THE LONDON CHARTISTS.—The public meeting which had been adjourned from last Monday week, and which was to have taken place on Tuesday, near the pin factory, in the London-road, Southwark, was again necessarily adjourned for want of both auditors and speakers.

On Wednesday evening, shortly after 7 o'clock, one of the most violent storms of thunder and lightning ever experienced in Windsor, accompanied by a heavy rain, passed over the town in a south-westerly direction. The lightning was alarmingly vivid and forked, and of the most appalling description. The peals of thunder were loud and long-continued, and it is feared considerable damage must have been done in the neighbourhood. At half-past 8 o'clock the storm raged with increased violence.

Two remarkable bankruptcies follow each other in last week's Gazette; they are that of a noble lord—Huntingtower, and Goodered, the keeper of the notorious saloon in Piccadilly.

The Government evening paper denies the rumoured statement of the retirement of Mr. Mark Phillips as Under-Secretary of the Home-office.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE RIVER.—On Tuesday afternoon, a collier's boat, containing four persons, came in collision with the Waterman steamer, No. 2, off Globe-stairs, Rotherhithe, and one man was unfortunately drowned. It appears that the occurrence was perfectly accidental.

THE QUEEN'S TOUR.

EDINBURGH, Tuesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert, with the royal cortège, left Dalkeith Palace before nine for Queensferry; and arrived at Newhall at eleven, where the royal party embarked on board the Queen Margaret steamer. Only the Prince and two ladies accompanied her Majesty in the boat, which bore her from the shore of Lothian, and which took a westward sweep for a considerable distance, partly perhaps to obtain a view of the surrounding beauties on either bank of the Forth, and partly to afford time for the embarkation of the other official attendants, and the carriages by another boat, which cut right across, and having landed at the North Ferry its passengers and freight, left the quay, while the boat with her Majesty on board, after sailing eastward beyond Inchgarvy, neared the pier, and disembarked at twelve o'clock at noon, the royal steamer firing a salute, and the gathering on the quay and heights of North Ferry greeting the landing by signals which we could see but not hear.

We understand that her Majesty intends to return from her excursion to the Highlands this day week, after which she will again honour the Duke of Buccleuch with a residence of five days.

PERTH, Wednesday.—The towns and villages through which the royal cortège had to pass in her Majesty's journey northward, vied with each other in decorations and devices in honour of the Queen. At the confines of the county, and about ten miles distant from Perth, the road intersects the Ochil hills through Glenfarg. The Ferg, an inconsiderable mountain rivulet, meanders down the glen to which it gives its name: and so narrow is the pass, that in many places there is barely room for the road and the brook to keep clear of each other. Emerging from this defile, the luxuriant and richly variegated vale of the Earn opens gradually upon the view. This fertile and delightful strath is enlivened and enriched by the mansions of the nobility and gentry, exhibiting all that cultivation and refined taste can add to natural fertility and beauty. Her Majesty kept the Great North-road, cutting right across the valley until the cortège reached its verge, then turning off by the base of the northern hills, proceeded to Dupplin Castle, the seat of the Right Hon. the Earl of Kinnoull, which was reached at two o'clock. In this splendid mansion the Queen did the noble family the honour to partake of a sumptuous déjeûné. Dupplin Castle commands one of the best views of the valley of the Earn, both to the east and west. A deputation of the town-council, consisting of the Lord Provost, magistrates, and city clerks, was received at Dupplin, and had the honour of presenting an address to the Queen.

From Dupplin en route eastward to Perth the most striking and prominent object is Mordan, or Moncrieffe-hill. At the distance of about three miles from Dupplin the road is carried over the western shoulder of Moncrieffe-hill, now reduced to the height of 182 feet. Before ascending this eminence, the view northward is entirely shut out by the line of hills which flank Strathearn, but upon gaining the summit a scene bursts at once upon the view, which for panoramic effect may be held as unsurpassed, if equalled, by any within her Majesty's wide-spread dominions. Upon reaching this spot the invading legions of Rome were so enraptured with the sight as simultaneously to exclaim, "ecce Tibers, ecce Campus Martius"—Behold the Tiber, behold the Field of Mars!" Here her Majesty paused for a time to enjoy the lovely landscape which now stretched out before her, and appeared to be highly delighted with the scene. On the right, the massy and lofty hill of Kinnoull attracts the eye, its western side studded with cheerful villas and luxuriant parterres, and its southern front presenting a perpendicular range of rugged rocks, half a mile in breadth, while their altitude exceeds that of the cliffs of Dover; it is terminated to the east by the magnificent policies of Kinfauns. Lifting the eye off this delightful scene, and following the course of the river, the ancient city of Perth arrests the attention, with its stately bridge, its towering steeples, and spires standing out in bold relief.

Beyond Perth, and on the opposite bank of the river, stands the ancient Royal Palace of Scone, once the residence of the Scottish monarchs, and still a princely fabric, peering out of the thickly-wooded policies in which it is embedded. Here the sovereigns of Scotland were crowned in days of yore; and with many interesting events in civil and ecclesiastical history Scone is intimately connected. As the eye stretches northward, the distant views assume an Alpine sublimity and magnificence. First the lower range of the Grampians borders the expansive plain in the body of the scene, and behind them rise, in towering grandeur, the lofty summits of the upper range, until the view is bounded by their cloud-piercing peaks. Never was this sublime and splendid scene beheld by human eye under more auspicious circumstances than it was this day seen by Queen Victoria. The sun had now reached the far west, casting his rays over the enchanting scene, and producing the perfection of light and shade on its hills and plains; and a full tide of the noble Tay, bearing on its bosom vessels of various burden, all glittering and gay in honour of the royal visitant.

Descending from this delightful eminence, the Queen approached the ancient city of Perth through the avenue which intersects the South Inch, one of the city parks. At the South Port the Queen was received by the magistrates and town-council, and the Lord Provost, in elegant court attire, presented the keys of the city, which were graciously received and returned by the Sovereign. The gates of the city were now thrown open, and her Majesty and retinue passed through under a magnificent triumphal arch which had been erected for the occasion. The magistrates and council, in carriages guarded by the high constables, escorted the Sovereign and retinue through the city, passing through Prince's-street, St. John's-street, and George-street, to the bridge. Every opening in the streets was fitted up with platforms, and every window crowded with a well-dressed and joyful population. As her Majesty passed along, the densely thronged multitudes rent the air with their deafening cheers, and the waving of handkerchiefs from the casements indicated the universal joy. Her Majesty appeared in excellent spirits, and received and returned the gratulations with much condescension and grace. The multitude which passed into Perth from all quarters during the night, and throughout the course of the day, was beyond all precedent. Not fewer than from 40,000 to 50,000 strangers were added to the population. In the evening 500 gentlemen sat down to a sumptuous banquet in the County-hall in honour of the royal visit, while bonfires and coloured lights illumined the neighbouring heights. Her Majesty honoured the Earl of Mansfield, by dining at Scone Palace at eight o'clock. She is to sleep in the same royal residence. May she enjoy "pleasing dreams and slumbers light."

SCONE PALACE.—Her Majesty left Scone Palace at eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning, and arrived at Dunkeld at half-past one. The carriage stopped in the Bowling-green, and her Majesty having alighted, took the arm of Prince Albert, and slowly walked round the green, manifesting, by her gratified looks, the admiration with which she beheld the gallant array of Lord Glenlyon's clansmen, who had assembled to the number of not less than a thousand, all clad in "the garb of old Gaul." The spectacle was of the most animating description; and the bells rang a merry peal in honour of the illustrious pair. Having changed horses, the royal carriage proceeded on its route, to Taymouth Castle, amidst continued acclamations.

THE KING OF HANOVER.—"Dusseldorf, Sept. 6, 1842.—A report having been generally spread that his Majesty the King of Hanover died here last night, I hasten to inform you that this is not the fact, but that his Majesty is lying seriously indisposed at Prince Solms's Palace in this town. The symptoms, I hear, are dangerous."—Times.

COOMBES AND NEWELL.—The great sculler's match, for £100, between these men, was decided on Thursday. The men to row from Westminster-bridge to Putney. They started at a quarter past four; and Newell took the lead, which he increased at Wandsworth to 150 yards, and then shipped a wave which filled his wherry, and she went down, Newell having just time to get into his cutter. Coombes then rowed close in shore, and arrived at Putney a few minutes before five, winning the match, much to the disappointment of Newell.

THE DONCASTER ST. LEGER.—The following is Thursday's betting at Tattersall's:—6 to 4 agst Colonel Anson's Attila; 8 to 1 agst Mr. Ramsay's Cabrera (10 to 1 taken once); 11 to 1 agst Mr. Forth's Policy (taken); 12 to 1 agst Mr. Ferguson's Fireaway (taken); 14 to 1 agst Mr. Meiklam's Agreeable colt (taken); 14 to 1 agst Colonel Peel's Seahorse (taken); 16 to 1 agst Mr. Coombe's Rosalind (taken); 30 to 1 agst Lord Chesterfield's Artful Dodger (taken).

At Warwick, on Thursday, the betting was 3 to 1 agst Attila (offered), 8 to 1 agst Cabrera, 10 to 1 agst Seahorse, 15 to 1 agst Rosalind, 30 to 1 agst Palladium. The others as before. The general impression here is that Attila is "gone"

SALFORD SESSIONS, Wednesday.—Sentences have been passed on several of the late rioters. They were placed in batches before the chairman and bench of magistrates; and after being addressed by the chairman, received sentences, varying from two years' imprisonment to one month, and finding sureties for good behaviour.

POLICE.—THAMES OFFICE.—On Thursday Captain Philip Partridge, late master of the ship Jarrow, of Liverpool, was brought before Mr. Ballantine for final examination, charged with the wilful murder of three Spanish seamen on the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England. The prisoner was formally committed to Newgate for trial at the next Old Bailey sessions.

William Parry has been brought up at Union-hall, charged with stabbing Elizabeth Diggle, and inflicting a severe wound on her arm. He was committed on the charge.

Edith Rouse was re-examined at Guildhall, charged with stealing three diamond rings, value £40, the property of Mrs. Greenhaugh, of Smithfield-bars. A further remand was made.

Several paupers of the Greenwich Union were brought up at the police-office of that town on Thursday, charged with disorderly conduct there, and purposely tearing their clothes to pieces, leaving themselves naked in the ward. Three were sentenced to one month's imprisonment, three for twenty-one days, and the remainder for fourteen days, in Maidstone gaol.

FROM OUR LATE EDITION OF LAST WEEK.

BARTHOLOMEW FAIR.—The Lord Mayor, in compliance with the resolutions passed by the Markets Committee, proclaimed on Saturday morning Bartholomew Fair at twelve o'clock, without the customary state ceremonies. He walked in plain clothes, accompanied by a few members of the household, to that part of Smithfield which is called Cloth Fair, and there opened the fair by proclamation. As there is not a single show or wild-beast exhibition, roundabout, or swing, there was very little interest excited. The fair is to be closed on Tuesday night, at eleven o'clock, when all the public-houses will be cleared. Bartholomew fair may now be said to be defunct.

GOSPORT, Friday.—A lamentable occurrence took place this morning. A party of convicts, with their keepers, and a file of soldiers to look after them, were taken on shore to work in a field near Haslar Hospital. The sentinels had orders not to let the convicts go beyond certain distances. One of the keepers, named Closby, was going beyond the proscribed distance, when one of the sentinels, named William Davis, of the 6th Foot, called to him (supposing him to be a convict) to return; but Closby, being deaf, paid no attention to the order, and the sentinel levelled his musket, and shot him dead on the spot. He is now in custody.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

AFFGHANISTAN, INDIA, AND CHINA.

The mail from India has arrived, and we have papers and letters to the 19th of July. The intelligence which they communicate, although of considerable interest, is not of a striking character.

The state of the war in Affghanistan continued to be the subject of warm discussion throughout India, and the most conflicting rumours were in circulation as to the decision of the Governor General. A large army of reserve is to be formed in the district of Sirhind, under the command of Sir Jasper Nicoll.

Events of varied importance have occurred in Affghanistan. The fort of Khelat-i-Ghilzie has been evacuated in consequence of the concentration of General Nott's division at Candahar. The Affghans, however, attacked the place in considerable force on the morning of the 21st of May: they were repulsed with considerable loss. The official despatches published by the Governor-General at Allahabad on the 2nd of July represent the conduct of Captain J. H. Craigie and his troops as worthy of the highest praise.

Official details have been published of the attempt made by Akbbar Khan, chief of Zemindawur, at the head of 3000 men, to take the city of Candahar by surprise. On their appearance on the 29th of May, General Nott sallied out at the head of a number of his remaining troops, and soon routed them completely.

From Jellalabad accounts are conflicting of the state of the troops, some exaggerating their want of comforts and the prevalence of sickness. On the other side, the fact is known, that instead of retiring, General Pollock had sent out a detachment to attack some forts ten miles to the southward. Unanimity and good feeling continued to animate all the troops there, and a strong desire was exhibited for going forward to Cabul, in order to avenge their slaughtered countrymen, and to wipe out the stain from the honour of the British Indian army.

The Affghans were divided among themselves, some being eager for forming conventions and terms of amity with the British. The report of money being collected in the Bala Hissar roused the cupidity of Akbbar Khan and his followers; they, therefore, laid siege to that fort, and completed a large mine under one of the bastions, which they blew up with such want of skill as to kill numbers of their own men. The Arabs, terrified by the news that the British had blown up the fortifications of Khelat-i-Ghilzie, induced their young sovereign to surrender himself and his fort and his treasures to the tender mercies of the notorious Akbbar, who was afterwards said to be appointed vizier.

The latest news from Jellalabad represented the troops as on the best terms with the natives, who furnished all sorts of supplies. The detachment sent to the southward had received a promise of having 32,000 rupees, buried by Captain Ferris during the retreat of last year, and which the natives had discovered, made good to that officer.

There were strange rumours current then among the Walnees near Jellalabad; one of which was, that Akbbar Khan having been persuaded by Futteh Jung to enter the Bala Hissar, was there detained a prisoner. The fact, if it be confirmed, cannot fail to produce the most important results. The movement of General Pollock's division on to Cabul, a distance of ninety miles, was positively asserted to have been decided on. The presence of the 7000 Sikh troops at Jellalabad was calculated to facilitate his progress.

In the interior of India tranquillity prevailed. The disturbances in Bundelkund, which are described as periodic, were to be put down by 5000 men, who were ordered to occupy those districts after the rainy season. The inhabitants are said to be always tranquil during the presence of troops.

From China the intelligence reaches to the 27th of May, up to which day no movement of importance had taken place. The auxiliary or additional troops, for which the British Plenipotentiary appeared to be waiting, had not arrived, but were hourly expected. As soon as they arrived, it was, as stated, his intention to proceed to the northward, and to begin operations in the most decided manner.

According to report the Emperor had been so much frightened at the threatened approach of the English to Pekin, that he gave his fatherly advice to his Chinese subjects to defend themselves as well as they could against the foreign barbarians, after which he fled with his family into Tartary, the country of his ancestors. It will be curious to find China soon governed again by one of its own race under the protection of the British Queen.

The only remarkable event in Bombay was that another ship, laden with a valuable cargo, called the Adelaide, was burnt on the departure for the eastward. Some persons were taken up on suspicion as incendiaries, but no proof could be established. A large reward was offered for the conviction of the incendiaries.

THE QUEEN'S TOUR.

The royal squadron, after passing Tynemouth Castle, on the south-east point of the Northumberland coast, at twelve on Wednesday forenoon, bore down along the coast, within seven or eight miles of it, owing to the sea being smoother than it was outside the roads, in which track it had progressed from Orfordness, and the wind blowing a strong breeze off the land. The weather subsequently became beautifully fine, and the sun shone with all its mighty brilliancy, and the appearance of the Royal George yacht, with the standard of England floating from its mast-head, guarded as it was by the fleet of steamers gaily adorned with colours, &c., was of a character truly imposing. The Black Eagle and Shearwater were still towing her Majesty's yacht, the Monkey steamer being considerably ahead; the Salamander and Rhadamanthus, with the rest of the government steamers, following close in the rear.

Many of the steamers belonging to Shields, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, which met the squadron off Tynemouth Castle, accompanied it for twenty or thirty miles. Each of them had bands of music on board, while the decks were crowded with well-dressed people, and as the vessels brought up, her Majesty and Prince Albert were greeted with prolonged cheering, which they gracefully acknowledged, the bands at the same moment playing "God save the Queen" and "Rule Britannia." Numberless colliers passed to the southward in the course of the day, with colours flying from all parts of their rigging, the crews of which testified their loyalty by giving three hearty cheers as they passed.

Shortly after two o'clock that day, her Majesty's royal yacht arrived abreast of Warkworth-harbour, where she was received with a glorious welcome. In the early part of the forenoon, most of the gentry and respectable tradesmen of the town, attended by a military band, proceeded out to sea, on board of the Warkworth steamer, to meet the squadron, and flags were hoisted at the entrance of the harbour.

Upon the squadron arriving off the heights of Ratcliff Craigs, a few miles from Alnwick, it was welcomed by a roar of heavy artillery from a battery erected specially for the occasion by the Duke of Northumberland, who it is said, was present with the Duchess, and made signals, which were duly answered on board the Royal George yacht.

At about a quarter after four, her Majesty passed the delightful seat of Earl Grey on the seashore, where the coast guard service, by his lordship's direction, fired a royal salute, both on its appearance and departure. During the evening the Royal George yacht, in bearing down towards the extreme northerly point of the Northumberland coast, the wind still in the north-west quarter, hoisted her jib, fore-stay-sail, and flying jib, but continued being towed by the two steamers.

Her Majesty, with the royal squadron, passed Dunbar on Wednesday about 10 o'clock P.M. A battery, placed at Dunbar harbour for the express purpose, fired a royal salute, which was acknowledged by several rockets from the royal squadron. The Monarch was the first to descry the royal squadron. The Monarch then proceeded on her course, and met the royal fleet off Eyemouth. The Monarch put round, and in excellent style delivered a royal salute (21 guns); afterwards this vessel took her position at a respectful distance alongside the royal yacht. A cry then succeeded to man the yards, and to stand by to give three cheers with a will. These were given with a hearty and enthusiastic effect. At this time it was observed that her Majesty was reclining on a couch between the main and mizen mast, while Prince Albert was pacing the deck close by. The cheering must have been distinctly heard on board the Royal George yacht, as her Majesty was observed to rise and graciously acknowledge the loyal demonstration by repeated acknowledgments. Prince Albert was standing at the foot of the couch, and immediately behind the couch was a naval officer, whom we supposed to be Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, the commander of the royal yacht. Her Majesty wore a tartan shawl and pink bonnet. About this time the Trident steamer, belonging to the General Steam Navigation Company, came up from Granton; the Monarch and Trident then dropped astern, and fell into the wake of the royal squadron. In this manner they proceeded for some time, when it was proposed on board the Monarch to get up a Scottish reel. Shortly after this active and national festivity commenced, we could distinctly observe Prince Albert drawing the attention of her Majesty to the gay scene, in which the royal party seemed to be greatly interested. Night was now drawing on, and lights were hoisted at the fore-topmast, mizenmast, mizen-peak, and a brilliant one below the main-cap. The Monarch, about ten miles to the eastward of Inchkeith, left the royal squadron, which was now hugging the southern shore, with the apparent intention of taking the inner passage. At half-past one o'clock the Monarch arrived off Granton, and it was then supposed the royal squadron had anchored in Aberlady Bay.

EDINBURGH, Thursday, Sept. 1.—Her Majesty is at length arrived in Scotland, after a more protracted voyage from Woolwich than was expected by those whose loyalty and good wishes exceeded their nautical knowledge, and whose expectation and zeal did not allow them to calculate upon the vicissitudes of wind and weather, from which even royalty itself is not exempt. The account which was published throughout this city last evening that her Majesty was off Granton at ten o'clock, was premature by some hours, for it was not until past three o'clock this morning that the royal yacht was off Inchkeith, and it was between seven and eight o'clock that she came alongside the pier, towed by the Shearwater and Black Eagle steamers. It was shortly after eight o'clock that her Majesty and Prince Albert landed on the pier, and, without waiting longer than was absolutely necessary for the carriages, &c., they took their seats in an open barouche, and the procession began to move. At this time all was confusion, the landing of her Majesty at so early an hour was totally unexpected, and everybody was taken by surprise. The Lord Provost and the civic functionaries, not being aware of the decision by which her Majesty's movements are governed, were not in time to receive her at the place set forth in the printed proclamation issued from the Council-chamber, nor was the body-guard of archers at the spot on which her Majesty landed in time to fall into procession; they were, however, in time to meet the royal carriage before it had proceeded very far, and they formed a very splendid and national guard. Many of the public bodies who were to have been marshalled into the procession were nowhere to be seen, and at length the Lord Provost and others of the magistracy, finding themselves too late to take the places originally designed for them, made the best of their way round Regent-terrace, and at last came up with the cortège; there was, however, no opportunity for the presentation of the keys of the city to her Majesty, and the programme, elaborately drawn up and placarded, became a perfectly dead letter. The royal cortège consisted of two carriages, besides that in which her Majesty and the Prince were seated, containing attendants, &c., the whole escorted by the Royal Archers and the squadron of the Inniskillen Dragoons already mentioned; the companies of the 53rd Regiment of the line following, the whole under the immediate command of Sir N. Douglas, who rode close to her Majesty's carriage, accompanied by several other officers. The early hour, however, at which her Majesty landed, the pace at which the procession moved along at some points of the road, the totally unprepared state of the magistracy, and the unexpected determination not to wait till a later hour in the day, completely spoiled the whole effect of the procession, and disappointed many thousands of persons of all classes; indeed, nothing could exceed the disappointment incurred, or reconcile the crowds, who arrived just in time to be too late, to the belief that her Majesty had already got nearly to the end of the city, and was on her way to Dalkeith. The mob continued to collect in great numbers about ten o'clock, and continued for upwards of two hours to crowd the streets, staring at each other and asking the question a thousand times over, of every passer-by, "Have you seen the Queen?" To which the answer was, nine times in ten, "No; has she passed?" The Lord Provost meanwhile having summoned the Council to know what, under the circumstances, was to be done, at one o'clock issued the following proclamation, dated Council-chamber, one o'clock:—

"PUBLIC NOTICE.—Owing to the early hour at which the Queen landed this morning, the arrangements made yesterday for informing the public of her Majesty's entry into the city could not be carried through; and the Council having subsequently met, resolved on proceeding forthwith to Dalkeith Palace, with the view of representing to her Majesty their regret that the keys had not been delivered at the barrier, and that the public had not had the anticipated opportunity of testifying their loyalty and devoted attachment to her Majesty. JAMES FORREST, Lord Provost."

EDINBURGH, FRIDAY MORNING, Sept. 2.—The disappointment on Thursday morning was the theme of conversation the whole of the remainder of the day; groups were to be seen at the corners of all the principal streets, discussing the causes from which they considered it to have arisen, and imputing blame to this or that person, as conjecture, political feeling, or party prejudices dictated. In the hotels and taverns, in the coffee-rooms, the news-rooms, and the club-houses, the same sort of discussion was going on. The grand subscribers are not so much those who erected the stands and seats for the spectators in the streets through which it was expected the procession would pass, as those who paid for places in them, because the owners of these temporary buildings had the precaution to get paid for their tickets of admission the day before, and the purchasers were, therefore, the losers both of their money and the anticipated sight.

But to whatever cause the disappointment and confusion are to be attributed, all persons are unanimous in attaching no blame to the illustrious lady in whose honour and to show respect to whom the preperations for the reception were made; and if anything had been wanting to assure the most sceptical of her gracious condescension to the wishes of her Scottish subjects, it was given in the answer transmitted to the Lord Provost and the city authorities at Dalkeith. Her majesty most graciously expressed her will to meet the desires of the inhabitants and strangers in Edinburgh, and her regret that the manner of her entrance and passage through the city should have caused any disappointment.

The report that the scarlet fever having made its appearance at Holyrood-house would prevent her Majesty from holding her court therein, according to the original announcement, has unfortunately proved to be correct, and in consequence she will hold her court at Dalkeith on Monday next, of which a notice has been issued by authority. Last night the whole of this great city was illuminated in honour of the royal visit to Scotland, and certainly a more splendid sight was never witnessed.

The crowds of people in the streets were immense; it was a living stream of human beings, all in good humour, and all actuated and brought together by the best feelings of veneration and loyalty towards Queen Victoria.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived at Dalkeith Palace about eleven o'clock, entering by the Lugton approach. The beautiful demesne was thronged with ladies and gentlemen, admitted by tickets, who enthusiastically cheered the royal pair. Immediately on the auspicious event being announced in Dalkeith, the bells rang a merry peal, and a union jack was hoisted on the steeple.

Bailie Richardson and Mr. A. Black arrived at the Palace about one o'clock, in a carriage and four, with state liveries, and shortly after were followed by nearly the whole members of council in open carriages, that containing the Lord Provost being drawn by six horses.

The Duke of Argyll, with some members of his family, arrived at Dalkeith Palace about half-past one o'clock, to pay his respects to her Majesty. By the way, we may mention here, that if the Queen had extended her tour to the country of the Macallummore, his grace was expected to turn out 1500 Highlanders, to whom his kinsman, the Chieftain of Islay, would have added 500 more.

The guard of honour at Dalkeith is composed of a party of the 53rd Infantry. Flags are flying on the rampart of the venerable ruin of Craigmillar Castle, once the favourite residence of the unfortunate Mary.

Sir Robert Peel reached Granton-pier at an early hour in the morning, and as soon as the royal yacht came alongside the Premier went on board, and, after rendering the usual homage to her Majesty, he entered into conversation, which appeared to be carried on on the part of the Queen with great liveliness and condescension. Soon afterwards his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch joined the royal party, and remained for some time in conversation with her Majesty and Prince Albert while preparations were making for the royal landing.

We have heard, and regret to say, that her Majesty suffered a good deal from sea-sickness during the voyage, which compelled her, as far as possible, to keep on deck, where a couch was prepared for her accommodation. This may account in some degree for the Queen's anxiety to get ashore as soon as possible; and all who have felt the nausea of sickness during a considerable voyage know full well the longing to get on terra firma.

The Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council returned from Dalkeith Palace at four o'clock, and on reaching the Royal Exchange were received with great cheering by the populace. The Lord Provost, from his carriage, addressed the collected crowd, stating generally, that her Majesty had been graciously pleased to depart from all her arrangements, in order to please her people; that the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council had been received courteously and most politely by her Majesty; and that she had expressed deep regret for the disappointment which had been occasioned this morning. (Cheering.)

His Lordship then read the following memorandum:—"Upon waiting on her Majesty's ministers this morning, at Dalkeith Palace, we had the satisfaction of learning that her Majesty had been previously pleased to anticipate the wishes of the Town-council and the people of Edinburgh, and had signified her intention to pass from Dalkeith to the Castle on Saturday next, entering the city by the Palace of Holyrood, and passing up the Canongate." (Tremendous cheering.)

PLAN OF THE ROYAL PROGRESS THROUGH PERTHSHIRE.

Upon leaving Scone Palace after breakfast the royal party will proceed to Dunkeld (an original view of which we give in this page), by Perth and Bankfoot. The first accounts, which represented that her Majesty would only change horses at Dunkeld, have been erroneous; inasmuch as it has been ascertained that the royal party will stop for some hours to partake of the hospitality of the Duchess of Atholl, and enjoy the celebrated scenery of the place. If the weather be favourable, the Queen, Prince Albert, and suite will take luncheon on the lawn adjacent to the flower-garden, near which an encampment of some hundreds of Atholl Highlanders, fully equipped, will be formed. Of these, Lord Glenlyon is to supply 150 from his Blair estates; Faskally, Balnakeilly, and the other proprietors of the district in proportion. It is deeply to be regretted that the above noble lord's state of health will, it is feared, prevent his representing the noble family of Atholl on this occasion, as the same cause has of late kept the venerable Duchess very retired. The route from Dunkeld to Taymouth will be by the Bishopric and Aberfeldy-road, which will be adorned by triumphal arches at various picturesque places.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, PERTH.

The preparations at Taymouth have already been described. The muster of the Campbell's following will be considerably increased by the levies among the adjoining districts, most of whose proprietors have handsomely seconded the views of Lord Breadalbane. Considerable quantities of armour and accoutrements have been supplied from the Ordnance stores; and, as the noble Marquis has kindly invited all who can dress themselves in the full Highland garb to appear on the grounds, the scene will be highly picturesque. His Lordship has also been pleased to announce that the parks will be thrown open to all ranks during the exhibition of fireworks which is to take place upon Taymouth-green. A grand ball is to take place in the evening at the Castle, to which a very general invitation to the fair sex of all classes of the neighbourhood has been given.

The period of the sojourn of the royal visitors at Taymouth is understood to be from Tuesday to Friday at noon, when the party will leave by Amulree and Glenalmond for Drummond Castle. Here Lord and Lady Willoughby d'Eresby have invited the tenantry of their Perth estates to meet in the afternoon of the above day, and welcome their Sovereign. Her Majesty and Consort will be received by the noble host himself, and seven other noblemen and gentlemen, heads of the branches of the Drummond line.

Two hundred of the clan, richly dressed, will be drawn up in the park, and the tenantry on horseback, each in a plaid of Drummond tartan. The provision making by this noble family for the accommodation of all classes of their tenantry on this occasion is in consistence with their conduct towards them on all occasions. For the reception of the distinguished company invited to meet the royal guests a new drawing-room has been erected—the short notice only admitting of a temporary one of wood, to be hung round with drapery of the Drummond tartan. The service of gold and silver plate in the Castle is supposed to be unequalled in the kingdom; comprehending, in addition to that of the ancient houses of Lancaster, Willoughby d'Eresby, Gwydyr, and Perth, those memorials of the services at the two last coronations which fell to the noble lord in his character of hereditary High Chamberlain. In addition to the attraction of a lengthened stay here, which the friendship of the royal guests to their noble hosts supplies, the near neighbourhood of the finest grouse-shooting and deer-stalking grounds in the country, for so keen a sportsman as Prince Albert, will, it is presumed, exert some influence on the arrangements of the royal party. It is understood that her Majesty and party will remain here from Friday till the Tuesday following at all events; and when they depart, it will be, as formerly stated, by way of Stirling (in another column we give an original view of Stirling Castle) and Linlithgow to Dalkeith.

STIRLING CASTLE, N.B.—The Master-General of the Ordnance, the Right Hon. General Sir George Murray, arrived at this ancient palace on Tuesday last, en route to Edinburgh, and expressed his conviction that her Majesty and Prince Albert would pay a short visit to the castle on their way from Drummond Castle to Dalkeith Palace to embark for London. The Jameses always held their court at Stirling, which was also the battle ground of Scottish independence. Her Majesty, it is understood, on leaving Stirling, will proceed vid Falkirk, Linlithgow, and Kirkliston, to Dalkeith Palace.

Unless an exception is to be made in favour of the county and city of Perth (an original sketch of which will be found in this number), in consequence of the Queen's visit being chiefly to be spent within it, the reception of the keys of the city will be the only public ceremonial at which her Majesty will personally receive the homage of her subjects in this quarter. The scene is as near as the extension of the town will admit, to the spot where James VI. and Charles I. received the same homage. The only surviving relic of these times, we regret to say, will be the fantastic dress of the morris dancer, one of thirteen members of the Glover Incorporation, who performed the celebrated "sword dance" before the last-mentioned sovereign. This dress has been carefully preserved, with its silk trappings and bells, as a precious heirloom, by the above body, and is in excellent preservation. The only other monument of antiquity which her Majesty will pass on her progress through the city, is the ancient church of St. John, which has been rendered more interesting in the pages of the great novelist, than its present modernized appearance will confirm. At the western end of the bridge her Majesty will pass under a triumphal arch of flowers and plants, and a similar memorial will decorate the eastern extremity.

In addition to these marks of respect from the city officials, there will be not a few public expressions of loyalty on the part of individuals. Near Perth, the first of these will be at the bridge of Earn, where a triumphal arch will be erected by Lady Moncrieffe, and who has also prepared some pieces of ordnance on the top of the celebrated Moredun, or Moncrieffe-hill, to give her Majesty a royal salute on passing. Mr. Turnbull has provided a similar display at Bellwood. In the evening a splendid show of fireworks will be exhibited from the North Inch; and as near as can be ascertained to the moment when her Majesty will enter the drawing-room of Scone Palace a beautiful display of blue or coloured lights will take place from the eastern side of the Town's Muir. The pyrotechnic display will be under the direction of Professor Anderson, and the first workmen in that department have been engaged, to make the exhibition worthy of the occasion.

In the evening, as formerly mentioned, a banquet will be given in the county-room, at the city's expense, to 300 gentlemen of the place, including those filling public situations; the Lord Provost in the chair. On the following evening a ball will take place in the same room, which has been politely granted by the county gentlemen for both occasions. In order that all classes should have the means and the opportunity of socially enjoying themselves on this occasion, the city has voted £125 to be distributed among 1000 of the humbler classes of citizens, who are to be provided with white rods, and act as additional conservators of the peace in the streets during the procession. Each pauper on the poor's roll will also receive 1s.

The preparations for the accommodation of the public in general, are on a scale which promises to answer even the unexampled demand which may be expected. The line of Prince's-street on both sides, which is mostly vacant ground, is fitting up with scaffolding. The Grand Stand of the Perth Hunt (liberally granted for the occasion) is to be erected immediately adjoining the gateway: and already the front seats, which are let at a guinea each, have been all appropriated, as also most of the second, at 15s. The remaining tiers have reduced prices affixed, and we have no doubt will be all engaged. The proceeds are to be applied for the benefit of the County and City Infirmary. Every precaution is taking by the authorities for the preservation of order.

It deserves to be noticed, as a coincidence on the present memorable occasion, that, according to some authors of note, the ancient Romans designed the now Fair City of Perth, by the auspicious word "Victoria."

THE PALACE OF SCONE.—Few places present such claims to the notice of strangers as Scone, of which we gave a view in our last,—long the residence of royalty, the metropolis of the kingdom, and the theatre on which many important scenes were represented. The approaching visit of her most Gracious Majesty naturally adds to the interest with which everything connected with its history is invested; and a few memoranda of its antiquities, history, and present state may, therefore, not be out of place. The former chiefly consists of the well-known Fatal or Coronation Stone; the Mote Hill, or ancient palace of justice; the remains of the Abbey; and within doors, of various monuments of antiquity. With regard to its history, as connected with the coronation of our Scottish kings, we may here shortly mention that Charles II. was the last Sovereign crowned within its walls. The pretender James, in his short attempt in 1715, fixed his residence here, and held a council on the 16th of January, 1716, when he issued several proclamations, among which was one for his own coronation upon the 23rd of the same month. The approach of the royal army, however, prevented that ceremony taking place; and with the departure of that prince, Scone ceased to be the scene of any important event in the history of Scotland. Of the ancient abbey only the aisle now remains, which is used as a receptacle for the ashes of the noble family to whom it belongs. It contains one monument of tolerable sculpture—viz., that of Sir David Murray, ancestor of Earl Mansfield, the present proprietor of the place. Sir David's figure is placed in an attitude of devotion, with a long inscription, recording his lineage, offices, and virtues. We shall only add that the revenues of the abbey were very considerable at the time of the Reformation. They amounted to £1140 6s. 6d. Scots money, besides sixteen chaldrons and two firlots of wheat; seventy-three chaldrons, thirteen bolls, two firlots, and two pecks of barley; sixty-two chaldrons of meal; eighteen chaldrons and three bolls of oats; and one last of salmon. Scone was erected into a temporal lordship by James VI. in 1604, in favour of Sir David Murray, of Gospetre, a cadet of the house of Tullibardine. The present Earl Mansfield is a lineal descendant of that family. The house so long known by the title of the palace of Scone was begun by the Earl of Gourie, and completed by Sir David Murray about the year 1606. A very great portion of this palace was taken down in 1803 to give place to the present building. Part of the old walls, though but a small part, on the south side, are kept standing. The present house has still a gallery on the same spot, and nearly of the same dimensions with the old one; while at the same time any of the old furniture, or antique monuments, worth preserving are retained. Among these the most interesting relic is a piece of tapestry, said to have been executed by the unfortunate Queen Mary, during her confinement in Lochleven Castle. The great gallery, which is about 155 feet long, contains some old paintings in water colours, chiefly hunting pieces, in which King James and his train figure alongside of Nimrod! The situation of Scone Palace is picturesque in the highest degree. The parks and lawns consist nearly of 1000 acres, and the present earl has just completed a new approach on the southern side at great expense. The pleasure grounds are laid but in the finest taste; and nothing which fortune or taste could command or direct has been spared to render this place as attractive in its natural beauties as it is from its historical associations. It may not be out of place to notice that Scone gave birth to the great Lord Mansfield, a distinguished name in the English judicatory.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—The pleasure of the day, we are truly sorry to state, was marred by an accident which took place by the falling of a large scaffold erected at the bottom of the Mound, a few minutes after her Majesty had passed. The eagerness to obtain a sight of the royal train, had induced a very great number of spectators to occupy this station; and, from the pressure, it gave way with a loud crash, which spread an immediate alarm among the people. Many gentlemen hastened to the spot to extricate the sufferers. The most prompt attention was immediately given by all the medical men; among whom we observed Dr. Alison, Dr. Craigie, Dr. Glover, Dr. Dunsmure, Dr. Moir, Dr. Reid, and others. The sufferers were conveyed some to the gardener's house and others to the infirmary. In consequence of the crowding of the people to the spot, it was found necessary to procure a body of dragoons to clear a space through which to convey the sufferers. A lady, who was very severely hurt, died on Saturday afternoon; Mr. Dickson, painter, died on Sunday; and, it is feared, that another case will prove fatal. Various opinions are abroad regarding the causes of the accident; but, as the matter is at present under judicial investigation, we forbear entering into them. One thing seems to be admitted on all hands, that there was a rush of persons to the gallery more than it would hold. We subjoin an apparently official report from Professor Millar upon the subject, from which it will be seen that nearly all the injured persons are recovering.

"Edinburgh, 23, York Place, Sept. 4, 1842.—I have examined and inquired into the various cases of injury occasioned by the unfortunate accident of yesterday, so far as circumstances have permitted. I have to report that one person is dead, and that another is so seriously hurt as to preclude the hope of recovery; that not a few fractures have been sustained, both of legs and arms; and that many bruises, sprains, and slighter injuries have occured, swelling the number of those hurt to about fifty. But I am glad to say, that, excepting the two cases first mentioned, there is no prospect of further loss either of life or limb.

(Signed) "JAS. MILLAR, Professor of Surgery."

DALKEITH, Monday Night.—This morning his Royal Highness Prince Albert rode into Edinburgh, accompanied by the Duke of Buccleuch, and visited the Royal Institution, and some of the other public establishments of the city. He was in town as early as ten o'clock.

THE PRESENTATION.

Her Majesty's presentation took place at Dalkeith to-day, shortly before two o'clock. All the presentable persons in Edinburgh had the honour of being presented to her Majesty. There were upwards of 2000 presented, a large proportion of whom were ladies. The cortège of carriages was upwards of three miles in length; but it was by no means distinguished for the style of the several vehicles. Her Majesty occupied the centre of the drawing-room at Dalkeith House, facing the middle window, and before the fireplace. She was surrounded by the state-officers in attendance upon the royal person in Scotland. Her Majesty looked in excellent health and strength, and, notwithstanding the great fatigue of receiving so many individuals, seemed in capital spirits. A military band, that of the 53rd Regiment, was stationed on the lawn, in front of the house, playing favourite pieces of music. The day was, on the whole, what may be termed fine for this country—that is to say, it rained every third hour for about twenty or thirty minutes at a time. Nothing, however, was capable of damping the loyalty of her Majesty's loving subjects—not even the severity of a Scotch mist—and they stood it out with wonderful determination. The ceremony was over about five o'clock. The little town of Dalkeith was crowded with people. The first division of her Majesty's household leaves Dalkeith at six o'clock to-morrow morning. Her Majesty leaves at half-past eight with the royal cortège.

THE VICTORIA-HALL.—During the time her Majesty was in the Castle on Saturday, the foundation-stone of the Victoria hall, and the buildings erecting for the accommodation of the General Assembly, was laid by Lord Frederick Fitzclarence, G.C.H., Grand Master Mason of Scotland. His Lordship, besides the Grand Lodge, was accompanied by about 300 of the brethren, composed of many deputations from lodges in the provinces. The Sovereign, as she passed to and from the castle, noticed in an especial manner the Grand Master by repeatedly bowing to him, and waving her hand. The ceremony within the great tower of the hall, though short, was most solemn; and the addresses of the Grand Master and Grand Chaplain were couched in terms at once elegant and impressive.

ROYAL VISIT TO DALMENY PARK.—Her Majesty, having got clear of the city, the royal carriages stopped for about three minutes at Blackhall, near Craigleith, where they were furnished with fresh horses. The cortège then proceeded at a rapid rate to Dalmeny Park, where that kind-hearted and distinguished nobleman, the Earl of Rosebery, had made every preparation for the royal reception. Dalmeny Park is one of the most beautiful seats, as we have before said, in the lowlands of Scotland, whether we look to the extent of the grounds, varied as they are by hill and dale, meadow and forest scenery, or the fine expanse of water to the north—the Forth bounding his lordship's property here for several miles. The splendid suite of apartments looking to the north were thrown open on this occasion, consisting of dining-room, billiard-room, drawing-room, and library; a grand corridor, with carved roof, joining the entrance-hall, and running parallel and behind this suite of apartments. Exactly at two o'clock the Dragoons forming the escort were seen to emerge from the crowded avenue, and in a few seconds the welcome cheers of the crowd announced the royal carriage. At this time the rain, which commenced shortly after one o'clock, continued to fall, but this did not in the least abate the anxiety of the people to keep their places. The royal carriage was covered behind, so that many had but an imperfect view, but which was in the sequel amply afforded. At the entrance, which was laid with red cloth, her Majesty and Prince Albert were received by the Earl and Countess of Rosebery, and conducted through the grand corridor into the billiard-room, and thence to the drawing-room.

After the déjeûné the guests at the royal table joined general company in the drawing-room. The crowd having remained stationary all the time, notwithstanding the rain, in order to witness the departure of her Majesty, the joyful intelligence was announced to them, that her Majesty and Prince Albert would come to the library window, and that they might now occupy the lawn, and come close up to the mansion. A general rush then took place to the wished-for spot, and shortly afterwards, the Earl of Rosebery having thrown open the window of the library, her Majesty presented herself, and was received with deafening cheers. Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm caused by this instance of her Majesty's kind consideration for her people, seeing that the rain had precluded a promenade on the lawn. Cheer succeeded cheer as the Queen stood for several minutes smiling and viewing the lively scene with great good humour, while conversing with Lord Rosebery. His Royal Highness was also standing at the same window with the Countess of Rosebery, and appeared to be equally delighted with his reception. Two of the grandchildren of the noble Earl, one in arms (the interesting offspring of the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Bouverie Primrose), were also observed among the royal party, and whom her Majesty kindly noticed. The band of the Enniskillen Dragoons commenced playing the royal anthem on her Majesty's appearance at the window; and the whole scene was animating in the extreme.

After having remained in this hospitable mansion for nearly two hours, her Majesty and Prince Albert took their departure; the Prince first entered the carriage, and her Majesty followed, leaning on the arm of the Earl of Rosebery. The royal pair were again greeted with loud acclamations as they drove off. The Duke of Buccleuch and the Earl of Liverpool following on horseback, and the whole of the distinguished company soon afterwards departed.

PROVINCIAL.

HOP INTELLIGENCE.

(From the Maidstone Journal.)

MAIDSTONE, Sept. 5.—The picking having now become general in this parish and the adjoining districts, a better estimate may be made of the present crop. In many instances the hops are found to be small, consequently the measure per acre will be less; but no deficiency will be found in the weight of the golden hops, and it is thought the produce will meet about the previous expectation in quantity, but more than realised in quality, which it appears will prove similar to the excellent growth of 1832.

EAST MALLING, LEYBOURNE, AND DITTON.—Our planters have generally began their pickings in these parishes. In most cases the hops "come down" very small, and the crop will not prove so much as expected, the drought having proved too much for the plant.

WEST MALLING, RYARSH, AND OFFHAM.—In this district most of the hops are remarkably good for their bines. Those planters who began their "golden hops" last week, are daily securing fine samples, some of which, already picked, are superior to any growth of late years. The "farina" with which the finer sorts abound, will leave no room this season for the merchant to complain of the "want of condition" in our samples; the crop will be something short of last year.

BOUGHTON, CHART, AND SUTTON.—Hop-picking is generally commenced in these parts. They come down exceedingly fine, and quite equal to expectation. On the low clay soils the produce will not be more than one quarter of the crop of last year.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO IRELAND.—We have reason to believe that the Queen and her royal consort, Prince Albert, have most graciously signified their intention to visit Ireland during the ensuing summer or autumn. It is generally believed in the court circle that her Majesty was desirous of giving the preference to Ireland this year, and that the only bar to her wishes in that respect was the Repeal agitation.—Dublin Packet.

EDINBURGH AND GLASGOW RAILWAY.—THE QUEEN'S VISIT.—Not the least remarkable effect of her Majesty's visit to the metropolis was the extraordinary run of passengers upon the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway. The receipts, so far as can be estimated in the mean time, quadrupled those of the week previous, and the number of passengers was consequently great in proportion. The amount of money drawn was about £6500 this, contrasted with the week previous, gives a rise of £4882, the sum drawn that week for passengers being only £1618 2s. 6d. The passengers for the same week (we mean the week ending the 27th of August) amounted to 12,345. For the week just past they may therefore be set down at not less than 50,000.—Glasgow Chronicle.

DUNROBIN CASTLE.—It has been stated that her Majesty will honour the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland with a visit, and Lord and Lady Kinnaird, at Rossie Priory; but we believe the limited period of her Majesty's sojourn in the north will not allow of her visiting the noble duke.

BOATS FOR LOCH TAY.—On Saturday morning, at three o'clock, the eight oar-boats, built by Messrs. Donald M'Nicol and Robert Steel, jun., boat-builders, Greenock, were launched, and immediately proceeded to Dumbarton, and thence up the Leven, where horses and carriages, belonging to the Marquis of Breadalbane, were in readiness to transport them to Loch Tay, where they are to be used by the royal party. These boats, 30 feet in length, and 6 feet in beam, were ordered nine days ago.—Glasgow Chronicle.

CARMARTHEN.—In Taunton, with a population of 11,000, there is only one butcher's shop to 208 hotels, taverns, and beer-shops. The population of Carmarthen is about 12,000, and there is not one butcher's shop. Of "hotels," however, there are no less than 140.

DUNFERMLINE, Sept. 2.—The tradesmen have all returned to their work, but the colliers are still obstinate in their strike. The affair seems to have made a salutary impression on the minds of most of our tradesmen, who begin to see the affair in a light altogether ridiculous.

KINROSS, Sept. 3.—North of Queensferry, on the road through which the royal cortège will pass to Dupplin Castle, active preparations are in progress for a loyal welcome. All seem to hasten the happy day to behold Scotland's Queen and her illustrious consort, and the warmth of joyous feeling now excited by this auspicious event is evident to all who pass along. Nothing is talked of but the Queen's coming. Triumphal arches are erecting at the east and west end of the royal burgh of Inverkeithing—at the entrance to Dulooh, the country seat of Lord Cuninghame—at Fordel, the residence of Sir Philip Durham—at Kinross, and the bridge of Earn, which will be liberally and tastefully ornamented with flowers, surmounted with crowns.—Caledonian Mercury.

FOLKESTONE.—Government has at length resolved to sell our harbour, which is advertised to take place on the 23rd September. We hear that Messrs. Grissell and Peto have offered a large sum for it.—Dover Chronicle.

AN EFFECTIVE POLICE OFFICER.—On Monday, the 15th ult., on the breaking out of those outrages which have swept over the manufacturing districts of Lancashire and the adjacent counties, a formidable number of females, assuming the appearance of the ancient Amazons, had set out patrolling the country for the purpose of intimidating the peaceable inhabitants. These female heroes took it into their heads to visit the residence of a certain gentleman in the neighbourhood of Burnley. On one of the domestics threatening to call in the police, they dared him to do so; when he immediately walked up to the farm-yard, and turned out a favourite bull amongst the rude and clamorous agitators, who immediately took to their heels, to the no small amusement and satisfaction of the inmates of the establishment.—Leeds Mercury.

STATE OF TRADE.—There was by no means so much animation in the market yesterday as on the two preceding Tuesdays. The immediate wants which brought buyers to market at those times having been now generally supplied, few parties seemed disposed to buy at the present rates, and the demand both for goods and yarn is very limited; and in some cases rather lower prices have been accepted.—Manchester Guardian.

The Town-council of Edinburgh presented the freedom of the city to Dwarkanauth Tagore, the Brahmin Hindoo chieftain, on Tuesday.

Windsor-bridge tolls were let by auction, on Tuesday, for £15,000 per annum, being £100 more than they have hitherto realised.

Salmon.—A great quantity of salmon and grilse have been taken at Newport, Pembrokeshire, this year; indeed, much more than for the last ten years. The selling price is 3d. per pound.—Welshman.

Foreign Cattle.—Nearly every steamer from the Continent to Hull brings with it a quantity of foreign cattle. Since these importations commenced the shipments from Scotland have entirely ceased.—Leeds Mercury.

Death by a Plumstone.—A melancholy occurrence took place at Gravesend on Sunday afternoon, in the highway between Spring-head and Perry-street, by which a respectable married woman met with an untimely end in the presence of her children. It appears that Mrs. Wells, the wife of Mr. John Wells, a jeweller, of 45, Museum-street, Bloomsbury, has been for some time staying with her family, consisting of two daughters and a son, in lodgings in West-street, Gravesend; and on Sunday afternoon, in the course of their walk, they purchased some plums; and as Mrs. Wells was in the act of eating one, the stone got into her throat and choked her. A messenger was immediately despatched to Dr. Russell, High-street, Gravesend, and that gentleman promptly attended the unfortunate woman, but before his arrival she had expired, to the horror of her three children.

A Little Girl Poisoned by Eating Lucifer Matches.—An inquest was held on Saturday, at Chatham, on the body of a little girl, named Mary Ann Andrews, aged four years, who died from the effects of eating lucifer matches.

The 4 lb. loaf, made of good seconds flour, is now selling at Chelmsford and at Dunmow at 6½d.

Horrid Murder at Quadring, near Spalding.—On Friday week the inhabitants of this village were thrown into a state of alarm by the report that Miss Mary Spencer was murdered. The particulars are as follows:—Mary Spencer kept a day-school in Quadring, and resided in a small cottage left by her father, consisting of two rooms on the ground-floor, the smaller being her sleeping-room, the other as the house and school-room. Three children went, as usual, on Friday morning, at nine o'clock, to the deceased's house, and on opening the door saw her lying across a form in the school-room, dressed only in her night-clothes, and a quantity of blood upon the floor; they immediately ran away in terror, and told a neighbour what they had seen. The person, on going to the spot, saw Mary Spencer lying across a form, as described; and on Mr. Morris, a surgeon, of Gosberton, being called in, he found a wound from the right ear under the throat to the chest, about nine inches in length, and dividing the carotid artery, and pronounced that she must have bled to death. On examining the house, it appeared that a back window adjoining the bed had been broken open, and that the murderer had made an entrance. It is supposed that the deceased, in attempting to escape, had got near the street door, but was pulled back by the monster and stabbed as described. It is supposed that he was alarmed, and then made off. A man named William Howett, a labourer, was apprehended on Friday night on suspicion, under the following singular circumstances:—On the day of the discovery Mr. Loughland, a land-surveyor, whilst measuring some land, met a neighbour, and talking about this tragical event, a labourer (the father of Howett) was sitting by taking some refreshment, and listening to the conversation, exclaimed—"I wonder what Bill's been up to; he was out all night, and came home all over blood." Mr. Loughland immediately informed Mr. Sooms, a very active constable at Donington, who took Howett into custody. The inquest was held at the Red Lion Inn, at Quadring, on Saturday, and was adjourned to Thursday next. No doubt is entertained as to the guilt of the prisoner. We hear that a clasp knife was found upon him, with blood upon it. He is deaf and dumb, though quite sane, and about 26 years of age. The deceased was 41 years of age, and much respected.

Melancholy Accident at Seacombe, Cheshire.—On Saturday evening, when the tide was coming in strongly, and the weather rather rough, a young female, named Evans, the sister of Mrs. Bevington, accompanied by Mr. Bevington's servant, proceeded to bathe, but they had no sooner leaped into the water than the strength of the tide carried them out into the river, and before assistance could be procured they had sunk to rise no more. Miss Evans was about being united to a gentleman, now in America, to whom she had despatched a letter a few days ago by the Great Western steam-ship. On Sunday morning the bodies were discovered at low water, some distance from the spot.

Attack by Wasps.—As Mr. Wenham, landlord of the Star Inn, Matfield-green, was lately passing through Parrock-wood, in the parish of Brenchly, he was attacked by a swarm of wasps. Mr. W., in endeavouring to defend himself, took off his hat to beat them off; but the swarm increasing, he was completely surrounded by hundreds of them, and most dreadfully stung about the head and face. Fortunately he was near a house, into which he fled for protection; and with the kind assistance of the good woman, he got relieved of his tormentors. Mr. W. had received so much injury that it was with difficulty he reached home, and still severely suffers from the effects of his alarming encounter.—Sussex paper.

Awful Thunder-storm.—On Saturday se'nnight the towns of Looe and neighbourhood were visited by one of the most terrific thunder-storms, attended by heavy showers of hail and rain, that was ever remembered by the oldest inhabitant. At Treneut, about a mile from the town, a poor man named Tamblyn, at work in a harvest field, was killed by the lightning while in the act of binding a sheaf. The electric fluid, after forcing out the crown of his hat, descended in front of his left side, occasioning a complete longitudinal section of his shirt and trousers, and shattering the stout half-boot of his left foot into fragments, which were scattered to a considerable distance. The only external injury was a flesh wound, about an inch long, above the left ear. The poor fellow, who bore an excellent character, has left a wife and five children. The storm extended along the whole of our south coast, the outskirts of it only reaching Truro. In the neighbourhood of St. Austell and St. Blazey it raged with great fury. On East Crinnis Moors, several children, who were gathering blackberries, took refuge from its violence in a building erected for a stopgate; but the lightning passed down the chimney and killed two of them, both girls, on the spot. Both the unfortunate children were daughters of working miners; one of them was about eleven years of age, and the other about nine. Several of their companions were scorched and injured, but they are expected to recover. At Par, the mast of a schooner was split by the lightning, but no life was lost.

Meeting at Westbromwich between the Earl of Dartmouth and the Masters and Colliers of South Staffordshire.—Westbromwich, Wednesday night.—This morning a meeting took place, at which the mine owners of South Staffordshire were invited to meet the colliers, to take into consideration the several matters of complaint advanced by the colliers, principally against the practices of the butties, and to consult as to the best means of obtaining an amelioration of their condition, and redressing, as far as may be practicable, any real grievance under which they may be supposed to labour. Mr. Eaton, as a coal master, after a protracted conference, declared that he could undertake that quarter days and half days would speedily be abolished, and that it was the intention of the butties not to press too heavily upon the working colliers. The Buildas system would, he believed, be immediately done away with. Mr. Salter said, he believed the butties were anxious to do justice to the workmen, and were determined as far as possible, to remedy all the grievances of which the workmen complained. Dr. Booth thought, after the declaration of Mr. Eaton and Mr. Salter, the men should at once resume their employ. The Earl of Dartmouth expressed the same views as Dr. Booth, and thought the issue of to-day's proceedings would prove highly satisfactory. At the conclusion of his lordship's address, the meeting separated. There is little doubt that all the pits in the neighbourhood will now resume work.

Fatal and Melancholy Accident.—Mr. H. T. Allestree, of Ambaston, student of St. John's College, Cambridge, went out at five o'clock on Monday morning last, into the corn-fields with a gun. On going through a hedge, the gun caught upon a twig, one of the barrels exploded, and the shot entered his body below the left breast, and came out just above his left hip. He continued in his sufferings, which he bore with Christian fortitude, being calm and sensible to the last, until half-past three in the afternoon, when death ensued.

Robbery.—Property worth £2000 stolen.—A most daring burglary was committed on Thursday night week, at the residence of Lady Lisle, at Millbrook, near Southampton. The robbery was effected between the hours of ten and twelve, and was discovered when the family were about to retire for the night. A ladder had been procured, and placed against the windows of Lady Lisle's bedchamber, a pane of glass was broken, and the window-hasp unfastened. The parties having thus made their entrance, succeeded in getting off with a valuable set of jewels, a large sum of money, and several articles of plate, altogether worth upwards of £2000, which were in the apartment. The perpetrators of the robbery have eluded justice.—Hampshire Independent.

The Swell Mob in Edinburgh.—With the great influx of strangers that has taken place during the present week, an unusually large number of the above characters has also appeared in our city. On Thursday morning about the time her Majesty passed Prince's-street, a band of seven was discovered at the foot of St. Andrew's-street, plying their vocation with great assiduity, if not success. Their conduct was carefully watched for some time by the lynx-eyed M'Levy, who, like the tiger in view of his prey, was ready to pounce upon them the moment he thought they were successful in their depredations. Whenever the crowd became dense, a majority of the party rushed into the midst of it, and on several occasions were observed to introduce their hands into the pockets of both ladies and gentlemen. On one of these occasions M'Levy mustered his forces, who were successful in capturing five of the party. When searched, different sums of money were found upon them, in all amounting to about £35, most of which was in gold. Two of another party, one almost a boy, were apprehended picking pockets at the east corner of the Register office. One of them, seeing there was no hope of escape, threw a purse from him into the midst of the crowd, which the police succeeded in recovering, containing a sum of money, and which he still persists in saying is his own. No owner has yet made inquiry after this property, and it still lies at the police-office for that purpose. About the place where these were apprehended, a lady had her pocket picked of £9, and a gentleman of a silver watch, none of which have been recovered. All of them were brought before Bailie Johnston, in the Police-court, and remanded.

Murder of a Child by its Mother and Suicide of the Murderess.—A shocking double crime of murder and suicide has been committed at a roadside inn, called the Red Cow, about four miles from Llantripent, a village a few miles from Cardiff, on the road to Merthyr. The particulars of this shocking tragedy are briefly as follow:—On Wednesday morning last Mr. Evans, proprietor of the inn, rose about seven o'clock to go to Cowmer to receive the rents of some houses he had built there. Before he left the house his wife rose also, and went twice to the bedside of their child and kissed him twice. The little boy was about six years of age, an only child, and a great favourite with his mother. At about ten o'clock in the morning a little boy who was in the habit of calling for little Evans to accompany him to school, called at the house, but finding no one answer the door he went on. The boy states that he heard a noise like knocking in the room, and it is supposed that the murder was at that moment being perpetrated. In the course of the day Mr. Evans himself returned, and was surprised to find the doors and shutters closed. He knocked for some time, but no one answered, and a gentleman from Aberdare happening to call for a glass of beer, they burst open the door. Everything appeared in its usual form in the front room, but on proceeding up stairs, they were horror-struck on beholding the body of Mrs. Evans hanging by a cord from the beam. An alarm was immediately given, and the neighbours came in and cut the body down, when it was found that the throat had been previously cut, and the hands and arms were saturated with blood. There were no marks of blood in the room, but, on proceeding to the parlour, the first person who went in stumbled over something, which turned out to be the murdered body of the little boy. On the shutters being unclosed, they found the body lying in the midst of a pool of blood, and the razor with which the dreadful deed was perpetrated lying by his side. The struggles of the poor little fellow with his unnatural murderess were plainly traceable in his blood upon the floor. There is little doubt that the wretched mother, after having murdered her only child, tried to cut her own throat with the same razor; but not having sufficient nerve, she returned to the bed-room, and completed her purpose by hanging herself. Mr. Evans is, of course, in a most wretched state. It is said that Mrs. Evans made an attempt some time ago to perpetrate the crime she has now accomplished in a more shocking manner, by strapping her child to her back and walking into the river; but the attempt was frustrated by some one happening to pass by. She had since been heard to say that her husband could do very well without her and the child, and for some time past her spirits have been depressed, and she appeared to be labouring under apprehension that they should come to poverty. This is the only clue yet obtained to the commission of these dreadful crimes.

Alarming Accident to a Chemical Lecturer.—Dr. Robert Kane had commenced the delivery of his fourth lecture on combustion, in the Mechanics' Institution, on Saturday night, when, we regret to say, he met with an accident, which for some time excited serious apprehensions for his safety. In laying down some general propositions on his theory of combustion, he had occasion to expound and illustrate the composition of olefiant gas; for the purpose of this experiment a glass retort was put in requisition over a jet or flame. He was proceeding to show the quantity of air necessary for the combustion of a ton of coal, when the retort became displaced. This accident was first discovered by Mr. Dircks, who pointed it out to Professor Kane; and the professor was in the act of readjusting it, when, by some accidental mismanagement, he severely scalded his right hand. In the confusion caused by this unfortunate circumstance, the professor inhaled a quantity of the olefiant gas, which at that time had begun to evolve. The effect of this was immediately visible upon his countenance; but notwithstanding he proceeded with his lecture. At length, however, he became seriously affected, and he had just time to make a brief apology to the auditory when he began to sink. No serious consequences are apprehended.—Liverpool Albion.

IRELAND.

Dublin.—It is said that the government has decided that the Rev. Robert Daly is to be the new bishop.

Mutton of the finest quality was to be had on Wednesday week, in the market of Navan, county Meath, at 4½d. per lb. Potatoes were sold in the market of Strabane on Saturday last at 1½d. per stone, and in Omagh at as low a rate as 1d.

A deputation from the London Grocers' Company has been residing in Derry for these two weeks at the house of their agent, Mr. Sampson, and are busied at present in visiting their estates in the county of Londonderry.

Lord Eliot, Chief Secretary for Ireland, visited the schools of the National Board of Education, in Marlborough-street, on Thursday week, in company with Lady Jemima Eliot, and a brother of the noble lord, now upon a visit with him at the lodge in Phœnix-park.

A deputation from the Irish Presbyterian Church left Belfast on Wednesday week, for the purpose of presenting an address to her Majesty on her visit to Scotland.

The Countess de Grey.—Her ladyship's reception through her tour of visits in the north has been of the most enthusiastic description.

Monaghan Election.—The Monaghan election cannot take place until after the assembling of Parliament, when the writ will be issued. Mr. Leslie is the only candidate in the field, and it is believed by all parties that he will be returned unopposed.

Dublin.—College Election, Sept. 5.—After a protracted delay on the part of the Government, it appears that they have resolved in putting forward their new law-officer, the Solicitor-General, in nomination for the representation of the University, in opposition to Mr. Hamilton.

The New Tariff.—An Athlone paper attributes the sudden and great fall in the price of beef in the markets, not to the operations of the new tariff, but because of the disease now raging amongst cattle in different parts of the country having broken out in the counties of Westmeath and Roscommon; the consequence of which is, that the moment the beast is seen drooping, it is immediately driven to market by its owner, and sold "without any reserve," on the good old principle of half a loaf being better than no bread.

It is in contemplation to have a steamer, with a party of revenue police on board, permanently stationed in Killybegs, for the purpose of visiting the numerous islands of the coast, and putting down the baneful practice of illicit distillation.—Limerick Chron.

A Quaker deputation waited upon the priests of Kilkee, to exhort their congregation from the chapel altar against enlistment in the Queen's service! The request was very properly refused. —Limerick Chronicle.

The Galway Fishermen.—On Monday week a most violent outrage was committed by a gang of the Claddagh (county Galway) fishermen on Mr. Dudley Persse. Mr. Persse, accompanied by some friends, went out in his fishing-boat, but being aware of the violence practised by the Claddagh fishermen on any one who is hardy enough to fish in the bay, took the precaution to arm himself and his friends. When about three miles from Burren, they discovered a fleet of large sailing-boats leaving Galway, all formed into a regular line of sailing. They immediately knew who were approaching them, and, got in readiness to return back as fast as they could, to accomplish which they had to pass through the entire fleet, which was formed in different lines to prevent their escape. They were furiously attacked by the boats manned with from 20 to 30 men each, armed with sticks, stones, hatchets, and different weapons of destruction. They would positively have sunk the boat but that Mr. Persse and his party were so well armed, and showed such determination to resist. His boat being a very quick sailer, arrived close to the harbour about five minutes before the fleet, when they ran her on shore, and effected a landing, while the fishermen pursued closely, yelling, screaming, and threatening in the most violent manner. Mr. Persse and his party took up a position behind a wall to protect themselves and the boat which lay underneath. Such a sight was never seen; the boats were moving up and down, every now and then almost touching Mr. Persse's boat, and the crews threatening to break her up to pieces, but still afraid of the party armed above them. About two hundred of them landed, wading up to their necks in water; still Mr. Persse and his men did not fire; they attempted to surround them, but on every side the little party were prepared, and threatened to fire if they came on. At last a small party of police arrived, and the leaders being questioned by the sergeant as to the cause of their outrageous conduct, they replied that it was Mr. Persse attempted to fish again, neither his boat nor his crew would ever more be heard of, and after this notice they went off.

Fire Extraordinary.—Friday morning a large elm tree, on the bank of the grand canal, was discovered on fire. On the alarm being given, notwithstanding the earliness of the hour, considerable crowds of persons collected. James's parish engine was in a short time on the spot, when, although every exertion was made with abundance of water at hand, the flames raged with such fury that it was found impossible to control them before the ancient occupant of the soil, with all its leafy honours, had been reduced to ashes. There was a considerable hollow in the trunk of the tree; in that a piece of coal was found, and no doubt was the origin of the fire.—Dublin Freeman's Journal.

Outrage and Gallant Resistance.—On Friday night last a gang of miscreants, six in number, attacked the house of a very industrious farmer, named Patrick Clancey, of Burren, in the parish of Kilchrist, for the purpose of depriving him of his gun, which he had registered. Having forced an entrance, they demanded the gun, and on being refused they commenced beating him with the butt-end of a musket, and would, in all probability, have persevered until they had murdered him, had it not been for the heroic conduct of his two sons, who encountered the savage group, and, with great odds against them, fought until they had succeeded in depriving them of their gun, two sticks, and a hat. One of the party must have been mortally wounded from a shot fired by one of the Clanceys, as a considerable quantity of blood had been tracked for better than a mile from the house. The person wounded was within a yard of the gun when discharged, and one of the slugs was found breast-high on the door-post; consequently, it may be presumed he received the contents of the gun in his body.—Clare Journal.

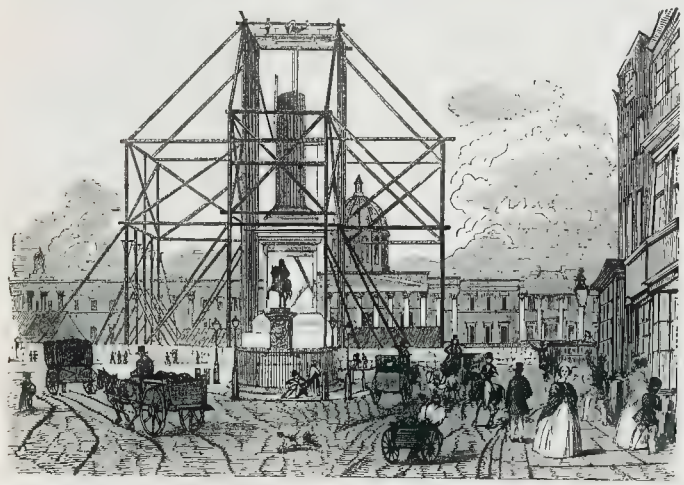
At Henry-street Police-office, Dublin, on Thursday week, the Hon. J. C. Yorke, of the 5th Dragoon Guards, charged his servant woman, Mary Ann O'Neill, on suspicion of having stolen a diamond ring, value £50, his property. The complainant stated that he left his ring on his dressing-table on the previous day. The servant was the only person who had access to the room, and when he returned he missed the ring. The prisoner was remanded till Monday.

FINE ARTS.

TRAFALGAR-SQUARE.

Much has been both said and written in comparison of the palaces and public buildings of this country with those of foreign cities, and the palm has been generally awarded to the latter—in one or two instances with more readiness than justice. However, as far as our public walks, and parks, and streets are concerned, we certainly stand unrivalled. Rome may boast of its Corso; Naples, her Mola and Strada de Toledo; Madrid, her far-famed Prado; the gardens of Tuileries, the Boulevards, and the Champs Elysées at Paris, and the Glacis at Vienna, may be all cited as objects of admiration; but none of these, with all their boasted grandeur, are to be compared with our own delightful parks, and walks, and avenues, and malls, in point of arrangement—the care bestowed upon them, and their healthful and, in certain aspects, now picturesque appearance. Let those who recollect London fifty, nay, thirty years ago, look round and acknowledge the vast extent of improvement which has taken place even within that period, particularly as regards the western part of the metropolis.

In no quarter of London, however, has the progress of adorning art been marked with a nobler impress of grandeur than in Trafalgar-square, of which we present two views to our readers—one exhibiting the improvements upon their march, the other the entire square in the full beauty of its completion. With the single, and but too prominent, exception of the tasteless and ill-devised National Gallery, the eye can scarcely rest upon a single object that does not present some form of elegance and grace. The beautiful church of St. Martin, of which the lightning-struck tower will very speedily be restored; the imposing screen of the Northumberland mansion, the fine range of lofty houses, the magnificent clubs, the wide, spacious area, with its episodes of monumental art—all combine to present a coup d'œil of unrivalled splendour and effect. In the contemplated changes, too, that portion of Parliament-street which now intersects the view, from Charing-cross, of Westminster's old Abbey, will be taken down, so that the approaches to Trafalgar-square will be on all sides of the noblest.



NELSON'S COLUMN.

MONUMENT TO SIR PULTENEY MALCOLM, IN ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

We here present to our readers an engraving of the monument which has been lately erected to the honour of Sir Pulteney Malcolm, at St. Paul's. It is a noble piece of sculpture, and has been beautifully executed by Baily, who ranks amongst the highest artists of our time. The figure is of the heroic stature, and stands in a position easy, yet dignity. The Admiral is holding a telescope sufficiently large to typify that he is treading the quarter-deck. The attire is a simple uniform, with a cloak loosely thrown over the shoulders, whence it flows without interfering with the front of the figure. Altogether, it is a symmetrical and appropriate work of art; and, while we are praising it, we may add a general remark of satisfaction that the system of erecting monuments in honour of our departed brave is growing into warmer public patronage, and receiving the active encouragement of our rulers and statesmen. The grant for new monuments made by the House of Commons at the close of the last session, and the beautiful speech in its vindication by Sir Robert Peel, must be fresh in the admiration of our readers.

King Charles II.—On Saturday, the 27th inst., was erected at Black Dub, between Crosby Ravensworth and Shap Fells, a rustic obelisk, to commemorate the circumstance of King Charles II., with his Scottish army, having dined there, and drunk of the waters of the spring, on their march southwards, a few days previous to the battle of Worcester. This place is one of the most solitary and dreary that can well be imagined, surrounded on all sides by uncouth heath; and, since the formation of the road over Shap Fells, is seldom seen, except by the shepherd or the sportsman. However, it must be recollected that, now so silent and deserted, it was once the great thoroughfare from Scotland, through Lancashire, to the great metropolis of England. To the solitary passer-by, who now can only hear the sighing of the breeze among the heather, or the bleating of sheep, it may not be uninteresting to reflect on the noise and clamour that must have prevailed here on the day in question, when the neighing of horses, the clang of arms, and the shouting of men, on a hasty march (for Cromwell and his victorious army were not far behind), must have made a medley of sounds that can be better imagined than described. On one side of the obelisk is the following inscription, carved by Mr. Thomas Bland, of Reagill:—"Here, at Black Dub, the source of the Lyvennet, Charles II. regaled his army on their march from Scotland, August 8, A.D. 1651."

National Gallery.—It has hitherto been the practice to close the National Gallery for six weeks, between the middle of September and the 1st of November. It is said that a new regulation is about to be made, to keep the gallery open all the year round.

New Church at Kentish-town.—This church is to be erected on the site of the present parochial chapel, at a cost of from £5000 to £8000, towards which the commissioners for building churches have agreed to make a grant of £800. The church is to contain 1608 sittings, one-half of which will be free. It is to be built in the early decorated Gothic style, after the model of the cathedrals at Rheims and Lincoln. Mr. Finch, the treasurer, has presented the trustees with a stained glass window, worth £500, in the centre of the cathedral wheel of which an illuminated dial is to be placed, with hands revolving both within and without. The material of the church is to be of fine white brick, with decorations of vitrified stone, by which will be prevented that dilapidation and decay which have lately come over the Bath stone in Henry the Seventh's Chapel, the churches in Langham-place, and others lately built by the Church Commission. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, the Earls of Dartmouth and Mansfield, his Grace the Bishop of London, and the Rev. J. Grant, the incumbent, have presented liberal donations to the fund.

New Electro-Magnetic Machine.—We have been favoured by Mr. Henley, of Red Lion-street, Whitechapel, with a private view of a new electro-magnetic machine, which he has recently finished. The contrivance, which is certainly the best adapted for giving power, is as follows:—six horse-shoe irons, coiled round with covered wire, are fixed in such a manner as each to attract, when magnetised, a corresponding bar of soft iron placed over them. Each of these bars is attached, by means of a crank, to a large iron rod, which is connected with the fly-wheel and working part of the apparatus. When their connexion with the battery is made, the first portion of the machine becomes an electro-magnet, and attracts its corresponding iron bar; the moment contact takes place connexion is broken by another part of the apparatus, and the next becomes an electro-magnet, and in its turn attracts its iron, and so on with all the rest; the first, of course, again becoming an electro-magnet when the last connexion is broken. Thus each magnet in its turn, producing a movement both downwards and upwards, communicates its modicum of power to the arm, and thus serves to keep up a continued powerful motion. This instrument is certainly a grand step in the advance of electro-magnetism, and it is one which induces us more strongly to hold to the opinion expressed in our last—that electricity will ere long dispute with steam its now all-powerful sway.

Submarine Experiments.—Dr. Payerne, of whose curious experiments at the Polytechnic Institution we have already spoken at an early period of our career as journalists, has obtained the attention of the Lords of the Admiralty, and has already caused a boat to be built for the furtherance of his plans. He proposes that this boat, supplied with his apparatus for renewing the vitality of the contained air, should be sunk to a certain depth near the spot where the operations are to be carried on; that from this boat the divers should make their descent, and that the air necessary for their respiration should be supplied to them from the boat itself, by the usual means of hoses attached to the diving cap. Hitherto it has been necessary at all times to force air from above by means of a condensing pump; and the labour and care necessary for carrying on this process rendered it impossible for the diver to remain any length of time below. According to the plan of Dr. Payerne, however, three, four, or five hours—nay, as many weeks, or even months, may be safely attained. The process is necessarily one in which a continued supply of artificial atmospheric air is formed by chemical means. Air, be it understood, is composed of nitrogen, oxygen, and carbonic acid; the proportion of the last component varying from three to eight parts out of a thousand. In the process of respiration the oxygen contained in the inspired air is withdrawn from it, in order to fulfil one of the wondrous processes of life, while an equal quantity of carbonic acid is expired. It will then be evident that were respiration to be long continued in confined air, the whole of its oxygen would be withdrawn, and a corresponding quantity of carbonic acid would have been eliminated, and the result would be death; death from two causes:—1st, from a lack of oxygen, the necessary and vital portion of the air; 2nd, from a superabundance of carbonic acid—for atmospheric air containing more than ten per cent. of carbonic acid is quickly fatal. From this it will be seen that Dr. Payerne's process must necessarily consist in the formation of oxygen to supply the place of that consumed, and the getting rid of the carbonic acid when eliminated. The former is extremely easy, as every amateur chemist knows; but the latter is not quite so readily performed. Nevertheless, we know that it has certainly been accomplished by the inventor, who promises shortly to communicate to the scientific world the means he adopts.

GROUSE SHOOTING IN THE MOORS OF SCOTLAND.

GROUSE SHOOTING.

Deer stalking last week, grouse shooting this! This is in the proper order of events, and falls in with the pursuits of the Prince-Albert-sporting party in the merry Highlands. Let us, therefore, at once refer our readers to Captain Lacy upon the whole subject of sport:—

Grouse shooting, in general, and on a subscription moor in particular, is a very different sort of thing in England to what it is in many parts of the Highlands, where the best sport of the kind in the known world is unquestionably to be obtained; though even that varies very materially in different districts; so much so, that it behoves an English shooting party to have better authority than a mere advertisement before they agree to pay a heavy rent for grouse-shooting quarters, or "shootings," and especially if the intention be to take them on a lease; for though the hills be represented as abounding with game, the burns and rivers as swarming with trout and salmon—with a plentiful sprinkling of roe, red deer, cocks, and wild-fowl, by way of a refreshing change—the reality is often found to fall not a little short of the glowing description. Moreover, the complaint, of late years, alleged against the mountain lairds, of not taking sufficient pains to keep up a good stock of game on their grounds, is, in general, but too truly founded.

It is important to impress upon the mind of the shooter, that, preparatory to his taking a Highland trip on a shooting excursion, he should thoroughly equip himself with all the requisites necessary to insure the best sport, and, at the least, a good share also of those which appertain to his common comfort and convenience, before he leaves "sweet home."

Get your traps in readiness for some time beforehand; because, if you defer all to the last moment, you will certainly forget some thing of essential consequence. There is no immediate necessity to take with you a portable forge, and a journeyman gunmaker, much less a portable wooden mansion; though, ere now, all these have been comprised under the fixtures attached to a favourite grousing locality; but there are many things you must take besides your guns and dogs, which, of course, will be among your very first considerations.

When you commence ranging a grouse mountain, always take the leeward side the hill, and give your dogs the wind; such I believe to be the usual plan with experienced sportsmen. Nevertheless, I frequently range down wind for grouse, and invariably so in boisterous weather, for then the birds often lie closer, and keep their heads down, and, therefore, can neither see nor hear you so well; you also have a much more distinct sight of them, with the wind at your back, than when it is blowing a moorland blast full in your face and eyes.

Many sportsmen never think of going on the moors after August, or September at the latest; whereas, if the birds have had a tolerable respite, as frequently is the case, they are much more easily found by the dogs in October, than during dry, sultry weather; will often lie as well on a fine day, especially one succeeding a black frost; and in point of size, fulness and beauty of plumage, and excellence of flavour, are incomparably superior to the birds of earlier date. Besides, all game are now well afoot, and, occasionally, seek the seclusion of the mountain dell, and the friendly shelter of the heather; green and golden plover, too, are also plentiful now on some moors; the latter deservedly in high estimation as a dainty; duck and teal too, at times, are no strangers to moorland districts, which now and then supply the ornithologist, also, with "fine specimens" of rare birds (not game).

LITERATURE.

IRELAND, ITS SCENERY AND CHARACTER. By MR. and MRS. S. C. HALL. Part xxiii., 8vo. London, 1842. How and Parsons.

This highly-embellished and beautiful production, which is fast drawing towards completion, sustains its interest with almost undeviating success. Independently of the quantity of illustration which has been brought to bear upon every possible feature of the Irish land, whether applicable to its scenery or its people, it is also most fertile in matter of instruction upon the condition of the country—in narrative, romance, description, and statistics—in a word, in all the resources of authors who have the facility of gracefully blending the imaginative with the real, allowing facts, perhaps, to predominate over fiction, but never fiction to mar a fact. We shall extract from the part before us one or two passages that will be readily welcomed by our readers.

"It is, however, to the grace and grandeur of Nature that we desire to direct the attention of our readers. Travel where they will, in this singular and beautiful neighbourhood, lovers of the picturesque will have rare treats at every step. It is impossible to exaggerate in describing the surpassing loveliness of the whole locality. How many thousands there are, who, if just ideas could be conveyed to them of its attractions, would make their annual tour hither, instead of "up the hackneyed and 'soddened' Rhine'—infinetely less rich in natural graces, far inferior in the studies of character it yields, and much less abundant in all enjoyments that can recompense the traveller! Nothing in Great Britain—perhaps, nothing in Europe—can surpass in beauty the view along the whole of the road that leads into the town of Enniskillen, along the banks of the upper Lough Erne."

LOUGH ERNE.

We pass now to a touching and truly Irish romance.

"By far the most interesting of the islands that 'gem the bosom of Lough Erne,' is the island of Devenish, about two miles across the upper lake from the town of Fermanagh. It contains between seventy and eighty acres of remarkably fertile land—pasture for cattle—so fertile, indeed, that it is said never to have required manure. Here are the remains of several ancient churches and a round tower—to which we shall presently refer—considered in its present restored state to be the most perfect as well as the most beautiful in Ireland. The religious establishment at Devenish is said to have been founded by St. Laserian, called also St. Molaisse, who died in 563. It was repeatedly plundered by the Danes; and appears to have been refounded A.D. 1130.

"The grave-yard of the ancient church has long been regarded with peculiar veneration by the peasantry; and the dead are brought from far off distances to be interred there—'to lay their bones among their own people;' the attendant mourners embarking in boats at a small promontory on the north side, called Portora—the Port of Lamentation. The lake is peculiarly liable to sudden and dangerous squalls. A circumstance was related to us by a gentleman who was an eye-witness of the sad scene, and who furnished us with the following particulars; upon the accuracy of which the reader may depend.

"'Bury me, mother dear,' murmured Edward Doran, 'in the holy Island of Devenish. I've been a free rover upon land and sea for many a year, and often when rocking in the shrouds, or half asleep in my hammock, I've seen the tower and its churchyard, and the quiet graves where the sun shone sweetly. Mother, darlin', you will bury me in Devenish Island.'

"'Yes, yes, dear, sure it's my own heart's wish,' replied the mournful mother; 'why not there among your own people, where all belonging to you be? It's a holy place I know, and a beautiful. Staying so calm and quiet in the full part of the blue waters of Lough Erne; and you'll not be strange, or lying yer lone in the blessed Island of Devenish!' Before the widow Doran had finished speaking, the young man had fallen asleep; the mother knelt by his side, and while she prayed fervently to God for what she knew was impossible, she buried her face in the bed to stifle the sobs that arose from her breaking heart. In a few moments she recovered her self-possession, and looked earnestly upon the face of the dying man; it was white and ghastly, and the dark tint around the lips and eyes gave a sure token that his race was nearly run. His long fair hair, damp and matted, hung upon his cheeks, and huge drops stood upon his forehead. While the poor woman gazed, his lips became parted by a feeble smile; and in a few moments he awoke.

"'Mother,' he said, 'you will all be soon with me there—with your own Ned—you, and Ellen, and Mike, and all.'

"'Ah! Edward, honey,' replied the afflicted parent, 'don't set your heart on Ellen being there; ye're not man and wife, you know, though ye're book-sworn, and she's very young, dear; but I'll be in Devenish, holy place that it is: for I must bide with your father; his grave and mine are one; and sure—God be praised for all his mercy—I shall have nothing to keep me out of it when you're gone.'

"A few words of deep love and thankfulness to the mother who had been unto him all that Irish mothers are, especially to their sons—a tender message of love to the 'Ellen' of his heart and youth, who was on her way from Dublin to see him—an expression of faith and hope for the future—mingling muttered between life and death, as to Ellen, and all sleeping in Devenish—and the mother was alone with her dead. The betrothed girl arrived about an hour after her lover had breathed his last, and more than usual interest was excited by her gentle bearing, and deep sorrow, when she sat at the head of the coffin, and by the side of the parent, whose grief hardly surpassed her own.

"The boat was duly prepared to convey 'the funeral' from the mainland to the picturesque island in Lough Erne. It was a quiet 'greyish' day, heavy clouds hung low beneath the canopy of heaven, and the air had a cold breezy feel; there was, however, no swell upon the water, and neither wind nor rain. The coffin was laid across the boat, and was followed first by the mother, but all the cousins and 'near friends' made way for the poor weeping girl. One by one the people followed, silently at first, until the entire party who were to accompany the corpse, fourteen in number, were arranged, as many as could be accommodated sitting, while the others stood in the midst; then, when the boat was pushed, and so fairly launched upon the lake, they one and all commenced the wild keen, lamenting the death 'of him of the fair hair and fairer heart, whose eyes were as blue as the sky he had looked at in many lands—whose voice was the music his mother loved whose swift feet could not outrun death—whose strong arm was but as a stem of flax in the grasp of the destroyer.'

"'Oh why -why, why?' exclaimed the first keener—whose grizzled hair streamed from beneath the red kerchief that was tied loosely under her chin, as she formed the centre of the standing group—and clapped her hands above her head each time she repeated 'why? why did you leave us? When the colleen-das—the girl whose eyes are drowned with tears, and whose feet failed her through heart-sorrow, when she was coming from the great city where many wooed her stay—to twine her white arms round you, and make you bide till she was ready ready as willing to fly with you from all, but you alone—why did you not wait? Why—why—why?'

"And all in that funeral-boat repeated 'why why—why?' And those on the mainland took up the melancholy chaunt, and echoed the sound to him who heard it not. Slowly the deep-laden boat proceeded; and the waters grew dark, and of a leaden colour beneath the shadow of the heavy clouds; and some on the island who were watching the progress of the funeral, said to each other, 'We shall have rain;' and a few large heavy drops, tears as of nature's agony in one of her convulsions, pitted the still waters; and suddenly, in a moment, a squall of wind—a blast—fierce and strong, rushed over the boat. It was gone—engulfed there was a frothing and a bubbling of the lake; and now a head upraised -and now an arm; and the people on the mainland sent up great cries of agony and prayer; but in an inconceivable short time all upon the lake was hushed, and a torrent of rain descended; and then the sun burst forth, and shone above the surface of the deep, where fourteen living, and one already dead, had been engulfed—and while it shone brightly, as if upon a bridal, slowly was the coffin seen to rise, and float—float—on—on—on, upon the current, until it was landed close to where its grave had been prepared in Devenish Island. And the old man who had dug the grave fell upon his knees, and crossing himself, devoutly declared, 'that nothing could keep him from his people;' poor fellow! The dream of his deathbed came but too true; for 'his mother, and Ellen, and Mike, and all—sleep with him in the holy ground of Devenish!'"

RUINS ON THE ISLAND OF DEVENISH.

We shall soon be able to congratulate Mr. and Mrs. Hall upon the completion of the delightful national labour of producing this valuable book.

PERCIVAL KEENE. By Capt. MARRYAT, Author of "Peter Simple," "Jacob Faithful," &c. 3 Vols. Henry Colburn, Great Marlborough Street.

The author of "Peter Simple" will always hit on scenes lively and amusing. The present tale is however not equal to his former novels. The opening of the story is of doubtful taste. The hero, Percival, is the natural son of the Hon. Capt. Delmar, whose mother is married to a private marine, and thus obtains the name of Keene. Percival, by means of his mother, obtains a middy's berth on board the ship of the Captain, who keeps his offspring at a respectful and disciplined distance, and assumes an utter ignorance of the hero's affinity to him. In a few years—after several adventures, some jocular, some pathetic, and some of the highest interest - Percival becomes a post-captain; the heir to the Hon. Miss Delmar, the Captain's sister, and £8000 per annum; and the husband of Minna Vandervelt, whose father and herself he had, some years before, rescued from a pirate. Our hero's father had succeeded to the peerage, as Lord de Versely, and died suddenly, without admittiny the claim of Percival to be his son.

Capt. Marryat's forte is, naturally, in sea scenes; and we append one or two as specimens. The scene is off the Virgin Islands. Percival and a boat's crew had been put on board a prize, which, in the night, became water-logged, when the men took to the boat, leaving young Keene to his fate. After many hours a rakish-looking sail hove in sight:—

The schooner was full of men, and steered close to me; she was a beautiful craft, and, although the wind was so light, glided very fast through the water; and I could not help thinking that she was the pirate vessel which the frigate had been in chase of. It appeared as if they intended to pass me, and I hallooed, "Schooner, a-hoy! Why don't you send a boat on board?" I must say, that when the idea struck me that she was a pirate vessel, my heart almost failed me. Shortly afterwards the schooner rounded to, and lowered a boat, which pulled to the vessel. The boat's crew were all negroes. One of them said, "Jump in, you white boy; next jump he take be into the shark's mouth," continued the man, grinning, as he addressed himself to the others in the boat.

I got into the boat, and they rowed on board the schooner. As soon as I was alongside of the schooner, they ordered me to go up the side, which I did, with my spy-glass in my hand. I leaped from the gunwale down on the deck, and found myself on board of an armed vessel, with a crew wholly composed of blacks. I was rudely seized by two of them, who led me aft to where a negro stood apart from the rest. A more fierce, severe, determined-looking countenance I never beheld. He was gigantic in stature, and limbed like the Farnesian Hercules.

"Well, boy, who are you?" said he, "and how came you on board of that vessel?" I told him in very few words. "Then you belong to that frigate that chased us the day before yesterday?" "Yes," replied I. "What is her name?" "The Calliope." "She sails well," said he. "Yes," replied I; "she is the fastest sailer on this station." "That's all the information I want of you, boy; now you may go." "Go where?" replied I. "Go where?—go overboard, to be sure," replied he with a grin. My heart died within me; but I mustered courage to say, "Much obliged to you, Sir; but I'd rather stay where I am, if it's all the same to you." The other negroes laughed at this reply, and I felt a little confidence; at all events, their good humour gave me courage, and I felt that being bold was my only chance. The negro captain looked at me for a time, as if considering, and at last said to the men, "Overboard with him." "Good-bye, Sir, you're very kind," said I; "but this is a capital spy-glass, and I leave it to you as a legacy; and I went up to him and offered him my spy-glass. Merciful Heaven! how my heart beat against my ribs when I did this. The negro captain took the glass and looked through it. "It is a good glass," said he, as he removed it from his eyes. "Well, white boy, I accept your present, and now good-bye." "Good-bye, Sir. Do me one kindness in return," said I very gravely, for I felt my hour was come. "And what is that?" replied the negro. "Tie a shot to my heels, that I may sink quickly; it won't take them long. You don't ask me to spare your life, then?" replied the negro. "He de very first white dat not ask it," said one of the negroes. "Dat really for true," said another. "Yes, by gum," replied a third.

Oh, how I wished to know what to say at that moment! The observations of the negroes made me imagine that I had better not ask for it; and yet how I clung to life. It was an awful moment—I felt as if I had lived a year in a few minutes. For a second or two I felt faint and giddy—I drew a long breath and revived.

"You don't answer me, boy," said the negro captain. "Why should I ask when I feel certain to be refused? But you shall give me my life I will thank you: I don't particularly wish to die, I can assure you." "I have taken an oath never to spare a white man. For once I am sorry that I cannot break my oath." "If that is all, I am a boy, and not a man," replied I. "Keep me till I grow bigger." "By golly, captain, dat very well said. Keep him, captain," said one of the negroes. "Yes, captain," replied another; "keep him to tend your cabin. Very proper you have white slave boy."

The negro captain for some time made no reply; he appeared to be in deep thought; at last he said, "Boy, you have saved your life; you may thank your-self, and not me. Prossa, let him be taken below; give him a frock and trousers, and throw that infernal dress overboard, or I may change my resolution."

The negro who was addressed, and who wore a sort of uniform as an officer—which he was, being second mate—led me below, nothing loth, I can assure my readers.

After some adventures with Vincent, the pirate, in which Percival saves his life, and during which time our hero stains himself of a mulatto colour—the captain "hating a white face"—they again put to sea, and the following scene occurs:—

One morning a schooner hove in sight, steering from the Havannah to the southward and eastward, either for the islands or the Spanish Main. At daylight the schooner was but a few miles a head of us, and not being a fast sailer, in a little more than an hour we were alongside of her. She proved to be bound to the island of Curacoa, being the property of an old Dutch gentleman, who was on board with his daughter, a little girl about seven years old. The crew consisted chiefly of negro slaves to the owner; the master of the vessel and the mate being, with the exception of the old gentleman and the little girl, the only white people on board. As usual, the crew were brought on board by the pirates, who reported to the captain that the vessel was in ballast, and of no value. As the crew of the Stella were already more than requisite, Vincent did not require the negroes, and he told them that they might go on board the schooner again, and take her into any port they pleased, with the white people, however, it was another affair. I had remained below, not wishing to witness a scene of butchery; but I was induced to look up the ladder, in consequence of José telling me that there was a little white girl come on board. At the time that I did so, Vincent had just done speaking with the negro belonging to the captured vessel; they had fallen back, and there was then standing before Vincent the master and mate of the vessel, the old Dutch gentleman, and the little girl. A more interesting child I never had seen, and my heart bled at the idea of her being sacrificed. Had it been another, this pistol should have sent a ball whizzing through his brain; as it is, go down below immediately." "I do not fear your pistol, Captain Vincent, nor will I go below; that very pistol in my hand saved you from the fangs of the bloodhound. I tell you, therefore, that you must not destroy that innocent child—if you love me you must not; for I will hate, detest, and scorn you ever afterwards. I intreat you—I implore you to let them go; they are not fit objects for your vengeance; and if you destroy them, I tell you you are a coward." 'What!" roared the tiger, "coward!" and no longer able to contain himself, he levelled his pistol at me, and drew the trigger. It missed fire: Vincent looked very confused—he tossed the pistol on deck, folded his arms, and turned his face away. There was a dead silence. The negro crew looked first at me and then at the captain, as if awaiting orders, and uncertain of the issue. The Dutch gentleman seemed to be so lost in surprise, as to almost forget his impending fate; while the little girl clung to him and stared at me with her deep blue eyes. It was what in the theatres they would call a tableau.

I followed up my advantage. Stepping forward, and placing myself before the old man and the child, I first broke the silence. "Captain Vincent," said I, "you did once promise me that you would never injure me or attempt my life; that promise you have broken. Since that you have made me another promise—you may recollect it—which was, that you would allow me to leave you on the first favourable opportunity; there cannot be any opportunity more favourable than the present. The negroes whom you are to send back to the schooner do not know how to navigate her. I request, therefore, to know whether you intend to keep this second promise, or to break it as you have the first? I ask my liberty." "If I broke my promise just now it was your fault," replied Vincent coolly. "I am sorry for it, and I can say no more. I intended to keep it; and, to prove so, I now keep my second you may go." "I thank you for that. I only wish that, now I leave you, I could leave you with feelings of good-will and not of—I must say it—of horror and disgust. Captain Vincent, once more let me beg, as a last favour, that you will spare these poor people." "Since you are so particularly interested about this useless old man and still more useless child," replied Vincent sarcastically, "I will now make a proposal to you. You have your liberty. Do you choose to give it up and remain here, provided I let them go away in the schooner? Come, now, take your choice; for I swear by my colour, that if you go away in the schooner, the moment you shove off they shall go over the gunwale." "My choice is then made," replied I; for I knew that when he swore by his colour he was in earnest:—"release them, and I will remain here." I little knew what I was to undergo in consequence of this decision. "Be it so," said Vincent: then turning to one of the mates, "Let them go back with the negroes; hoist the boat up when she returns, and sail for the rendezvous." So saying he went down into the cabin.

"You are saved," said I, going up to the old Dutch gentleman; "I lose no time; get into the boat as fast as possible, and make sail on your vessel as soon as you get on board. Good-bye, little girl," said I, taking her hand. "I thank you," replied the gentleman in good English—"I cannot say how much, I am so surprised at what I have seen; but recollect the name of Vanderwelt, of Curacoa; and if ever we meet again, you will find me grateful." "I will; but ask no more questions now—into the boat, quick," said I, shaking his proffered hand. They were handed down into the boat by the negroes. I remained on deck until they were put on board; the boat returned, was hoisted up, the schooner made sail again, and then I went down into the cabin.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

The grand swimming match between Kenworthy, the "London Champion," and Hownslow, the "Oxford Pet," for £25 a side, took place on Tuesday morning in the Serpentine. Precisely at half-past six "the men stripped." The first race for fast swimming across the eastern end of the river was gallantly won by the Oxonian—the distance, 400 yards, having been achieved in the short space of six minutes and a half. The second heat for long swimming was likewise won by the champion of the Isis. Two points out of three having thus been decided in favour of Mr. Hownslow, the ornamental swimming (constituting the third and last) was abandoned. The interest in the result, if we may judge from the great number of spectators, was extreme.

Regatta at Hastings.—Last week the inhabitants and visitors of Hastings were highly amused with a regatta, not by members of the Royal Yacht Squadron, but by eight fishermen in tubs, with a shovel to steer by. The distance to be performed was from the battery, round a tub moored off Beach Cottage, and back. The party started off amidst the cheers and laughter of the spectators, but had not proceeded far before six out of the eight tubs were capsized, which the men did not attempt to recover, but set off to swim the distance. The tubs, however, proved victorious, as they both got in before the swimmers. The first contained Charles Brazier, who was declared the winner of the prize; and the second, a fisherman named Richard Hide, who reached the battery in his frail craft in safety. A second match of the same description then took place between eight boys, sons of fishermen, but their tubs met with the same fate, as only two out of the eight reached the goal in safety, the boys swimming like fishes after them. The sport afforded considerable amusement to the numerous visitors, and it was calculated between 2000 and 3000 persons were present.

GREAT ROWING MATCH.

Of all the aquatic exhibitions of the season, Tuesday's was the greatest: the men were all first-rate scullers. The prizes on this occasion were given by the London, Westminster, and Vauxhall Iron Steam-boat Company, and consisted of a silver cup for the first man, and a purse of sovereigns for the others, divided according to the order in which they came in. It was a scullers' wager, in three heats. It might be considered as three great scullers' matches, in distinct portions of the Thames—the first heat, according to the conditions, being started against tide, from Londonbridge, and terminating at Lambeth-stairs; the second starting from Roberts's, at Stangate, and finishing at the Swan, at Chelsea; and the third heat (which consisted of the four best men of the preceding ones) starting from Battersea-bridge, with tide, and closing at Westminster-bridge. The first-rate qualifications of the men, added to the fineness of the weather, drew a vast assemblage of visitors.

At high water the following men were placed for the first heat, facing the Old Swan, at London-bridge:—

Charles Hill . . . Haugerford	Green.
William Merkiff . Horseferry	Yellow.
Frederick Lett. . . Lambeth	Red.
Henry Green . . . Vauxhall	Pink.

Pink, red, and green went off together. Green and pink became scull and scull, and led the way, making a very beautiful race. Red fell right astern, and appeared to row heavily, and with difficulty. The leading men dashed through Blackfriars-bridge as evenly as possible, and green then gradually drew ahead, maintained the advantage, and won by six lengths. Pink came in second, and yellow made a very good third. Immediately after the conclusion of this heat, the following took their stations off Roberts's to row to the Old Swan at Chelsea:—

Henry Shelton . . Lambeth	Black.
John Phelps . . . Fulham	White.
Thomas Coombes . Vauxhall-bridge	Stripes.
James Maynard . Lambeth	Blue.

They went away altogether—a most beautiful start. White led in a minute or so afterwards, and stripes gradually drew away from blue, and went up with white; a first-rate struggle was the result. Stripes shot the water at Coombes or Phelps it was difficult to say, as they had pursued their way as we have just described. On inquiry it was ascertained that it was Phelps's cutter which had harassed and impeded the other men, and the umpire accordingly determined that Coombes was fairly entitled to be considered the winner of the heat, and that Phelps, Maynard, and Shelton should row from Battersea to Vauxhall, to determine which should rate as second. Phelps positively refused, on the ground that he had throughout rowed fairly, and could not be accountable for what over-zealous friends might have done. Maynard and Shelton then went away from Battersea-bridge, and after a short distance Shelton, who has been ill for some time, and looked in miserable condition, gave in. At a little before seven, stripes, blue, green, and pink, after much difficulty, effected a start from Battersea-bridge, Phelps placing himself in the line to show that he was determined to try his power against the four. It was a sharp dashing start for two or three seconds, scull and scull, and then green went away with the lead, followed by pink; green, off the College, gave way a trifle, and at the same moment stripes outrowed pink, and went into the first place; green was second; and blue, after a severe conflict with pink, passed him, and became third; and towards the end of the race, bid fair to be second, had there been much further to go. Thomas Coombes (stripes) had the lead, and won by two lengths; Hill was second; Maynard close on his quarter. The prizes were presented on board the Bachelor steamer: £15, instead of a cup, to the winner; £5 to the second; £3 to the third; £2 to the fourth; £1 10s. for the third in each heat: and £1 5s. for the others.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, Monday.
(Before Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque.)
IN RE JOHN WOOD.

This day was fixed for the final examination of the bankrupt, who was described as a banker at Wycombe, Bucks, but was, in fact, a leather cutter and shoemaker, and a discounter of bills. Mr. Smith, who attended as solicitor to the assignees, observed that the balance-sheet had only now been delivered to him, and he also wished to interrogate the bankrupt. The bankrupt being sworn, stated, in answer to several questions, that he had been, for about seven years, in business as a shoemaker, leather seller, and agent for a bank. Mr. Edward Cunningham had been his partner up to 1839 (that was to say, a partner by implication), for about two years before, and the partnership was regularly dissolved and gazetted, as was a previous partnership with his father. Shortly before his bankruptcy (the fiat bears date the 23rd of June, 1842), he made an offer to compromise with his creditors at 2s. 6d. in the pound, and he could raise that amount.—What amount would that take?—I think about £600. I know a person of the name of Parsons, and have seen him several times since my bankruptcy. I did not offer to take his business, as I considered he owed me too much before. I positively swear I never told him that I could produce £1600 to carry on his business. I know Mr. Lawrence, and advanced him money upon deeds, which were then deposited with me as security (in 1841), but they are now in the possession of Butcher and Co., of Cheshunt. I held the deeds until I received a notice to give them up, and I parted with them before my bankruptcy.—Will you swear that Lawrence did not repeatedly call upon you relative to the deeds since your bankruptcy?—I will positively swear I do not recollect if he called since the bankruptcy; but I know he did twice before. A subsequent meeting was held respecting them when they were in the hands of my conveyancer (Mr. White), but I swear I cannot tell you, I gave them over to him.

Mr. Fonblanque: You must take care how you answer those questions, or you may depend upon it you shall not pass. The bankrupt was pressed as to whether the deeds were given by him to White before or after his bankruptcy; but his only answer was, "I believe before."—Mr. Smith: Under these circumstances, Sir, I shall ask you to pospone the further examination of the bankrupt; and it was so.

At our day last that we had this information respecting the deeds, so that sufficient time has not been allowed to us for inquiry respecting them.—Mr. Fonblanque: I shall certainly not pass him to-day, as the assignees are not satisfied. What adjournment do you require?—The official assignee (Mr. Gibson): The bankrupt's accounts, sir, are rather voluminous, and though described as a "banker," we find him to be without a cash-book.—Mr. Fonblanque: Well, I have heard of many strange things since I have been in this court, but I never heard of a banker being without a cash-book.—The Bankrupt: I have been severely injured, sir, by that Mr. Parsons, I can assure you. Mr. Fonblanque: I can say nothing about that, but I can tell you that you must summon your creditors for the next meeting, and have your wits more about you.—The Bankrupt: I kept my accounts, sir, in a day-book and a ledger, and I had no other books.—The balance-sheet of the bankrupt showed his debts and liabilites to be about £12,000 (all represented by "paper") and his assets are estimated at about £100. After some further conversation, the hearing was adjourned till the 27th inst.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT. York, Sept. 2.
(Before Lord Denman.)
THE RIOTS AT LEEDS.

Joseph Armitage, Thomas Chester, John Christy, Robert Ellis, William Fleaher, John Haldock, Joseph Heaton, John Heywood, Jonathan Hirst, Josiah Hogg, William Howard, James Longstaff, George Oates, William Perigo, Thomas Render, James Speight, Francis Stead, and Charles Wilkinson, were indicted for a conspiracy and riot. Mr. Wortley, Mr. Hall, and Mr. Pollock for the prosecution; Mr. Wilkins for the defence.—Heaton pleaded guilty, and it was intimated on the part of the prosecution that they had no evidence to offer as against Joseph Hogg.—Mr. Wortley stated the case for the prosecution. They were charged with conspiring to meet together in a riotous manner, and thereby, and by threats and intimidation, to compel certain workmen to desist from their employment. The occurrence they were now met to investigate took place on the 17th of August last. For some days before there had been considerable excitement in the borough of Leeds, and the magistrates had thought it their duty to issue a notice and caution to all the inhabitants of their determination to put down and repress all riotous and tumultuous assemblages. On the 17th the alarm in the borough had increased, and the magistrates took decided steps to maintain the public peace. The military were under arms, and large numbers of special constables were sworn in. In the afternoon, between three and four o'clock, an alarm was given that the mob was approaching, and in consequence the mayor, attended by some of the other magistrates and a strong body of police, proceeded towards Holbeck, in the borough, and there found a very large assemblage of persons making a great noise, in a manner calculated to alarm the peaceable inhabitants of the borough. The mob entered the mill-yard of Messrs. Tetley, Tatham, and Co., where they forced out the plug of the boiler, and stopped the mill. So great was the alarm at that time, that the mayor thought it right to read the Riot Act, which was done three several times, and notice was given to the people that it was their duty to separate. The mayor then returned into the town, and shortly after an alarm was given that the mob had proceeded to several other mills—those of Marshall and Co., and Benn and Co., and finally to that of Messrs. March and M'Lean, at the Dewsbury-road-end, in the immediate vicinity of the town. Means were accordingly taken to repress their violence. Mr. Read was despatched with a body of police, and when he arrived at the mill of Messrs. March and M'Lean, he found thousands of people assembled. He was greeted with yells and hootings. Stones were thrown and it was with difficulty he reached the mill-gates. He succeeded, however, in pressing his horse forward, and he ordered the gate of the mill-yard to be closed, so as to shut in the more active of the rioters. In so doing he was repeatedly struck with stones, his hat was cut through, and there were cries from the crowd of "Kill him! kill him!" with other exclamations of a similar kind. It would be shown that Wilkinson was the leader of the mob, and the person who took the most active part in these proceedings. He (the learned counsel) would not think it necessary to detail the part which each man had taken, as he did not wish to detain the court longer than was necessary, and he might do injustice to individual prisoners by imputing acts to them the evidence would not sustain. The jury would find, however, that all the prisoners, particularly Wilkinson, Armitage, and Chester, had taken an active part on the occasion. Some assisted in beating the police, some in throwing stones, and some in exciting the mob and hurraing them on. There would be no doubt they had all been engaged in a riot, and one of a most serious character.—A great number of witnesses were examined to prove the part taken by the various prisoners. They were all found guilty.

A number of other cases were taken before his Lordship in the course of the day, in which large mobs had gone to the mills of various persons in Leeds, and compelled them to stop work—usually by drawing the plugs of the boiler, and letting the water off. No further violence, however, it would appear, had been offered by these parties to either person or property.

Mr. Justice Maule was engaged during the day with the trial of a similar class of cases, which had occurred at Clayton West, Rothwell, Halifax, Todmorden, Skipton, Keighley, Bingley, Batley, Wakefield, and other places. The evidence was much of the same kind in all these cases, and nearly all the prisoners were convicted.

MONDAY, SEPT. 5.

SENTENCING OF THE YORKSHIRE RIOTERS.—This morning the learned judges, at ten o'clock, proceeded to sentence the prisoners who, to the number of more than 140, were assembled in the two courts. The Lord Chief Justice, after addressing the prisoners at some length, said, the humanity of the prosecutors was remarkably exemplified in the case of Wilkinson, who had been convicted of a riot, in which it appeared he had stabbed a constable with his knife; this was only laid as a misdemeanour, though it might have been put as a felony. The sentence, however, would be the most severe that could be inflicted for the offence on which the indictment had been framed, and that was imprisonment, with hard labour, for eighteen calendar months. Armitage (who had been so respected as to be appointed a Wesleyan Sunday-school teacher), with some others, six months; others (whom the learned judge named) were sentenced to terms of five, four, three, and two months. Some were let off with a nominal term of three weeks, dated from the commencement of the assizes, and a number were discharged on their recognizances.—Mr. Justice Maule disposed of his cases in a similar way, addressing the prisoners in the same strain.—The proceedings were over by about noon.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—James Onions and John North were brought before Alderman Gibbs, in the custody of Daniel Forrester, the officer, upon a charge of having conspired with other persons, not in custody, to defraud Mr. Henry Gaze, of No. 155, Cheapside.—Mr. Clarkson stated that the prisoners were charged with having entered into a conspiracy with others to defraud Mr. Gaze, by circulating several bills of very considerable amount as the acceptances of Gaze and Co. On the 16th of last of December Mr. Gaze entered into partnership with John Onions, the brother of the prisoner James Onions, under the firm of Gaze and Co., Cottage-row, Bermondsey, for the purpose of carrying out a patent connected with the business of malleable and general iron founding. It was ascertained, however, that John Onions was by no means an eligible partner, and as the deed of partnership contained a clause by which the partnership could be dissolved if the returns did not prove to be advantageous, Mr. Gaze gave notice of dissolution in the usual manner. Since that dissolution, which took place on the 17th of June last, Mr. Gaze found that John Onions had put into circulation several bills of exchange, purporting to be accepted by the firm of Gaze and Co., for not one of which bills the firm had received the slightest consideration. Mr. Gaze said he had seen the prisoner James Onions several times. James Onions had applied to him to assist in bringing out the invention, and subsequently showed him a bill of exchange for £500, purporting to be accepted by the firm of Gaze and Co. The bill was not drawn by witness, nor by his authority. It was afterwards presented by the notary at the house, and not paid. There were several bills presented of a similar description for payment, wholly unauthorised by the firm, and the prisoner North aided in circulating those bills with the knowledge that they were incorrect. The Alderman did not consider it by any means necessary to enter into the minute of the evidence, or the arguments in favour and against the prosecution, but stated that there was no reason to alter the decision they had come to. Alderman Gibbs: We shall take bail for James Onions, himself in £300, and two recognizances in £200 each, and we shall take North's own security in £900.

GUILDHALL.—On Thursday two men, named James Dennis and John Hart, were fined for assaulting a police constable, and fracturing his leg.

BOW-STREET.—EXTENSIVE ROBBERY BY A CLERK IN THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE. James Samuel Brown, a clerk in the money-order office, was placed at the bar, charged with having forged a quantity of money-orders on the post-office at Camberwell, Ratcliffe-highway, &c. Messrs. Peacock attended in this case for the prosecution, and called Mrs. Elizabeth Blunden, who said she was the wife of William Blunden, of Camberwell-green. Her husband keeps the post-office receiving-house on Camberwell-green. Money-orders are frequently drawn on her office by post-masters in the country. It is customary when such orders are granted to send a letter of advice, that such order has been granted, and the amount. When the person who receives the order presents it at her office, she refers to the letter of advice, and if the particulars correspond, she immediately pays the amount. On the 24th of August she received the letter of advice produced, purporting to come from the post-office at Sittingbourne, and stating that the orders, as follow, had been drawn on her by the post-office at Sittingbourne, namely, No. 207, for £5, and Nos. 208 to 213 inclusive, for like sums. There was also another, No. 214, for £4 9s. 5d., amounting in all to £39 9s. 5d. The letter stated that they were from Thomas Gouter, solicitor, at Sittingbourne, and payable to William Gouter. On the same day that witness received the letter of advice, the prisoner came to her office and presented the orders, for which he obtained money. The prisoner came in a cab, and brought a cash-box, into which he put the money, which consisted of £10 and £5 notes, and cash; and in the course of the same day witness sent to the General Post-office the letter of advice, purporting to come from Sittingbourne. The cash-box produced appears to be the same which the prisoner brought to her office. Mr. J. Armstrong, a clerk in the money-order office, knows the prisoner, who has been in the office for some time. Witness has known him for two years, and has seen him write almost daily, and considers himself well acquainted with his handwriting. Witness is of opinion that the eight orders and the letter of advice produced are in the prisoner's handwriting, and does not believe they were ever issued by the post-office at Sittingbourne. The letter of advice appears to have been posted at the chief office in London. The prisoner had access to the blank forms of money-orders and letters of advice. Frederick R. Jackson, chief clerk in the money-order office, corroborated the last witness's evidence. Matthew Peake: Is a constable in the General Post-office. On Friday, the 2d instant, he took the prisoner into custody at the Post-office, and heard Mr. Peacock tell him that he was charged with forging money-orders on the Camberwell post-office. The prisoner replied that he could satisfactorily explain it, and wished to see Mr. Peacock in private. This request was refused, and witness then searched him and found on him a purse, containing £25 in gold, and a diamond ring. He also found a gold watch and chain in his waistcoat pocket. Witness has been to a jeweller, who informed him that the ring is of the value of £20. Witness then obtained a search-warrant, and went to No. 12, Old Gravel-lane, where the prisoner lived, and found there, in the second floor back room, in a chest of drawers, the cash-box produced. The witness saw Mr. Phillips, who was with him, unlock the cash-box with a key found in one of the drawers. He saw Mr. Phillips take out some bank-notes and put them in again. They then took the box to the Post-office, where it was found to contain £65 in notes, £180 in gold, and ten money-orders, each for £5, purporting to be drawn by the post-office Bakewell, on the post-office Old Kent-road. They are signed "C. Searle," and are of the same handwriting as those on the Camberwell post-office.—Mr. Peacock said this was as far as he could go, and applied to have the prisoner remanded.—Mr. Twyford remanded him for a week.

A fellow named Johnston was remanded on a charge of stealing door-plates.—The policeman saw him attempting to wrench the door-plate off the linen-draper's at No. 12, Little Russell-street, and asked him what he was doing, when he said that he was waiting for his wife. Witness then took him to the station-house, and found five brass plates upon him, three latch keys, and a skeleton key. On the officer's going round his beat again, he found twelve other brass plates in Little Russell-street and the neighbourhood partly wrenched off.

CLERKENWELL.—EXTRAORDINARY CASE.—Mrs. Charlotte Knight, an independent widow lady, residing at No. 4, Claremont-place, Pentonville, was brought up on Saturday under the following circumstances:—Police sergeant Cotton, 10 G, said that at half-past one o'clock this morning, he was conversing with another officer, in St. John's-street, when the accused approached him, saying, "Oh, you are the villain, are you? You shall not be a policeman much longer, for I am intimately acquainted with Colonel Rowan." He desired her to go home, but she refused, and continued abusing him, so he took her to the station-house, and charged her with being drunk and disorderly.—Defendant: Before you seized me did I not claim the protection of a lady and gentleman who were passing?—Complainant: Seeing that you were annoying a lady and gentleman, I told you that if you did not go along I would take you into custody. I swear that you were drunk; and I did not say as you were passing that I knew you well; you were just come from Walbancke's.—Maddocks, 40 G, deposed that he was with Cotton; that the defendant, when addressing the lady and gentleman, went close to them, leaving witness and Cotton some yards behind, and that the latter did not in any interfere with her until she had stopped at the door of the lady and gentleman, and refused to go on. Defendant certainly implored witness to save her from being injured when the sergeant seized hold of her. She was much excited, and appeared to have been drinking. The defendant, in reply to the charge, said the sergeant grossly abused her as she passed; and with a view of having his conduct investigated, she said she would take his number. At this instant a lady and gentleman came up, and she implored their protection. Cotton said, "If you take my number, I'll take you," and immediately pounced upon her with brutal violence, and so injured and alarmed her, that she besought the passers-by not to allow her to be murdered. Two gentlemen proffered to see her safe to the station-house; but they were instantly, and without provocation, felled to the ground and kicked, and ultimately locked up. "These, and other gentlemen," said the defendant, "will presently be brought before your worship, and you will doubtless hear from them the real facts of the case." Defendant called, in corroboration, Mr. Richard Moss, of 65, Hermitage-place, Clerkenwell, an assistant to Mr. Snow, an auctioneer, of Dorset-square. He said that all the parties were strangers to him; that as he was passing the defendant claimed his protection, saying she had been much insulted by those policemen, and that Cotton then said to her, "We know you; you have just left Mrs. Walbancke's, and if you talk to people about us as you go along, I'll take you in charge." He instantly grasped hold of her, and witness asked why he had apprehended her, when he said, "Never mind, you know nothing about the matter." Witness had by this time reached his own house, into which he was glad to escape. The defendant was perfectly sober, but somewhat excited. Mr. Coventry, of 34, Percival-street, Clerkenwell, deposed that the defendant had taken tea and supper at his house with his family. She left perfectly sober. He had known her twelve years, and never knew her otherwise than prudent, sober, and quiet. Several other gentlemen here pressed forward to speak to her respectability, but the magistrate expressed himself satisfied, and dismissed the charge.

Next followed an examination incidental to the above, and which terminated in a most extraordinary manner.—Five gentlemen, named Neal, Hughes, Gibson, Fitzroy, and Negus, were charged with interrupting Cotton in the execution of his duty.—Cotton said, as he was taking Mrs. Knight to the station-house, Neal asked the nature of the charge, and as he would not satisfy him, he (Neal) said she should not be taken until he was satisfied, at the same time pushing witness against the railings. For this "assault and obstruction" witness handed him over to a policeman who was attracted to the spot by the springing of his rattle. Mrs. Knight had asked Neal to protect her, and said, "Don't let them take me to the station-house." The other prisoners got round witness, and prevented him from quietly taking Mrs. Knight. The witness swore positively that he did not strike either of the prisoners. Maddocks, the constable, deposed that Mrs. Knight called Mr. Hughes by name, and requested him to fetch Mr. Coventry. The defendants, who were all men of most unquestionable respectability, separately addressed the bench. They all protested that Cotton was drunk, and said that hearing the cries of murder in a woman's voice they hastened to the spot, and found Cotton roughly grasping her; she complained of her arms being pinched. Neither of them, in the most remote degree, either by word or act, interrupted the officer, but because they insisted on following to the station-house, they, with the exception of Mr. Gibson, were thrown down upon the pavement and brutally kicked. The letter gentleman had quietly been a silent spectator at the door of the station-house, but when there he was felled by Cotton, and instantly dragged to a cell. They all said that such was Cotton's conduct that he must have been either mad with liquor or insane.

Mrs. Knight was examined for the defendants, and on her oath corroborated their statements in every particular.—The magistrate, Mr. Combe, to the astonishment of every one present, here said he considered the charge proved. No person had a right to interfere with a policeman when he had a charge. If a constable exceeded his duty a bystander could go to a police-office and lay a complaint. Neal, who was the first to question the sergeant, he should fine 40s., and the others 20s. each.—The money was instantly paid.

On Tuesday Richard Saul, a middle-aged man, dressed in livery, was charged with violently assaulting his master, Major-General Boardman, of No. 12, Euston place.—Major-General Boardman stated that the defendant having had a holiday on Monday, returned home about ten o'clock slightly inebriated. At eleven o'clock the complainant desired his nephew to ring the bell, that the prisoner might open the door for bed. The first peal was not attended to, and the bell was rung a second time. The prisoner then came up, and having closed the shutters, addressed the most insolent and violent language to the complainant's nephew, because the latter had, at his (the General's) directions, previously examined the area to ascertain whether the ladder had been taken down. Complainant ordered the man to leave the room, but he refused to go. Complainant rose to push him out, but Mrs. Boardman got between them to prevent any violence. The defendant, however, rushed past her, seized the complainant by the neck, and threw him towards the fireplace with great violence. The complainant was much hurt, and was still suffering great pain from the fall.—Mr. W. Boardman, the nephew, confirmed his uncle's testimony in every particular, and added that the General fell with his head near the fender: had it come in contact with it, there was little doubt, from the violence with which he had been thrown, that the result would have proved fatal. Witness went for a constable, and on returning with one, saw the prisoner running away along the New-road.—Police constable 231 S, said that when the prisoner was taken into custody he did not deny the charge. The prisoner, in his defence, said he went up to give the general warning, and only pushed him away when he was coming towards him.—Mr. Combe: Do you wish, General, that this case should be sent for trial, or would you prefer having it summarily disposed of?

The complainant said he would prefer the latter. He had dismissed the prisoner about a month since, but on the man's humble supplication, and at the instance of others who had interceded, he had been induced to take him back. Mr. Combe said he never knew a returned servant turn out well. It appeared that the prisoner took offence because General Boardman used the precaution of inquiring whether or not the area ladder had been taken up. It was well known that half the robberies in London were effected for want of the same precaution. Not content with making use of blackguard expressions, the prisoner had pounced upon his master. The case approached very near to what the law denominated petty treason; and if the complainant had been killed by the violence to which he had been subjected, the prisoner would, if found guilty of that offence, most probably be hanged. The Act of Parliament did not empower him to impose a higher penalty than £5, or two months' imprisonment with hard labour, and he considered this was a case which called for the full penalty.—The prisoner was then committed.

MARYLEBONE.—On Monday a matter of very considerable importance to the public, and one in which the proprietors of railways are especially interested, was brought before the sitting magistrate, Mr. Rawlinson, for investigation. The defendant in the case was Mr. James Howell, who was described on the police-sheet as a gentleman, residing at No. 60, Stanhope-street, Mornington-crescent, and the charge against him was that of having thrown certain pieces of wood on the line of the London and Birmingham Railway, by which proceeding the lives of the public were endangered.—The first witness called was Cooke, 65 S, who said, "On Saturday night last, at half-past eleven, I saw the prisoner on the railway bridge No. 5, at the end of Stanhope-street, Hampstead-road; he stood there for two or three minutes, and then walked away towards Stanhope-street, but shortly afterwards returned to the bridge with something in his hand, which he threw over on to the railway; it rattled as if it was a board. He then walked back in the direction he came from, when I followed, and on overtaking him said, 'I beg your pardon, Sir, but I think you have thrown something on the railway.' He replied that he had done no such thing. I gave him to understand that he must go with me, which he readily did; and on our arriving at the terminus at Euston-square, I there saw a sergeant, to whom I communicated what had taken place, and all three of us, viz., the sergeant, myself, and the prisoner, went up the line, and on it, just below the bridge, these boards (producing several about three feet in length and nearly one inch thick) were found; all of them were lying across the rails. I told him these were the boards he threw over, and that they had caused the rattling I had heard; but he repeated his denial of having done anything of the sort."—In reply to Mr. Rawlinson, witness said, "When I first saw the prisoner I was ten yards from the bridge; he was then dragging something along."—The prisoner, in reply to the charge, said that when he first entered upon the occupancy of his house the road thereto was perfectly dry, but latterly Mr. Hughes had raised his ground so high as to cause a frequent overflow of water to his (prisoner's) premises. On Saturday night he was going to the Bedford Arms to fetch some ale, and in passing by Mr. Hughes's house laid hold of the paling to protect himself from getting knee-deep in water, when, being exasperated, and his foot slipping, he pulled up a portion thereof and threw it away, but without any intention of doing harm. Mr. Rawlinson said, "Considering that by your misconduct you having endangered the lives of the public, I think I should not be doing my duty if I did not inflict upon you the full penalty of £10. The offence is a very serious one, and I hope that the manner in which I have dealt with the case will operate as a warning to you and others in future." The penalty was paid.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—Two young and well-dressed females, Ann Leonard and Caroline Barnaby, were charged with uttering counterfeit silver. They are well known; and were remanded, in order for Mr. Powell, the Mint Solicitor, to attend.

THAMES-OFFICE. An extensive seizure of contraband tobacco was made on Monday last, near Tilbury Fort, and the examination of one of the parties charged with running it ashore, created much interest in a crowded court on Wednesday, when Joseph Murgatroyd, who described himself as a seaman, was brought before Mr. Broderip, charged on a Custom-house information with illegally unshipping, before the duties had been first paid and secured, 1398 pounds of tobacco, by which he had incurred a penalty of £100.—After a lengthened evidence, the case was fully proved, and the prisoner was convicted of smuggling 1398lbs. of tobacco, and sentenced to pay a fine of £100, and in default to be imprisoned for six months in Chelmsford gaol.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

DETERMINED SUICIDE OF AN AGED MAN.—On Tuesday morning an inquest was held at the Coburg Arms, Webber-street, Blackfriars-road, on the body of Wm. Humphreys, aged 96, who committed suicide by cutting his throat. It appears from the evidence that the deceased was formerly a ship-rigger, and of late years he had resided with and been supported by his daughter and her husband, decent people living in Queen-street, Lambeth. On Sunday morning, however, he was discovered by one of the grandchildren lying in the same room, dead, with his throat cut, and a razor lying on the bed near his right hand. Verdict Temporary mental derangement.

MR. WAKLEY, M.P., held an inquest on Tuesday at the Swan, at the foot of Putney-bridge, on the body of Thomas Harwood, aged 14. John Powell, a waterman of Fulham, found early on Monday morning the body of deceased lying lifeless in the mud near the bridge on the Middlesex side of the Thames. From inquiries he had made since, he found that deceased was the son of a blind pauper, now an inmate of Bermondsey workhouse, and that he was drowned on Sunday last, whilst on board of the Cadogan-pier, Chelsea, by falling overboard from the Myrtle steamer. Abraham Stanley, mate of the Myrtle, said that deceased was in the habit of passing up and down the river in the steam-boats, and that he lived upon the charity of the crews. About eleven o'clock on Sunday deceased was on board the Myrtle, and as she neared the Cadogan-pier he ran out of the cabin and lifted up the gangway himself, and his foot caught either in the rope coiled near the gangway, or in the head of a boat-hook, and he fell headforemost overboard. Verdict Accidental death.

ON Tuesday, Mr. Wakley, M.P., and a numerous jury, held an inquest at the Wheatsheaf, Fulham, on the body of Ann Burke, aged two years and a half, who was poisoned by having swallowed a very small quantity of a preparation styled in the printed bills "Shadbolt's celebrated fly and bug water," and headed "Killing no murder." The jury returned a verdict "That the deceased was accidentally poisoned by having swallowed some of Shadbot's fly and bug water." The Coroner.—Your verdict, fortunately for all parties, tallies with the heading of the puffing placard relative to this poison, as it makes the case one of "killing no murder."

MANSLAUGHTER OF A CABMAN.—On Tuesday an adjourned inquest was held by Mr. Payne, at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, on the body of George Briggs, cab proprietor, aged 42, of No. 31, Richard-street, Liverpool-road, Islington. His death was the result of injuries received in a scuffle with three persons who had engaged his cab. The parties are unknown.

THE ALLEGED VIOLENCE OF THE POLICE ON KENNINGTON-COMMON.—On Wednesday the inquest adjourned from the previous day, was resumed before Mr. Baker, at the Lamb, Lamb's-gardens, Bethnal-green, on view of the body of Richard Ellis, aged 44, whose death was alleged to have been occasioned by the ill-usage he received from the hands of the police at the Chartist meeting on Kennington-common, on last Monday fortnight. A man named Parker said deceased was confined all night in the station-house, and in the morning he bailed him out. Deceased told him the blows on his arm were inflicted by some policeman's bludgeon. The coroner said no doubt that was the fact; yet at the same time the blows were not the cause of death, which the jury were bound to attend to. Several of the jury considered it would be useless to prolong the inquiry, and a verdict of "Natural death" was recorded.

OVERLAND MAIL.—We rejoice to hear that arrangements are in progress (notwithstanding the contradiction published by some of our morning contemporaries) for the transmission of the overland mail viâ Trieste; and that we shall thus be relieved from the vexatious annoyances and extortions of the French Post Office. The conveyance of the mail by the proposed route will occasion little or no delay, and will cost a much smaller sum than is now demanded. The Emperor of Austria will permit the mail to pass through his dominions without charge, provided Austrian steamers are employed in conveying to England. The plan is at this moment under the consideration of the Post Office authorities, and, if adopted, will make us wholly independent of the French Post Office.—United Service Gazette.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL, Sept. 5.—The Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital have directed that the Chapel, as well as the Painted Hall, shall be open to the public (gratis) on Mondays and Fridays, from the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon until six o'clock in the afternoon. No persons, however, who are not respectably attired will be admitted.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. VIII.

ST. PAUL'S, COVENT-GARDEN.

When Francis Duke of Bedford, in the reign of the first Charles, proposed to erect a place of worship for his tenantry in the then thinly populated locality of the Convent-Garden, he called to his councils the celebrated Inigo Jones, suggesting, as we find it recorded, that "anything—a barn would do;" an expression sounding more of the prudence than of the piety of the said Francis. The architect took the hint, and thence arose in 1640, the Palladian structure of which we now behold a duplicate; the original building having been destroyed in 1795, through the carelessness of some workmen engaged in its repair. The contemplation of this edifice has given rise to a shrewd suspicion on our mind, that the above venerable anecdote relating to its origin may have been the after-thought of some architectural critic, whose admiration for the designer of Whitehall was stronger than his respect for the memory of the Duke. Be that as it may, the structure, for several years, was merely known as the Chapel of Ease to St. Martin's-in-the Fields, until 1645, when it was erected into a separate living, and, in the year of the Restoration (1660), the patronage was vested in the Duke of Bedford; the whilom chapelry becoming known as the church and parish of St. Paul, Covent-Garden.

St. Paul's, Covent-Garden, has some peculiarities in its structure. The Tuscan portico, with its pizzzi, being placed in the rear instead of the front of the edifice, which latter stands in the quiet by-way of Bedford-street. Hence the back of the altar is (to use a palpable Hibernicism) the front which our artist has chosen for the exercise of his pencil; the lantern and principal entrance being at the western extremity of the church. Popularly speaking it is right; for this is the elevation which has looked down on the many glorious rows, cracked crowns, and melées consequent upon each recurrence of a Westminster election—the hustings-hammering high-bailiff of that ancient borough and city having made this spot memorable as "the field of a thousand fights," by here fixing the polling-place for the return of members to represent it in Parliament. Here then were the tag-rag and bob-tail of this ancient and radical borough wont to disport themselves in fighting, roaring, drinking, and swearing, during the fourteen days' saturnalia of each contested election. But these scenes are no more—the Reform Bill, by dividing the constituencies, and the erection of district polling-booths, has destroyed the glorious anarchy—the rude liberty of the Westminster canaille, and we may look with equal success for the Maypole in the Strand or the Standard on Cornhill, as for an election mob, such as in the days of Fox, Burdett, Hobhouse, Maxwell, or Sheridan, crowded the front of St. Paul's, Covent-Garden. But, if the history of the hustings of Covent-Garden would be the history of political party for the last hundred years, not less would the history of the hotels and coffee-houses, which occupy two sides of the quadrangle, comprise the anecdotal annals of the last century and the earlier portion of the present. The early companions of George the Fourth here revelled; and a host of buried talent, senatorial, literary, forensic, and dramatic, has the "venue" of its brightest witticisms and most brilliant sallies laid in the hotels of "the Garden"—in the Bedford, the Russell, the Piazza, Offey's, Mother Butler's, and the rest.

All around the subject of our sketch has experienced its full share of change. There is a painting by Hogarth, from which an etching has been published, representing Covent-Garden in 1745. There stands the predecessor of the present church, alike in every respect (except the illuminated clock in the pediment)—but here the resemblance ceases. The area now occupied by the handsome market, with its granite columns, plate-glass windows, covered arcades and conservatories, is an uneven space divided by posts and chains, with a pump in its centre. Here and there a market-woman, with looped up petticoats and exposed neck, presides over heaps of vegetables scattered on the ground, while among mounds of turnips, carrots, and cabbages, strut several formal figures in the uncouth head-dresses, pinched stomachers, and stiff diamond-quilted skirts of a century ago; accompanied by puppy dogs, and beaux as precise and quaint in attire as themselves. But to return. The design, both of church and piazza, is said to have been borrowed from a place built by Cosmo de Medicis at Leghorn. The bold projecting cornice outside, and the eight Corinthian columns of the altarpiece within, have found many admirers among the cognoscenti. In the churchyard lies the eminent father of all stale jokes, to wit, Joseph Miller, Esq.; a gentleman to whom posterity has done cruel injustice, if a recent writer speak truth who avers that the said Joseph was a fellow so remarkably dull as never to have perpetuated a pun, and par conséquence must stand acquitted of all suspicion of petty larceny. But if Joseph Miller deserve this exculpation, his near neighbour Claude du Val, the hero of highwaymen, can raise no such claim. He also lies in this graveyard; but as the pseudo jokes of the one and the felonies of the other are foreign to our enquiries, we shall here close our notice of St. Paul, Covent-Garden.

It seems to be understood that Mr. S. Mark Phillips, Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, is about to retire from his office, and that his successor is to be Mr. Gregson. Mr. Gregson has long enjoyed the personal intimacy of Sir Robert Peel, and is known to have been his principal agent in preparing his bills for the consolidation of the criminal laws, when the right hon. baronet presided over the Home Department.

The amount subscribed for the Mostyn testimonial is now over £900.

THE FASHIONS.

PARIS, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, Sept. 7, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—As this is the season when fashion may be considered dull, our belles being alone at their chateaux while their husbands and lovers are out shooting, such being the case you will find little novelty in the dresses, drawings of which I send you, but that in the first there is a pelisse, a high dress made with a double cape cut so as to fall over the bust and shoulders like a cardinal. In the same figure the flounces are of a new mode. There are, you will see, two put on the skirt with but little fulness, and each surmounted with two smaller ones of the same kind. The cap is à la Viennoise (for here we have a name for everything); it is made of lace with a cockade and flowing end of ribbon on the left side. I would not advise too many of your fair readers to put their beauty to the peril of wearing this style of cap at present so fashionable in a Parisian demi-toilette. It gives a bold look to the face, and by being so wide at the back of the head throws an air of effronterie about the lady wearing it, which is not always desirable. Lace is still very much in favour, and will continue so during the winter. The sleeve, a sketch of which I sent you last week, made of rows of lace, one over the other, falling down to the hand, is also worn in black lace, and has a charming effect. By some this lace sleeve is worn only extending from the elbow to the wrist, but the prettiest certainly is that which begins from the shoulder. To enumerate the names of the various light fabrics worn would answer no purpose, your linen-drapers, of course, have most of them in their shops. Silk, however, is now again coming into favour; and as the season advances, our mantelets, camails, and cardinals are invariably composed of this material. The colours worn will be very gay and showy, and the costumes of autumn evenings is already met by camails of gros de Neples and satin of the lightest hues. Bonnets must be worn, as I before told you, of rather a horse-shoe form in front, and trimmed high up on the crown with wreathe of flowers. Of these so capricious is the fashion, whether according to the taste or complexion of the wearer, that I can give no exact directions on this head, except that lilies of the valley and a deep red dark rose appear to predominate.

JULIE.

CORN EXCHANGE.—At our market on Monday, we had a very brisk inquiry for both English and Foreign wheat, at an advance of from 3s to 5s per quarter; since that day, however, the demand has become less animated, and the above amount of improvement has been with difficulty maintained. Barley and malt have commanded little attention; but the value of oats has been steadily supported. Beans, peas, and flour proving a mere drug.

REPRINT.

THE TOPICS OF THE WEEK.

The events of the present week are, for all purposes of newspaper application, the events of the two or three weeks that have preceded them. There is no active political stir—the commotions of the manufacturing districts are settling down into something like repose—the daily journals confine the contentions of party to dry reasonings upon abstract subjects—theoretical advice to legislators takes place of the voice of Parliament—even agitation is more busy in the abuse of its own leaders than in making any rapid strides towards a national excitement. The great distress, too, that has been endured by the poorer classes, has become more calm in its sufferings, and it is hoped that, under the blessing of Heaven, from an abundant harvest and a partial revival of trade, it has derived such temporary relief, as we trust is only the forerunner of legislatorial protection from future desitution, as soon as Parliament shall enter upon its functions again. The visit of her Majesty to Scotland, which has, in the mean while, become the absorbing topic of public intelligence, has partaken so much more of a social and domestic, than of a political character—that we cannot associate either its objects or its progress with party contention and strife; and thus in the field of politics as in that of agriculture, the crop may be said to be gathered in, and we are left as journalists with plenty of opportunity indeed of sowing for the future, but with nothing immediately to reap.

It is true that if we chose to pick up some of the chaff that we find scattered around us, we might have our fling at the sulky and ill-starred bailies of Edinburgh—who could not manage grace amongst them to meet even their Sovereign with becoming propriety and respect—who could not repress their awkwardness even upon the occasion of a regal visit to their city—nor smother their meanness, amid all the incentives to generous thought and action which ought to have been crowding upon their hearts. A set of canting loons—the scorn of all the country—they have only exhibited so nice a combination of niggardness, folly, and indecorum, as may serve to wrap them in a garment of obloquy for the remaining term of their unnatural existence.

Not like these "bailies," however, have been the boys of the merry Highlands. The Queen has been a Queen indeed among them—heralded over their lochs and among their mountains with the wild enthusiasm of the ancient loyalty of the land—received with the fine feudal reverence of other days—made happy with the stirring exultation that warmed every heart in the Highlands at her approach—met and feasted with a boundless and generous hospitality by the gallant nobles and their clans—sheltered and protected under their princely hereditary homes—escorted from castle to castle and hall to hall, amid sounds of honour and triumph that were shouted in the valleys and reverberated among the hills in endless bursts and echoes of loyalty and joy. All the best spirit of the best days of Scottish chivalry has been revived upon the occasion of the lordly Highlanders having their Sovereign for a guest—and the name and honour of the nation have been upheld and vindicated by the free-hearted bearing of the best and noblest of its sons.

But leaving the gratifying progress of this eventful "Royal Tour" to be gathered from the full details and splendid illustration which we have elsewhere given of it, we recur to the dearth of anything like a political topic of consequence upon which to address our readers, and, in its absence, seize upon one of the mere occurrences of the moment, which is, however, of a character to command attention and to extort comment from the pen of any public writer who has the truth and interest of English liberty at heart.

This, we lament to say, is another case of magisterial injustice, and, if possible, of a still more flagrant and aggravated character than that which with so much sorrow and indignation we had last week to record and denounce. The narrative, as it has been authenticated, is simply this:—

A very notorious and ill-conditioned person of the name of Frederick Fox Cooper, whose figurings in public life have never been of a very enviable character, acquires the management of a theatre at Dover, and, failing in his payments to his actors, gets into a sort of fracas with two of them, who think proper to administer to their manager some sort of personal chastisement or assault. Whatever may be the character of Mr. Cooper, or his defalcations as a manager, of course the law was strong enough to protect him against any personal violence, and therefore, when Mr. Fitzjames and Mr. Gladstane, the two persons complained of, were brought before the magistrates upon Mr. Cooper's charge, they were fined ten shillings for their offence, which the magistrates thought sufficient to meet the justice of the case. The assault, it must therefore be inferred, was of a very trifling character.

But Mr. Frederick Fox Cooper goes a little further in the adventure; and—thinking proper to swear that he goes in fear of his life from the two persons who had used him with such considerate gentleness, in the first instance, that all their bruising was only valued by the magistrates at ten shillings—the defendants are held to bail in a trifling sum (£20 each we believe beside their own recognizances); and while waiting for this bail, they were put to duress in Dover gaol—and their subjected by the ruffianly insolence of the gaoler having their hair shorn (alias cropped) as if they had been convicted felons—with accompanying indignities at the hands of the prison functionary. The bail arrived in due course, and the aggrieved parties released, at once, and very properly, bring the gaoler before the magistrates to account for the outrage committed upon their persons. The case is heard, and the sapient magistrates decide that they can give no redress; and that, in their opinion the Dover gaoler had not exceeded his duty. Well, then, Heaven preserve us for ever from the clutches of a Dover gaoler, or the justice of a Dover Dogberry! But the case fortunately will not be allowed to rest. It has thrown Dover into a perfect state of excitement: and the London press having fully recorded the circumstances, the monstrous outrage is now felt almost personally by the whole community. All accounts state that Mr. Fitzjames was by birth and education a gentleman, and that Mr. Gladstane had claims to the same character; if so, the indignity must have been more acutely felt, and its humiliation the more annoying: but that circumstance is one by which we set no store.

The fact that any man in any condition of life should, while waiting for bail for an offence not committed, but only of presumed possibility, and that in a question of breach of peace arising from some idle threat made in a moment of exasperation, and on a chance only valued at a few pounds—the fact that a man placed in such a position by a momentary contingency of the law, should be treated as a convicted felon in a common gaol—and then that men professing to be magistrates, should justify such brutal assault (for it is nothing less) by a gaoler, is an insult upon an Englishman's understanding of the word Liberty, and its occurrence in a Christian country almost surpasses belief.

We last week had occasion to remark, that Sir James Graham would be compelled to exercise something like a surveillance over the operation of magisterial law; the case we have recorded has made our words good, and we rejoice to learn that, as Secretary of State, he has instituted an inquiry into its merits. If such atrocities were suffered to pass with impunity, there would be an end to personal freedom in the country, and to any reliance upon the just protection which the constitution should afford to the people. But we hope the redress of the injury sustained by Messrs. Gladstane and Fitzjames will teach magistrates a lesson of duty; and while it proves the value and power of press-intervention to denounce grievances of this kind, increase the general confidence of society in the impartiality, the integrity, and the majesty of the superior law.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Journal des Débats is of a bellicose humour, and resolved at least to excite sensations, if news is not to be got at. The other day it fired its batteries at M. Berryer, accused of being an advocate, and, as such, too vulgar to represent a noble and a Court party. On Sunday the French Court organ attacked Sir R. Peel.

Skirmishes continue in Africa, where a smart rencontre has taken place in the vicinity of Bougie between the French and Arabs.

Artim Bey is coming from Alexandria to Paris, according to the Augsburgh Gazette to negotiate a loan.

The French accounts from Senegal are little favourable to the French or to the gum trade. The Moors prefer burying their gum to selling it to the French traders.

PARIS, Monday.—The King and her royal highness Madame Adelaide, accompanied by Marshal Soult, M. Guizot (who had just arrived at Eu), Col. Dumas, and M. de Gerente, visited Treport on Saturday, and returned in the evening to Eu. In the course of the day his royal highness the Duke de Montpensier left Eu, accompanied by Commandant Thierry, his aide-de-camp, for Vincennes.

M. Dupin, says the Courrier Français, is expected in Paris by the end of the present month, in order to attend a conference on the affairs of the Duke of Orleans; and the Prince de Joinville, who was expected shortly at Toulon to resume the command of his frigate, will remain until after that period.

The National having stated that, on the occasion of the visit of the Duke de Nemours to Luneville, General Gusler, to whom the Prince presented the order of Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour, had complained of injustice towards him in his military career, and consented to receive the order only out of respect to his royal highness. The general has published a letter denying the statement, and General Baron Achard, who was present at the time when the order was conferred, had also published a letter to the same effect.

The Courrier Français having mentioned a report that it was intended by the Ministry to create a Bench of Bishops in the Chamber of Peers, the Moniteur reminds that journal, that the French clergy, however important a body from their information and their virtues, do not come within the category of legislative power fixed by the charter of 1830.

A Toulon letter of the 7th inst. says:—"A speedy departure of four ships from Admiral Hugon's squadron, for the Levant, is talked of."

The Colonial Council of French Guiana has sent a petition to the King, praying his Majesty to allow representatives of the Colonies to take their places in the Chamber of Deputies, as is permitted for other parts of the kingdom. It founds its application on the unjust manner in which the fiscal laws are imposed on the colonies, and on the attempts constantly made by the Home Government to withdraw from the colonial councils a portion of their attributions.

The Minister of Marine has instituted a committee to inquire into the grievances of the merchants interested in the gum trade against the company to whom the governor of Senegal made over, in January last, the monopoly of that article. The committee, composed of delegates from the Chamber of Commerce, and of the Director of the Colonies, is to meet in Paris towards the latter end of September.

Captain Edouard Bouet, former commander of the French naval station on the coast of Senegal, has been appointed governor of that colony.

The Memorial Bordelais states, that the Duke d'Aumale had purchased for 2,000,000f. the estate of Chateaux-Margaux, which formerly belonged to M. Aguado.

The last accounts from Algiers are of the 5th inst. The Governor-General left in the Phare steamer on the 3rd for Oran, to organize the different tribes for the province, who lately submitted to the French, and to instal the new Bey of Mostaganem. The general was expected back in Algiers towards the end of the month, when he is to take the command of an expedition, in the east of the regency. The country around Algiers was tranquil, and the market plentifully supplied with provisions. On the 30th ult. the powerful tribe of the Issers made their submission, and their chiefs arrived at Algiers to receive the investiture. The Beni-Limans had likewise demanded the Aman. Their Aga, Mahi Eldine, had presented himself, with his 600 horsemen, to the Governor of Medeah, and taken the oath of allegiance to the King of the French. He left his children as hostages, and undertook to convey to Medeah the corn, contained in 42 silos, belonging to Abd-el-Kader.

THE TREASURE-SHIP LE TELEMAQUE.—QUILLEBEUF, Sept. 3. The preparations for raising this vessel, by machinery constructed on new principles, are now nearly completed, under the direction of Captain Taylor, an English engineer. The general impression is, that she contains immense treasure in coin, plate, and jewelery, which Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, joined by many of the nobility and the heads of several churches and religious houses, had endeavoured to transport in her and another vessel to England, when the terrible events of the revolution began to show themselves. The vessels were ostensibly freighted with oak timber, and were chartered at Rouen. They stood down the Seine but the popular chiefs in Paris having received some information, sent orders to seize them. The smaller one, a schooner, was captured, and her contents (among which was found a quantity of rich plate) were sent under a strong escort to Pont-au-de-Mer. The larger, the Télémaque, endeavoured to run down the river, but on coming amongst the dangerous quicksands opposite Quillebeuf, she touched the bottom. Before anything could be done, the tide returning in the form of a "bore," as in the Severn and Ganges, threw her over, and at low water she had sunk through the sandbank. This occurred on the 3rd of January, 1790. Nearly all the men employed are English; they live in a large lighter moored near the wreck, and are provided with bed and board by their employers. The works are carried on night and day. There has been scarcely an attempt of late to send down divers, but there is one, provided with all the necessary apparatus, attached to the corps of workmen. The probable value of the treasure in the Télémaque has been variously estimated at from 30,000,000 to 80,000,000 francs. The celebrated necklace of Marie Antoinette is said to be in the wreck. There can be no doubt, from the curiosity that this mystery has kept awake in France for upwards of fifty years, that if those who have now undertaken the enterprise should succeed, they will become highly popular, and be honoured with some marks of distinction.

SPAIN.—The Madrid mail and papers of the 4th have been received, but their contents are wholly destitute of interest.

Accounts from Madrid of the 5th instant have arrived. It was believed that a fresh misunderstanding had occurred between Spain and Portugal, arising, it was supposed, out of M. Almadovar's ill-will to M. Costa Cabral and the commercial treaty already concluded between Great Britain and Portugal. A report prevailed that M. Calatrava would shortly resign the Financial Department, and be replaced by M. Domingo Ximenes, who had had of late frequent interviews with the Regent. The Spanish Consul at Oporto had announced to his Government that the Portuguese authorities had caused to be arrested, at his request, a number of criminals who had sought refuge in Portugal, as well as the ex-Carlist Lieutenant-Colonel Javier Blanco Marquina, who had just arrived from Bourdeaux.

According to the Barcelona journals of the 6th inst. two small bands had made their appearance near Vich and Villadran. One of the rebels belonging to the latter had been taken prisoner and shot. On his way through Girona, General Zurbano delivered a list of 11 republicans to the first constitutional alcalde, with an order to expel them from the province within three days. The alcalde was to be personally answerable for the execution of this order.

PORTUGAL.—The Lisbon mail of the 5th inst. (by the Royal Tar steamer, which arrived on Saturday at Falmouth,) brings information of the arrangements made for covering the deficiency in the ways and means for the present year; the Legislature having sanctioned the proposal of the Ministry to raise money in anticipation of part of the taxes to be collected next year. This will enable the Government to obtain the required sum in Lisbon, without having recourse to our market—where, indeed, they would stand little chance of success, even on the most extravagant terms.

GERMANY.—BERLIN, Sept. 4.—Within the last week we have had several fires in the neighbourhood of Berlin. Our markets are well supplied, and no rise in prices are apprehended.

THE KING OF PRUSSIA.—FRANKFORT, Sept. 3.—The grand final review of the 7th and 8th corps of the Prussian army is fixed for the 12th instant. The King and Queen will afterwards retire to their beautiful picturesque residence of Stolzenfels, and there remain for six days, surrounded by numerous personages of distinction of all the nations of Europe; but, during the time, they will pay a visit to Prince Metternich at Johannisberg. On the 4th will commence the grand entertainments on the marriage of the Princess Mary of Prussia with the Hereditary Prince of Bavaria, which will be celebrated on that day. On this occasion the King of Bavaria will grant, it is expected, a general amnesty for political offenders. His Bavarian Majesty passed through the town this morning, on his way to Cologne, where the King of Wurtemberg, his son the Hereditary Grand Duke, and the Margrave of Baden, are also going, having arrived at Mentz on their way.

The official accounts of the flax and tobacco crops in Silesia are very unfavourable. It says:—"The flax has totally failed; the drought has done so much injury to the tobacco that the very most that can be expected is an average crop."

DRESDEN, Sept. 3.—The scarcity of water, in consequence of which the mills can grind much less than usual, has not only caused the price of bread in this city to be doubled, but has even caused bread to be scarce. We have learnt that a dreadful fire took place near the Prebischthor (the celebrated forest in the Saxon Switzerland), partly in Saxony, partly in Bohemia. The Leipzig Gazette has a letter from Libentz of the 1st of September respecting this fire, which says—"An awful conflagration, which broke out yesterday at noon, is ravaging the noble forests on the frontiers of Saxony and Bohemia. It commenced on the Bohemia side, and in a few hours resembled a sea of flame. At the distance of three leagues we saw the sun look like a blood-red ball of fire—more than 200 acres of forest are already destroyed; in Bohemia the loss is immense. All human aid seems to be vain. The long-continued heat and drought makes every blade of grass a tuft of furze. The fire still rages to-day with unabated fury. The wind, which now blows towards Bohemia, drives the flames down the mountains; the detached houses and the villages in the forests are in the greatest danger." Another account says that the fire still continued on the 4th. A thousand men were employed in endeavouring to stop its progress.

VIENNA, Sept. 3.—Count Von Mittrowsky, the chief Aulic Chancellor, died yesterday evening.

ALTENBURG, August 29.—The Crown Prince of Hanover is expected here; but it is said that his marriage with our amiable Princess Mary will not take place till January or February next. The Estates of the Duchy, in the assembly last week, voted a portion of 30,000 dollars to the bride.

BUILDING OF THE CATHEDRAL AT COLOGNE.—Sept. 5.—Yesterday was the great day here. Of the promised Kings, only one was present; the King of Wurtemburg did not arrive, and his Hanoverian Majesty was detained by illness. The day chosen for the ceremony being Sunday, it was quite in order that the King should first attend the service at the Protestant church. It was, of course, equally in order that high mass should be performed on that day in the cathedral. At both services the King and Queen were present. After church the royal party proceeded to the spot on the south side of the aisle which had been prepared for the laying of the first stone, when the King, on proceeding to perform the ceremony, addressed a speech of some length to the assembled multitude, in which the leading theme related to the wishes, political and religious, of the Germanic States. Illustrating by historical allusions the advantages which other countries had drawn at various periods from the disunion prevailing in Germany, he glanced skilfully at a recent attempt to do the same on the part of a neighbouring power; but which attempt, he congratulated himself and them, was decisively foiled by the display of unanimity which Germany under arms put forth. The King was interrupted here by loud acclamations, and when they had subsided, the old crane at the top of the half-finished tower, so well known to travellers, was set slowly in motion, and a huge stone was raised to the summit, in token of the promised continuation of the edifice. The assembly then broke up, and the company invited, soon after one, met in an immense tent, a present from the Emperor of Russia, in which upwards of 400 covers were laid.

The Cologne Gazette states that a telegraphic despatch had been received at Warsaw, announcing the accouchement of the Princess Mary, wife of the Hereditary Grand Duke of Russia, of a daughter.

The session of the States of Baden was closed on the 9th inst. by the Minister of the Interior in the name of the Grand Duke.

The King of Holland left the Hague on Friday for Cologne.

The King of the Belgians returned to the Palace of Laecken on Saturday from Aix-la-Chapelle, where, says the Independent of Brussels, he had an interview of an hour's duration with the King of Prussia.

THE HAGUE, Sept. 7.—We hear that their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Orange are likewise going to Cologne. The King will set out for Cologne on Friday to meet the King of Prussia, and be present at the grand review of the Prussian army.

The Buda Gazette (Hungary), of the 31st ult., contains an elaborate description of the ceremony of laying the first stone of the suspension bridge over the Danube, for uniting that city with Pesth, which took place on the 24th. The point at which the ceremony was performed was decorated with great pomp, and surrounded by benches raised in the form of an amphitheatre, capable of holding 4000 spectators. At an early hour the Archduke Palatine gave a grand dinner to a party of native and foreign personages of distinction. The ceremony was performed with all the accustomed formalities by the Archduke Charles, and attended by salvos of artillery, the waving of the united standards of Austria and Hungary, and the acclamations of the people.

WARSAW, August 28.—The reform in the Post-office, which has long been announced in the kingdom of Poland, has now taken place, and this department, like all the branches of the administration, is regulated more on Russian principles. Hitherto there was only one rate of postage for the whole kingdom, without regard to distance. Now there are different rates according to the distance: the first, from 5 to 100 wersts; the second, from 100 to 200 wersts; and the third, from 200 to 700 wersts, besides ten per cent. for the roads. The carriage for parcels is likewise regulated according to the distance.

WARSAW, Sept. 1.—The journals of to-day say that a telegraphic despatch, the date of which they do not give, has been received from St. Petersburgh, announcing that the Grand Duchess Mary, consort of the Imperial Alexander, has been delivered of a Princess, who has received the name of Alexandria. In honour of this event the great theatre in this city will be open to the public gratis.

DENMARK—CHRISTIANA, August 20.—The King gave his sanction, on the 20th, to the penal code voted by the Storthing. There is a general report that his Majesty will shortly arrive here to close the Storthing in person.

COPENHAGEN, Sept. 2.—The harvest in Zealand is nearly over, three weeks have sufficed for it. In some parts the winter corn has failed; the summer corn was never finer. It is very heavy and abundant.—Hamburgh papers, Sept. 9.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 8th inst. quotes a letter from St. Petersburg of the 27th ult., announcing that the Emperor had increased the salaries of the diplomatic and consular agents of Russia in the Ottoman Empire. The ambassador at Constantinople is to receive in future 36,000 roubles per annum. Besides the ordinary personnel of the Chancery, a special office for commercial affairs is to be attached to the Legation. There are to be Consuls-General in Egypt, at Smyrna, and in Servia, and a Consulate at Jassy. According to advices from Vienna of the 1st inst. the Duke de Bordeaux was, on his return from Toplitz, to set out on a journey through Italy.

ROME, Sept. 3.—Captain Cialdi has received from the Pontifical Government orders to proceed to Egypt to take charge of the obelisk which Mehemet Ali has presented to the Pope. This curious monument is called by European antiquaries the obelisk of Sesostris, but in Egypt it is called the obelisk of the Patriarch Abraam. Several sovereigns have expressed to the Viceroy their desire to have it. Rome will now possess twelve obelisks, all from Egypt.

A letter from Aleppo, in the Augsburg Gazette, contains the following:—"Our commerce is in a state of stagnation in consequence of the measures adopted by the Porte relative to the currency. All Turkish coins, except three, are taken out of circulation, and must be exchanged for the new currency at a loss of 40 per cent. The inhabitants of Orfa are in full revolt against the Government. Having learned that the Pacha of Aleppo had arrested six of the highest persons, they expelled the Pacha's Lieutenant and the garrison, and seized on six high Turkish functionaries, declaring that they would put them to death if the slightest injury was inflicted on their countrymen. The inhabitants of Marach are also in revolt, and the Arabs, to the number of 20,000, threaten to seize on the Pachalic. On this account the Pacha is about to set out for Orfa with considerable forces, to establish order there, in concert with the Pacha of Karput, and to drive off the Arabs."

THE EGYPTIAN FLEET.—A letter from Alexandria, 22nd ult., in the Semaphore of Marseilles, says:—"It was supposed that the Pacha had renounced the intention of sending out his fleet, but the contrary appears to be the case, for, during the last two days, the ships have been taking in provisions, and Said Pacha has been sent for by his father. This sudden determination has given rise to various conjectures. Some say that the fleet is about to be sent on a secret mission; while others assert that it is to join the squadron of Admiral de la Susse. There is reason to believe, however, that the Egyptian fleet will not proceed to any distance from the coast, and that the chief object in sending it out is for exercise and manœuvres."

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—Cape of Good Hope papers to the 8th of July have arrived, but they only supply the news of rumours in circulation that the remnant of the force under Captain Smith had been cut off, and that to protect themselves they had surrendered to the Boers. The general accounts, published as extracts of letters from Natal, are extremely vague; and though they refer to the probable seizure of the Mazeppa and Louisa (not the Pilot, as stated on Saturday last, they do not state positively that they were in the hands of the enemy. Mr. Smellekamp, the Dutch supercargo, who has been alluded to as having united the emigrant farmers to resistance, had been apprehended for travelling the colony without a pass. He has been examined on the subject of his visit to Natal, and he entirely disclaims being the representative of Holland, saying his mission was solely with the view to see what could be done in the way of trade. He alleges he told the Volksraad so when he was before that body, on their taking into consideration the expediency of publishing their manifesto against the British Government. In the state of excitement in which the colony had been plunged by this state of affairs, there was no certain reliance on the various rumours current. There were reports abroad of the rising of the Griquas in opposition to the Boers, and also of the large force which the latter had brought into the field to exterminate that tribe, and reinforce themselves in their position. On the frontier the Kafirs were restless, but a vigilant watch was kept upon their movements. At Cape Town the Council had determined to appeal against the proposition of the Colonial Secretary to send out to the Cape, as a species of transportation, juvenile delinquents, hereafter to be apprenticed as servants. The majority of the council regarded the plan as one which, if not immediately repudiated, would render the Cape liable to the objection of being a penal settlement.

THE UNITED STATES.—HAVRE, Sept. 11.—The packet Ville de Lyon, Captain Stoddart, has just arrived from New York, bringing papers to the 20th ult., the day she sailed. The treaties with Great Britain were in statu quo before the senate, who were deliberating on them with closed doors. It was attempted in the House of Representatives to establish the "Tariff Bill," lately vetoed by the President, as law, in spite of Mr. Tyler's veto, the numbers being 91 to 87 on that proposition. The constitution requiring in all such cases two-thirds of the members to form a majority, the motion fell to the ground.

RATIFICATION OF THE TREATY BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND AMERICA.—The British and North American royal mail steamer Britannia, Captain Herritt, arrived at Liverpool on Monday morning, at seven o'clock, from Boston and Halifax. The passage from Boston to Liverpool occupied twelve days and twelve hours. The Britannia made the outward voyage in fourteen days and twelve hours. We have received New York papers to the 31st ult., and Boston of the 1st, and Halifax of the 3rd inst. The treaty between the United States and Great Britain had been ratified by the Senate. The vote was 39 to 9. The ratification of the treaty had diffused the most lively joy throughout the Union. Lord Ashburton had been received in the chief cities he had visited, after leaving Washington, in the most enthusiastic manner. Congress has passed a new Tariff and Revenue Bill, in which the distribution clause, objected to in the preceding Bills by the President, who, in consequence of it, vetoed two, was omitted. The measure passed the Senate by a majority of one only. The President immediately sanctioned it by his signature, and it had become law. The passing of a Tariff and Revenue Bill had, after the excitement and the disappointment caused by the vetoing of two similar bills in one session, given great satisfaction. Congress had, after one of the longest and most eventful sessions on record, adjourned till the first Monday in December. The general opinion was that the effects of the treaty on commercial matters would be beneficial. The State of Pennsylvania had advertised all her public works for sale, agreeing to receive in payment State Stock at par—this stock ranges now, as it is a 5 or 6 per cent. stock, from 40 to 44 so that the temptation to buy is very great. The works cost about 30,000,000 dollars.

The stock of New York, Ohio, and Kentucky had slightly advanced. Illinois bonds had been more in demand, and the impression seemed to prevail that the Legislature of this state will, at the next session, take some decided steps to resuscitate the credit of the State. The rate on London was, for city bills, 107¼ to 107¾; on Paris, 5 35 to 5 37½; on Amsterdam, 39 to 39¼; on Hamburgh, 34⅝ to 35; and on Bremen, 75 to 75½. The wheat crop of the Union is described as superabundant. The yield of the crop would, it was expected, be very large. The Legislature of Canada was to meet at Kingston in the first week of the present month. It was rumoured that one of its first acts would be a vote of confidence in the existing Executive Council. Advices from Mexico to the 17th ult. and from Texas to the 6th, had been received. A very uneasy feeling prevailed in Texas as to the hostile designs of Mexico. A large force had been collected in Vera Cruz, not less in number, it is said, than 7000, ostensibly to act against Yucatan, but, it was suspected, really against the city of Galveston. It does not appear that the iron steam-frigate had reached Mexico. From Brazil the accounts come down to the 10th of July. The insurgents at Tamandua had been defeated by 300 Imperial troops. Orders had been issued by Government to put every rebel to the sword and burn their property. After the rebels in Minas Geraes destroyed the bridge at Purahyhuna, they intrenched themselves in a valley near by, where the Imperialists attacked and completely routed them. They fled precipitately, leaving behind them arms, money, and provisions. All the northern provinces were quiet at the last accounts. It appears by the intelligence, that the empire of Brazil is far from being in a settled state, although to the latest dates the Imperialists had obtained all the advantages.

SOUTH AMERICA.—Buenos Ayres papers to July 1 have come to hand. They continue to dwell on the political state of the republic, in connexion with that of the neighbouring republic of Uruguay, but it does not appear that any further blow had been struck between the hostile powers. The Monte Videan accounts, which reach to a late date (July 4), mention that the inhabitants of Uruguay were unanimous in their determination to resist to the last extremity the aggressions of President Rosas. The Argentine journals in the interest of the Dictator fail not to remark that the statements to this effect but ill accord with what had been previously admitted on the subject, considerable lukewarmness in various parts having been previously exhibited, especially at Mercedes, where an announcement of the Government that the peril of the country was imminent had been received with much indifference. The same papers speak of the desertions from the oriental state as being rather upon the increase than otherwise, but it is not worth while to place too implicit a confidence in the reports emanating from this quarter. There has always been a good deal of exaggeration on both sides of the river. It is repeated in the private advices that Rosas was still aiming at the sovereignty of Paraguay, to the exclusion of the commerce of this and other countries. Mention is, indeed, made of his interference on a recent occasion in shutting out the Brazilians, but it is understood that both nations have their eye upon the state referred to, with a view to its occupation. Difficulties have for some time existed between Chili and Buenos Ayres, and it is asserted in letters from Monte Video, that war had at length been formally declared by the former state against the latter. The rumour may possibly have been got up for political purposes, although the present would certainly appear to be an auspicious moment for the prosecution of any claims the Chilians may have to urge against their neighbours. Accounts from the Mauritius to June the 3th have also come forward, but they present no new feature.

WEST INDIES.—SAVAGE MURDER IN JAMAICA.—As Mr. M'Callum, the overseer on Providence, was taking his usual ride round the estate, his attention was attracted by the appearance of an unusual number of crows hovering over a certain spot lying on the public road towards the sea beach; he was thereupon induced to ascertain the object of their attraction, and, on advancing towards the place, a distance of about eighty yards from the road, he was horrified on observing the skeleton of a human body, on which the birds had apparently fully completed their horrid banquet. Mr. M'Callum lost no time in summoning persons from the estate, and a more minute investigation of the skeleton took place. The sex of the deceased was determined by the clothing, which, though torn, appeared to be that of a girl, about 12 or 14 years old; with the exception of the hands, the throat, and the legs, on which the skin remained, the body was completely divested of flesh. The arms were bound so forcibly with withes as to have cut through the skin, and thus stretched out to their greatest tension; the legs were also bound about the ankles loosely with the same substitute for cordage; a piece of stick was found driven up the left nostril. The deceased was a girl of 14 years old, called Maria Duncan, the daughter of a black woman, named Mary Duncan, living in this town. Four negroes have been apprehended on suspicion.—Private Correspondent of the Times.

AUSTRALIA.—Port Philip papers to May the 11th mention that a public meeting had been held of the greater portion of the influential inhabitants of Melbourne and the settlers of the surrounding districts, for the purpose of petitioning the Legislative Council to pass an act for the establishment of municipal corporations applicable to the town of Melbourne. Resolutions, embodying a prayer to the effect stated, were adopted, with scarcely a dissentient voice. The capture of some bushrangers, one of whom was shot dead in a struggle with the captors, was exciting some attention in the colony, but, otherwise, all was proceeding as quietly as usual.

THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday Morning.—It was fully expected that yesterday would witness the general return to labour in the lately unsettled districts surrounding this town, but those anticipations have only been partially realized. A few more power loom weavers returned to work yesterday morning at the old prices, and a few more have been added to their number this morning, but the great majority of this numerous body are still out of work, many of them asserting that they may as well walk the streets in a state of starvation as continue at work and be little better off. The writ for holding a special assize of oyer and terminer and general gaol delivery for the county palatine has been issued by Lord Granville Somerset, and was on Saturday lodged with the high sheriff, T. R. W. Frame, Esq., of Rawcliffe Hall. It fixes the commission day for Tuesday, the 4th of October. Several of the learned judges are named in the commission, but those expected to preside at the trial of the rioters are—Lord Abinger, (the Lord Chief Baron), and Sir E. H. Alderson, the two who appear first on the list. The assizes are to be held at Lancaster only, and the prisoners in confinement in Kirkdale will, in all probability, be removed to Lancaster for trial.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.—APPREHENSION OF FORTY-THREE PRISONERS.—The power-loom weavers, who are still out of work, held yesterday several meetings in various parts of the town, most of which, being open air meetings, were dispersed by the police. In the afternoon of yesterday a large meeting of the weavers was held in the Charlist-room, Brown-street, near St. Andrew's Church. A large body of special constables were in consequence marched from the Town-hall to that place, under the command of Captain Sleiga, the assistant-commissioner, and Superintendent Sawley. In the neighbourhood they were joined by a strong body of the regular police, under the command of Superintendent Cochrane. When Superintendent Sawley reached the spot, he found a large crowd in the street, and a person addressing them from the window. This is the account given by the police; and they also say, that when Mr. Sawley made his appearance, he desired the crowd to disperse, but instead of doing so, they saluted him with hooting and execrations, and stones were thrown. In consequence, the police and special constables charged the crowd, dispersed great numbers, and took forty-three of them into custody. The statement of the weavers is totally different. They positively assert that the only object of the meeting was to distribute the subscriptions to the weavers. However this may be, the event caused great excitement in the town, and the police and military were on duty till a late hour, and many of the former all night. This morning all is quiet, but no more hands are gone to work. At Staleybridge an attempt was yesterday made to turn out the hands of some of the mills; but the military dispersed the mob.

ASHTON, STALEYBRIDGE, &c.—There was a meeting at Ashton yesterday, which was dispersed by the military, and afterwards another meeting was held between Ashton and Dukenfield, at which it was determined not to resume work until the prices demanded were obtained. The mills were still idle, but the peace of the town has not been disturbed. Several of the mills at Staleybridge were opened yesterday morning, and in consequence of its being expected that an attempt would be made to turn out the hands, a troop of dragoons proceeded from Ashton to that place, to protect the mills. An attack was however made on a mill near Hyde, and before the military could reach the spot the mob had stopped the machinery, and turned out the hands.

THE STAFFORDSHIRE POTTERIES.

NEWCASTLE, Wednesday.—COMMITTAL OF ELLIS ON A CHARGE OF HIGH TREASON.—On Monday afternoon Ellis, the ringleader in the late outrages in the Potteries, was brought before Captain Mainwaring, and T. B. Rose, and J. A. Wise, Esqrs., to answer charges that arose against him in connexion with the recent outrages. Evidence was adduced to show that he had, on several occasions, addressed the mob in the most exciting and inflammatory manner, and had endeavoured to bring the Queen and Royal Family, as well as the constituted authorities, into contempt and disrespect. Witnesses being called in proof, the prisoner was remanded till yesterday morning, when he was again brought up before the bench. The Court was excessively crowded. After the examination of witnesses, he was fully committed to take his trial at the next gaol delivery, for having, with force and arms, attempted to levy war against our sovereign lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

THE DRAMA.

COVENT GARDEN.

The greater theatres are opening the winter season upon us (if we dare yet speak of winter while thermometers mount to summer heat) with something like an indication of a spirited campaign. Old Drury will fling wide its doors on the 1st of October, and Covent Garden has already made auspicious commencement of the "Kemble reign." The Kemble reign! well, there is a fine magic of old associations in the touch of memory which those words call up; and again and again we wish the dynasty joy. We are not yet in condition to bear our part in illustrating the "début" of the new company, although another week will bring its fruit in that department; but we must make orderly record of the progress of affairs. We are glad to know that the impression which even that should create, ought to be conducive, in its humble way, to the success of the establishment. In all respects it is gratifying to know, that the popularity of Miss Adelaide Kemble in opera remains undiminished, as her genius is undoubted and supreme. Her revival of Norma, and her splendid sustainment of the part in La Somnambula, have confirmed and vindicated all her renown; and what she has achieved under a partial excitement and indisposition, only tends to strengthen our anticipations of what "greater treats" are yet in store.

Meanwhile "the bark swims on" in the department of the drama, as contradistinguished from opera. Everybody is ready to pick Gertrude's Cherries as reared by Jerrold, and although their flavour is not equally relished by all critics yet they are pretty generally admitted by the public to be "very nice." Then there has been a new five act play by Mr. Lovell, with the fame of which "our London waxes loud"—and here is enough to show that the management has not been remiss in the production of novelty. The new play deserves some special notice, which we here give in due routine, reserving more detailed opinion for a conjunction with illustration. We shall not, however, enter minutely into the plot, preferring rather to treat that, in review of the poem, as a dramatic production, and confining ourselves to the report of a contemporary upon the merits of the play, which was entitled Love's Sacrifice. It appears to have been the aim of the author of Love's Sacrifice, or the Rival Merchants, which was produced on Monday night with deserved success, to steer clear of a fault pertaining to modern play-writing, and to hinge his drama upon a plot which should have a beginning, a middle, and an end, and which should develop itself in a manner to interest the feelings of his audience, excite their curiosity, and pique their ingenuity to penetrate his mystery. To a certain extent he succeeded, but he has not completely achieved the object we have assumed him to have in view; for if the junior and more unsophisticated part of the audience remained in breathless expectation for the latter scenes to resolve their doubts, veteran playgoers could undoubtedly anticipate the main action of the piece with the first entrance of Friar Dominic. The play has, however, the merit of a story well told.

There were many passages of much beauty scattered throughout the drama, and several of the characters were portrayed with ability and consistency. Some of the scenes were wrought up with great power, and deservedly received the full sympathies of the audience. Upon the whole, there is undoubted merit, both in the conception and execution of the play, and it can scarcely fail of being a favourite with the public for some time to come, even if it may not claim the theatrical honour of being a "stock piece" in future seasons.

The acting was generally good. Mr. Vandenhoff was warmly greeted after his long absence, and he played the part of Aylmer with much impressiveness and judgment, and his impassioned scenes were characterized with great force and power. Miss Vandenhoff likewise has added to her deserved popularity by her performance of the arduous part of Margaret, which was powerful and marked, without being exaggerated or unfeminine. The scene in which, for the sake of saving her father, as she believes, from dishonour and death, she dismisses her cherished, idolized Eugene, and, without being able to explain the dreadful mystery that surrounds her, bids him think on her, but as a blot that had for a season marred the brightness of his life, was admirably acted; and the manner in which she portrayed the struggles that were rending her girlish heart, still firm to its filial purpose, evinced the mind and power of an artist.

A new aspirant for metropolitan fame appeared in the person of Mr. Charles Pitt, from the Theatre Royal Edinburgh, who sustained the character of Eugene. We do not like to pronounce a decided opinion upon the merits of an actor on the first night of his performance, but we are disposed to think this gentleman will be a valuable acquisition to the London boards. He treads the stage with ease and grace, and seems practised in what is technically called "business." His voice is generally good and mellow, although rather uneven. But, what is of the greatest importance in estimating the merits of an actor, he delivers the text of his author apparently with a perfect comprehension of its meaning, and a resolution to convey that meaning to the audience—a slight requisite in the composition of a good actor, which some gentlemen on the stage are rather too apt to consider beneath their notice.

We have no space for remarks upon the other performers. All are well known to the public, and all sustained their several and respective reputations.

Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff, and Mr. C. Pitt, made their appearance at the fall of the curtain, to receive the congratulations of the audience. The author was also loudly called for, but did not come forward.

Robert Burns.—But observe him chiefly as he mingles with his brother men. What warm, all-comprehending fellow-feeling, what trustful, boundless, what generous exaggeration of the object loved! His rustic friend, his nut-brown maiden, are no longer mean and homely, but a hero and a queen, whom he prizes as the paragons of earth. The rough scenes of Scottish life, not seen by him in any Arcadian illusion, but in the rude contradiction, in the smoke and soil of a too harsh reality, are still lovely to him: Poverty is indeed his companion, but Love also, and Courage; the simple feelings, the worth, the nobleness, that dwell under the straw roof, are dear and venerable to his heart; and thus over the lowest provinces of man's existence he pours out the glories of his soul; and they rise in shadow and sunshine, softened and brightened into a beauty which other eyes discern not in the highest. He has just self-consciousness, which too often degenerates into pride; yet it is a noble pride, for defence not for offence, no cold, suspicious feeling, but a frank and social one. The peasant poet bears himself, we might say, like a king in exile; he is cast among the low, and feels himself equal to the highest; yet he claims no rank, that none may be disputed to him. The forward he can repel, the supercilious he can subdue; pretensions of wealth or ancestry are of no avail with him; there is a fire in that dark eye, under which the "insolence of condescension" cannot thrive. In his abasement, in his extreme need, he forgets not for a moment the majesty of Poetry and Manhood. And yet, far as he feels himself above common men, he wanders not apart from them, but mixes in their interests; nay, throws himself into their arms; and, as it were, entreats them to love him. It is moving to see how, in his darkest despondency, this proud being still seeks relief from friendship; unbosoms himself often to the unworthy; and, amid tears, strains to his glowing heart a heart that knows only the name of friendship. And yet he was "quick to learn;" a man of keen vision, before whom common disguises afforded no concealment. His understanding saw through the hollowness even of accomplished deceivers, but there was a generous credulity in his heart. And so did our peasant show himself among us; "a soul like an Æolian harp, in whose strings the vulgar wind, as it passed through them, changed itself into articulate melody." And this was he for whom the world found no fitter business than quarrelling with smugglers and vintners, computing excise dues upon tallow, and gauging ale barrels! In such toils was that mighty spirit sorrowfully wasted: and a hundred years may pass on before another such is given us to waste.—Thomas Carlyle's Miscellanies.

Peculiarity in Orange Trees.—Many of the trees in one garden were a hundred years old, still bearing plentifully a highly-prized, thin-skinned orange, full of juice and free from pips. The thinness of the rind of a St. Michael's orange, and its freedom from pips, depend on the age of the tree. The young trees, when in full vigour, bear fruit with a thick pulpy rind, and an abundance of seeds; but, as the vigour of the plant declines, the peel becomes thinner, and the seeds gradually diminish in number, until they disappear altogether. Thus the orange that we esteem the most are the produce of aged trees, and those which we consider least palatable come from trees in full vigour.—A Winter in the Azores.

The Irish Bogs.—I had an opportunity, on this night's journey, of observing a very remarkable phenomenon, which is occasionally seen in the bogs in this district and in those of Connemara. We had not proceeded far when we observed the night suddenly becoming darker and foggy: the darkness was so impenetrable that, for safety, we were obliged to refrain from guiding, in the slightest degree, the sagacious and enduring pony that we rode, being convinced that, under such circumstances, his judgment was more to be depended on than our own. Had we acted otherwise, it is not improbable that man and horse would have perished in a bog-hole, or have been drowned in some of the numerous lakes, along which the unfenced road ran like a pier or quay. Shortly after noticing the increase of darkness, we were suddenly dazzled by immense cones of fire rising on all sides around us. These cones varied in size; few had less than five or six feet in diameter at the base, and many appeared to measure twenty or thirty feet at the same part. The number visible at any particular moment varied, as well as I can remember, rarely exceeding thirty. They sprang up irregular distances from each other: some seemed nearly a mile distant, others a few yards only. The form of each might be compared to that of the flame proceeding from a plate containing burning alcohol. The shade of colour accompanying the flame was not blue; it was reddish white. The light proceeding from them was not in proportion to their size and number. I was surprised to find, that, although they dazzled and occasioned dizziness by their sudden appearance and disappearance, they produced but little effect on the profound darkness. These appearances continued for several miles: the cones of flame rose from the ground apparently to a height varying from six to thirty feet, and did not, like Will-o'-the-Wisp, move to and fro. A little after midnight it began to blow freshly from the north-east, with heavy rain; but, during the remainder of our ride, we did not see any trace of even the slightest flickering or flame. This luminousness was evidently the result of chemical action in the vegetable matter in the bog in a state of decay. Dr. M'Lynch, of Clifden, relates a similar case, in which he observed the same phosphorescent light while travelling through Connemara on a winter's evening. As may be expected, the peasantry stand in great awe of these mysterious lights, and, as a matter of course, they are attributed by them to supernatural agency. By some they are called the "Dance of Death;" and, by others, "Messengers from Fairy Land," come to welcome some spirit of Earth that is passing away to their Elfinland.

Remedy against the Evil Effects of Vitriol.—Mr. J. Sheehy, of Killarney, in a letter to the Cork Reporter, alluding to the recent case of vitriol throwing in Cork, states, that if Mr. Wilson, who lost his eye on the occasion, had procured "a little soda or potash, which would readily dissolve in water, or some soap-boiler's fresh lees, and applied it, or washed with this solution wherever the vitriol appeared, no injury whatever would have occurred to his eye, or any part of his person or his clothes." The writer adds, that he has saved many of his workmen from the evil effects of vitriol accidents, who would have been most severely injured but for the application of the alkaline solution, which prevents pain, burn, or mark of any kind."

PRESTON GUILD.

Preston, Wednesday Evening.—This truly English carnival recommenced this morning under circumstances even more auspicious than yesterday. Shortly after eight o'clock in the morning every avenue into the town was crowded. The proprietors of all the mills and manufactories in the town and its vicinity having also agreed to give their hands a holiday, and pay them their wages for the day, added greatly to the holiday people of the town. On the lowest estimate 80,000 persons were congregated in the town, enjoying festivities which, on account of ancient local recollections of religious and commercial rights, have attracted so much attention for many centuries in this and the surrounding counties. The grand ceremony of the day was the procession of ladies from the Guildhall, in Church-street, preceded by the Mayoress, to the parish church. A mat was laid along the street for a distance of upwards of 300 yards, each side being lined by members of the Odd Fellows' Societies, who exceeded 3000 in number. There were no devotional services, but the sublime oratorio of the Messiah was given with very excellent effect by a most efficient orchestra and chorus. The chief performers were Miss Birch, Miss Stott, Miss Maria B. Hawes, Mr. Hobbs, and Mr. Phillips, Miss Stott, a young debutante, sang with great effect, and promising excellence for the future, whilst the performance of Miss Birch was very much approved of. The church was crowded to excess, and upwards of 3000 persons were present. The processions of the day were never excelled on any previous occasion. Supplying as they did such interesting reminiscences of former days, accompanied by historical recollections of a very ancient date, the living scenery was most highly gratifying. At the head of the procession which accompanied the ladies to the parish church was the ancient order of Foresters, who were preceded by a cart, in which was a fine buck, presented by the Earl of Derby for the occasion. Robin Hood, Little John, and their "merrie men," were seen in fancied reality. After these succeeded the ancient order of Druids, with all the accompaniments of the early religious and educational rites of the country. The order of gardeners, mustering upwards of 500, next followed, being preceded by a model of a flower-garden, ornamented with every description of flower at present in bloom, and with the appropriate emblems of their profession. The various other orders of the town followed in similar processions, who altogether included upwards 10,000 persons, all of whom, engaged in loyal and peaceable pursuits, afforded a most interesting contrast to the condition of the town within the short space of three or four weeks. The ladies' procession to and from the church was preceded by the excellent band of the 60th Rifles. From an early hour in the morning the town was the scene of melody from the bands connected with the different societies. This evening a full-dress ball was held at the Guild hall-room, in the Corn Exchange, at which upwards of 800 persons attended.

Thursday Evening.—The fourth day of this carnival commenced this morning under less favourable auspices than the preceding days. The morning was very wet, and abated much of the enthusiasm which would otherwise have prevailed. The first entertainment this morning was the grand miscellaneous concert and performance of music at St. Wilfred's Catholic Chapel, at which the Earl of Shrewsbury, with his daughter the Princess Doria Pamphilia, Lord Petre, and most of the élite of the aristocracy in this part of the country were present. Amongst the performers were Signor Rubini, Signor Negri, Madlle. Ostergaard, &c., and amongst other performances were several selections from the celebrated Stabat Mater of Rossini. These are chiefly to be repeated in the performances at the concert in the theatre to-night. Amongst the company also was the Duke of Brunswick, with a numerous suite, who also partook in the festivities of the ball last night. The Guild Mayoress gave a public breakfast this morning at one o'clock, at the temporary Guildhall, at the Corn Exchange. Nearly 1000 persons, including the most fashionable of all the surrounding district, were present, and the refreshments prepared by Mr. Lyon, of the Waterloo Hotel, at Liverpool, were of the most sumptuous description. The band of the 60th Rifles, from Manchester, was in attendance, and performed some of the most admired modern airs. The Guild Mayor and Mayoress presided, supported by halberdiers, and all the pomp of former magnificence. The principal toasts given were "the Queen," "the Duke of Lancaster," and "the Lancashire Witches," who had for some centuries kept up the attraction to the guild. After the déjûne, dancing commenced and continued till a late hour in the afternoon. The Preston Guild Races were held in the afternoon under very auspicious circumstances.

Saturday Evening.—Yesterday morning a grand treat was given to the children belonging to the national and other public schools in the town, and upwards of 4000 promenaded through the different streets. Amongst the most conspicuous were the schools attached to the different Catholic charities, which are very numerous and well supported. Of these 190 were sent down in carriages, provided for the occasion, to the new town of Fleetwood, by the Preston and Wyre railroad, where they were regaled at the North Euston Hotel. The races in the afternoon were better attended than on the previous day, but the grand attraction was the fancy dress ball at the Corn Exchange. Upwards of 1000 persons were present. Amongst those present were the Duke of Brunswick, Mr. Wilson Patten, M.P., Major-General Sir William Whitehead, Sir Thomas De Trafford, Bart., T. Parker, Esq., late M.P. for the county, the Earl of Balcarres, Hon. Mr. Lindsay, and most of the aristocracy of the surrounding country. The proceedings of the present guild have not been inferior to those of any on modern record.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

MOULTON CHURCH.
(From a Correspondent.)

Hail! lovely village! a pleasant nook indeed! delightful task awhile to sketch thy varied beauties. Here it stands in peaceful seclusion, containing a little community within itself. Railroads are yet afar off, and the very turnpike road has purposely swerved from its course, to leave us in quietude. The gaunt and haggard form of poverty, which now darkens so large a portion of our fair isle, is here unknown and unseen, save in the solitary wayfaring beggar who seeks alms at our door. It contains a cluster of well (but irregularly) built houses, gathered close under the shade of the old church for protection: in the centre we have our village green, where at merry-makings "Tony Lumpkin," as in days of old, still enjoys himself to his heart's content. But before we proceed further we will linger awhile in the precincts of the church, a handsome well-preserved building, shooting upwards with its beautiful spire to a great height from the bosom of the village, and forming a pleasing object in the landscape for many miles round. The churchyard is equally entitled to our admiration; with its ancient elms and its rookery, just such a place as poor Kirke White would have wished to have laid his bones in; the very home for meditation to observe the hundred touching forms of association between the departed generation and those that survive that are here scattered. Where else shall we find such objects of picturesque beauty and interest as the old moss-mantled village church yards of our own country? Oh! thou mighty spirit of change, in thy sweeping onward course, let me invoke thee to leave untouched these hallowed spots; for

> Here are the dead respected—the poor hind,
> Unlettered as he is, would scorn to invade
> The silent resting-place of death. I've seen
> The labourer returning from his toil,
> Here stay his steps, and call his children round,
> And slowly spell the rudely sculptured rhymes,
> And in his rustic manner moralize.
> I've marked with what a silent awe he's spoken,
> With head uncovered, his respectful manner,
> And all the honours which he paid the grave,
> And thought on cities where even cemeteries,
> Bestrewed with all the emblems of mortality,
> Are not protected from the drunken insolence
> Of wassailers profane, and wanton havoc.

We will now proceed hastily to examine the other buildings of the village, and next the old grammar school, with its well-trodden play-ground. Upon visiting it the other day, my heart yet throbbed with emotions of exquisite delight at the recollection of the joyous years I had there spent—a thousand circumstances were recalled. The building remains unchanged since the period when I first gazed upon it with the eye of childhood, here is still the old school desk, whereon I rudely cut the initials of my name, long, long ago, the window behind, out of which, at early spring, I have so earnestly looked, and almost wished myself one of those little warblers, which

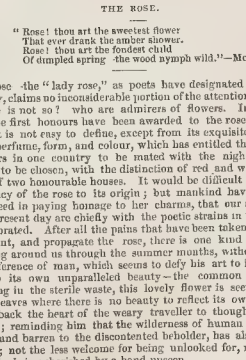
> There hop and sing with careless glee,
> Hop and sing at liberty.

Even the same master still presides at his high mounted desk; next we have the miller with his ever-clacking mill; the mound where once stood a baronial castle, the lord of which figured conspicuously in English history about the reign of King John; and opposite my own dwelling stands the White Swan, a goodly road-side English inn,

> With oaken chair, and nicely sanded floor,
> And varnished clock that ticks behind the door.

And here we must halt, space not admitting of us to say more of this village, than that it is the model of an English village, and situate in the rich and fertile lowlands of Lincolnshire, 100 miles from London.

FLORICULTURE.



THE ROSE.

> "Rose! thou art the sweetest flower
> That ever drank the amber shower.
> Rose! thou art the fondest child
> Of dimpled spring—the wood nymph wild."—Moore.

The rose—the "lady rose," as poets have designated this queen of beauty, claims no inconsiderable portion of the attention of those—and who is not so? who are admirers of flowers. In the poetic world the first honours have been awarded to the rose; for what reason it is not easy to define, except from its exquisite combination of perfume, form, and colour, which has entitled this sovereign of flowers in one country to be mated with the nightingale; in another to be chosen, with the distinction of red and white, as the badge of two honourable houses. It would be difficult to trace the supremacy of the rose to its origin; but mankind have so generally agreed in paying homage to her charms, that our associations in the present day are chiefly with the poetic strains in which they are celebrated. After all the pains that have been taken to procure, transplant, and propagate the rose, there is one kind perpetually blooming around us through the summer months, without the aid or interference of man, which seems to defy his art to introduce a rival to its own unparalleled beauty—the common wild rose. Blooming in the sterile waste, this lovely flower is seen unfolding its fair leaves where there is no beauty to reflect its own, and thus calling back the heart of the weary traveller to thoughts of peace and joy; reminding him that the wilderness of human life, though rugged and barren to the discontented beholder, has also its sweet flowers; not the less welcome for being unlooked for, nor the less lovely for being cherished by a hand unseen.

The word rose appears to be derived from rhos, signifying red in Armorican, from which both the Greek and Latin names have been taken. This flower has, from time immemorial, been a favourite amongst civilized nations, both in Europe and Asia. The shrub varies in size, in different species, from one foot to six or eight, and the colours are equally varied—red, white, purple, yellow, striped; simple, or in almost endless shades and mixtures. The flowers are single, semi-double, and double, and the odour universally grateful. The species of the rose tribe are almost innumerable; the London and Paris gardeners enumerating as many as 900 distinct varieties.

The earliest flowering rose is that universally known as the monthly, which in mild seasons sometimes flowers in April, particularly if it grow against a wall. The next in succession is the China, about the beginning of May; followed by the damask, the end of May; the blush, York and Lancaster, Provence, and Dutch, in June, July, and August; the Virginia and musk are the last European sorts, unless forced; but the earliest rose (the monthly) is also the latest, for, if protected by glass in autumn and aided by artificial heat, it may even be made to bloom till Christmas. New varieties of roses are obtained from seeds, but the usual mode of propagating is by layers. Every variety of the rose will grow by cuttings; some more freely than others. The operation should be performed in January or February, so that the cuttings may root and vegetate in the opening of the spring; but several months are required to bring the cutting to a state fit for transplanting. Some cuttings of flower stalks may be set as late as May and June. Most roses in the wild state grow in sandy soils; but those which are cultivated require rich loamy soil; they, moreover, like most double flowers, need plenty of moisture when in a growing state. To produce strong flowers, roses require some attention to pruning: the old wood should be yearly cut out, and young shoots should be thinned and shortened according to their strength.

It would fill volumes were we to enter into a detail of the numberless adorations poured forth by the poets of all ages at its shrine.

They have called it daughter of Heaven, ornament of the earth, glory of spring; but what expressions could ever do justice to the charms of this beautiful flower? Nature seems to have exhausted all her skill in the freshness, the beauty of form, the fragrance, the delicate colour, and the gracefulness which she has bestowed on the rose—and then it embellishes the whole earth, it decorates the cottage of the peasant and the palace of the peer. The emblem of all ages, the interpreter of all our feelings, the rose mingles with our festivities, our joys, and griefs; modesty borrows its delicate blush; it is given as the prize of virtue; it is the image of youth, innocence, and pleasure.

We cannot conclude this brief notice without submitting, for the admiration of our readers, the following beautiful lines by an anonymous poet, accounting for the origin of that exquisite variety, the moss rose.

> The angel of the flowers one day
> Beneath a rose-tree sleeping lay—
> That spirit to whose charge is given
> To bathe young buds in dews from Heaven—
> Awaking from his light repose,
> The angel whispered to the rose.
> "O! fondest object of my care,
> Still fairest found where all are fair,
> For the sweet shade thou'st given me
> Ask what thou will 'tis granted thee."
> "Then," and the rose, with deepening glow,
> "On me another grace bestow."
> The Spirit paused in silent thought—
> What grace was there that flower had not!
> 'Twas but a moment;—o'er the rose
> A veil of moss the angel throws;
> And robed in nature's simple weed,
> Could there a flower that rose exceed!

THE ASHANTEE PRINCES.—These young men left Cape Coast in November, in company with the Wesleyan Missionaries. On their arrival at Coomassie, "the natives were astonished above measure, for they never thought that the good white people would allow their princes to return." The fact of our having sent them has given to the Ashantees a very favourable impression of the fidelity of our country and government. Although at first distressed at the sight of the surrounding barbarism, so that one of them burst into tears, and was quite overcome, they express themselves as becoming happy "in the endeavour to put in practice the good desires with which their hearts glow." They speak of the missionaries (with whom they live in a house apportioned by the king) as a very great comfort and encouragement to them; of their sense of the benevolence of these devoted men in leaving their country for the welfare of a distant people; of their acceptance with gratitude and humility of the means of grace; of their feeling that education is the principal thing, and of their therefore binding their thoughts to encourage it. They have also spoken to the king against the slave trade, and trust that that traffic will in time be abolished. The king says he is happy to hear that the English people wish for his comfort and prosperity, and for that of his subjects. He has not used the beautiful carriage sent him by the Wesleyans, in consequence of a distressing and melancholy fire at the capital; but expresses his gratitude for British kindness. The report of the marriage of the princes is utterly unfounded.

FRENCH SHELL PRACTICE.—Major-General Loisy, says a letter from L'Orient, has arrived on a tour of inspection, the chief purport of which is to witness some experiments with a new sort of shell, invented by Messrs. Bounet, Champion, and Lebas, and a new 150-pounder, cast at Ruelle. This piece is similar to those used by the English at Beyrout. The experiments made last year of burning fuses are to be renewed this year. Some experiments have also been made with success on Lieut. Cornulier's mode of pointing 12-inch mortars and Paixhan's cannons at sea. By this method as much accuracy is secured as on land, and twenty-five bombs can be thrown in an hour. It has been ascertained that 30-pounders can be fired when under full sail, without distressing the vessel.

THE FRENCH GUM TRADE.—The Government has invited the four great commercial ports to send a delegate to Paris to form a part of a commission, which, in conjunction with M. Galos, head of the colonial department, and M. Maisonave, the director of foreign trade, are to inquire into the difficulties which the gum trade of Senegal gives birth to each year. Amongst other remedies which have been tried, was an association of farmers of the revenue, to which the Government of Senegal gave their sanction, and from which much was expected. Intelligence received from Senegal, however, shows that these hopes have not been realised, as the trade has failed this year, the Moors having organised a resistance to the association.

ANCIENT COIN.—A short time since, as Mr. W. Benstead was walking over a wheat field, just above the Iguanodon quarry, he picked up, upon the surface, an ancient coin, about the size of a fourpenny piece of the present day, though very considerably thinner. On inspection it was found to be a halfpenny, or, perhaps, more correctly speaking, a "baubee," of Alexander I., King of the Scots, whose reign terminated in 1124, so that it must be upwards of 700 years old.

The shoe of the rudder of the late Royal George, about seven feet long, one foot wide, and one foot deep, was picked up by a fisherman of the name of Beal, whilst trawling on Thursday week, about fourteen feet from the buoy of the Royal George. It is of a very different description to the shoes now made, and was purchased by Messrs. Emanuel, where it may now be seen by the curious.

LIBRARIES FOR THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.—The Rev. Edward Wakeham, of Eagle House, Brook-green, Hammersmith, has, at the suggestion of Superintendent Williamson, of the T division of the police force, lately made a present of upwards of 100 well-selected volumes of books, to form the nucleus of a permanent library. The design is to form a library at the station-houses for the instruction and amusement of the reserve part of the force, and when the men are off duty, and the plan has been cordially approved of by the commissioners.

CIDER AND PERRY.—These delightful beverages (says a Newent correspondent) will be extremely cheap next month. Good perry then will be sold at Ledbury at 20s. for the hogshead of 100 gallons. A large farmer at Dymock, near Ledbury, has engaged to deliver 2000 gallons of excellent cider at Abergavenny, by the first week in November, at 6d. per gallon. Bottling perry of prime quality will be had for 1s. per imperial gallon, which will fill six bottles. —Gloucester Journal.

REMEDY FOR SEA-SICKNESS.—Take as much Cayenne pepper as you can rightly bear in a basin of hot soup, and all sickness, nausea, or squeamishness will disappear.

MR. CARTER AND HIS ANIMALS.

In one or two recent instances of Mr. Carter's remarkable exhibition the lion has recoiled from the experiment of taming, and worn, for a moment, his own proper mantle of ferocity, displaying, under the circumstances, no inordinate affection either for Mr. Carter or his cage. Our readers have doubtless seen the paragraphs that have run the newspaper round, detailing the two different casualties of a "seizure" or grip, whereby the hand of the exhibitor was torn by the lord of the forest, although the man never failed with wonderful perseverance and courage to conquer the animal. We here present both conqueror and conquered—and the subject has so far inspired us with the disposition of the lion that we shall try to "break loose" a little ourselves.

> Oh, Mr. Carter—you
> Who do
> Not "tame a Shrew,"
> But have an eye on
> The higher fame of having tamed a lion.
> Peruse his face with judgment of Lavater;
> And, when you see him fidget, fume, or roar,
> Keep the whip hand of him a little more.
> As you're a Carter,
> A Carter whom we feel
> For much you know
> The public wish you weal,
> But couldn't bear, dear Sir, to hear your woe!

CHINESE BARBARITY.—An unfortunate seaman of the Cornwallis recently wandered into the hands of a party of Chinese villagers, who immediately cut off his knee-pans, made an incision round each wrist, and stripped the skin off the muscles, up to the elbows, and down off each hand to the finger ends, leaving it dangling. In this condition the poor fellow was abandoned. On his being found, the village was destroyed by the boats of the ship The man is alive, and slowly recovering.—Hampshire paper.

WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—The annual celebration, usually known as "the Meeting of the Three Choirs of Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford," is announced to take place this year at Worcester, on the 20th, 21st, 22nd, and 23rd instant. The annals of this time-hallowed institution present a series of events unequalled in the history of any musical festival in this country, and it is within the walls of the venerable Cathedral of Worcester that many of the most interesting of these events have taken place. It was here, in 1773, that the talented Miss Linley, then recently united to the celebrated Sheridan, terminated her professional career; here, in 1788, the meeting was attended by George III. and his family (the performances on that occasion being held in the nave of the cathedral); and here, in 1800, was the "Creation" of Haydn introduced to an English provincial audience. The forthcoming meeting holds forth attractions which promise to equal, if not to eclipse, those of former days. The list of performers comprises the well-known names, in the soprano department, of Mrs. W. Loder (formerly Miss Woodyatt), Miss Birch, and Miss Davis. The mezzo-soprani are Miss Marshall and Miss Dolby; the counter-tenors are Hunt, of Hereford Cathedral, and Francis. Hobbs and Pearsall fill the tenor department; and the bass is strong in the names of Phillips and Leffler. The instrumental department is equally rich in eminent names, amongst which are those of F. Cramer, the leader, and the veteran violoncellist, Lindley (both of whom have nearly completed half a century of service at these meetings, having performed at Gloucester in 1793), Loder, Perry, Moralt, Crouch, Dragonetti, Anfossi, Card, Cooke, Williams, Baumann, Harper, Smithers, Platt, Chipp, &c; and the chorus, on this occasion greatly increased, will number above 200, including the members of the three choirs and others selected from the ancient concerts, the élite of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and the Choral Societies of Liverpool and Birmingham; making a total of above 300 performers, all "good men and true." The selections on the present occasion present many new and interesting features. On the first morning, service will be performed as usual at the cathedral, and a sermon preached by the bishop of the diocese. The musical portions of the service will comprise Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum," and his "Jubilate," composed for the thanksgiving for the peace of Utrecht in 1713 (the latter of which has so long lain dormant, that it may be viewed in the light of a novelty), Dr. Croft's anthem, "Sing unto God," and Handel's coronation anthem, "Zadock the Priest." The versicles and responses will be sung to the grave and solemn harmonies of Tallis. The second morning's performance is the "Messiah," that never-tiring oratorio, which, although more frequently heard than any other, is listened to again and again with renewed delight by entranced and enraptured audiences. The third day will bring under notice Handel's "Judas Maccabeus," which contains some of the most striking choruses of the great master. The fourth day's performance is to be a new adaptation of Beethoven's sublime work, "The Mount of Olives," and called "Engedi, or David in the Wilderness," an alteration which has been made to remove the obstacles which have hitherto existed to the performance of this noble work in its original form. This is to be followed by a miscellaneous part, comprising songs and choruses by Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Guglielmi, Dr. Chard, and G. Perry. The evening performances are to consist, on the first evening, of Handel's ode, "Alexander's Feast," and a miscellaneous part; on the second evening, of Haydn's "Seasons," and, on the third evening, of Romberg's "Song of the Bell," and a short miscellaneous selection.

NORWICH, Tuesday Evening.—The members of the orchestra resumed the rehearsal at an early hour this morning, nor has their labour been light. The amazing quantity of music forming the usual programmes of an English county festival is to foreign artists a matter of wonder and astonishment; and the selections for the present meeting prove to be no departure from established customs. The concert this evening has been well attended. The patrons' gallery was graced by a numerous body of the nobility and gentry of this part of the country, among whom were the Bishop of Norwich and Mrs. Stanley, the Marquis of Northampton and the Hon. Miss Compton, Lord and Lady Colborne, Lord Ebrington, Major and Lady E. Wathen, Sir John Boileau, Bart., Sir William B. Proctor, Bart., Sir W. Foster, Sir James and Lady Flower, Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Irby and family, Lady Foulkes and family, Mrs. Edmund Bacon, Daniel Gurney, Esq., E. Wodehouse, Esq., M.P., &c. &c.

BARDIC FESTIVAL.—The gathering of Welsh bards and minstrels will take place this year on the 12th and 13th of October, at Abergavenny, when several prizes for historical essays, poems, &c., will be awarded; also harps presented to the best performers, and medals to the best singers with that ancient instrument.

MRS. CHARLES KEAN.—This lady was delivered of a stillborn child at two o'clock on Sunday morning, at the Old Ship Hotel, where she had arrived the previous evening with her husband, for the purpose of fulfilling a week's engagement at the Brighton Theatre. Her unexpected accouchement will, of course, prevent her from playing, but Mr. Kean was to appear on Monday evening in The Gamester. Miss Argall, a pupil of Mr. Elton, was announced as Mrs. Beverley.

TRAINING AN ELEPHANT.—On Saturday week several gentlemen went into a wild beast show at Sheerness, some of whom began to tease the elephant, which is only confined by a short chain round one of its legs; the gentlemen amused themselves for a while by offering the animal apples, and then putting them into their pockets again; but, not much relishing such sort of sport, the sagacious animal, taking an opportunity when several of his tormentors were in a cluster near him, extended his trunk, and with one swoop laid seven of them sprawling on the floor.—Kent Herald

In accordance with the promise given in our last number, our readers will observe that, in different places, we this week give many additional illustrations of her Majesty's progress through Scotland—the details to some of which have already appeared in our pages.

The New Office of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, No. 198, Strand, is now open for the publication of the journal, so that correspondents need not wait until the date announced, by mistake, in our last number, but forward their communications for the future to that address.

As the great influx of letters now poured in upon us demands something like classification at our hands, and, as very many correspondents who have business with the Publisher address the Editor, and vice-versa, sometimes extending their favours to the printer also, we have to request, as a general rule, that all letters may be addressed to the office—198, Strand—those having reference to the sale, or supply of the paper, to the Publisher, and those applying to its contents, or the insertion of articles, to the Editor only.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1842.

The American news which has arrived by the Britannia is of the utmost importance, and does fairly bring us a source of political congratulation from abroad to quicken our anxiety to promote peace and civilization at home. The perilous boundary question it would seem is at length settled, and no more decisive result could be achieved by British diplomacy, provided it were achieved honourably—as we feel convinced it has been in every sense of the word—and with fair and mutual concession on the part of both nations.

The question, although apparently simple in itself, and seemingly, in the case of the King of Holland, long back decided by arbitration, has been used as a sort of seaton by diplomatists on both sides of the Atlantic to keep open a political sore, which expediency might make available in contingency to either party for the purposes of war, but which justice, humanity, and common sense have long since desired to see permanently healed. If Lord Ashburton has really effected this he has proved a good surgeon; he has applied the bandage and not the lancet; and he has succeeded in binding up a wound which has been left lacerated and bleeding more than blind politicians would believe. We are of those who think that half the ambition of uninsulated Europe may have its direction altered, and some of its impulses rebuked, by the fact which has come to greet us from the transatlantic world. Much mischief will be silenced; many intrigues will be paralysed; and some unruly tyranny struck dumb. The boundary question was always one of wider compass than it entered into the mind of the general public to conceive. When it [illegible] subject of special consideration by the Chamber of Commerce at Sheffield, and Mr. Urquhart drew up his private report, the newspapers of it which were printed and circulated astonished all who read them. They afforded a marvellous exposition, teemed with official letters, and confirmed beyond doubt the criminality of any Minister who should allow the open sesame to a war to be flung wide to any set of foreign diplomatists who might choose at a disadvantageous moment to Great Britain to enter in. That the question has been closed is, therefore, much more creditable than we have room, at this late period of receiving our intelligence, to narrate. But, while we take praise to our Government for the result, it is a praise only fairly shared, and which we are most anxious to divide, with the Government of the United States. We would gladly, too, meet not only the high officials, but the sensible and humane press, which has taken up the settlement of the dispute in a pure spirit of good fellowship, and with a high and dignified appreciation of the value of mutual national interests over any and every class of prejudices, or the more violent rage of personal or political agitation. We have, and we hope justly, no small pride and pleasure in quoting commentaries upon this subject in unison with our own from one of the most influential and respectable of the American journals—a journal of commerce moreover, and therefore possessing a knowledge of the most important basis of the intercourse between Great Britain and the United States. "We do not know," says the journal in question, "that we ever envied Napoleon his glory, or Cæsar his triumphs, or Crœsus his wealth. To swell the tide of human wretchedness—to deluge a continent with blood—this it is which achieves earthly glory; and wealth often comes of extortion, meanness, and fraud. But there is no such drawback upon the satisfaction which Lord Ashburton and Daniel Webster must feel in looking at the noble monument they have reared—a monument greater, and loftier, and more glorious in its moral aspect than in any other. Whoever examines the pages of history will find that most wars have arisen from very trivial causes. The controversies which have been adjusted by the present treaty might easily, with bad management, have been made the occasion of a long and bloody war, in which every blow inflicted by either party would not only have told upon its object, but rebounded upon its author. It is an auspicious omen that such controversies can be settled between powerful nations on principles of justice and mutual concession. England deserves much credit for making the first decided overture for such an issue, and America for the readiness with which she accepted the proffered hand. It seems now as if there might be a more cordial good will existing between the two countries than ever before, and of longer continuance. Heaven grant that it may be so!"

The affair of the Caroline is also decided, and it would seem that the less quarrelsome topic of the right of search is the only question between the two countries new left to the contingencies of diplomatic controversy.

We are sorry to receive from all quarters complaints of the mere technical operation of the machinery of the income-tax. This is not as it should be. The tax is bad enough in itself, but, being borne and being tyrannous, those who resort to it upon plea of necessity should at least so regulate its tyranny that it should come upon the community in the easiest form to bear. We much regret to hear, however, that the case is not so, and that Government has not provided a fair and sufficient protection, in mere form, for the feelings of the thousands whom the tax itself sufficiently outrages without reference to the manner of its levy. It must be admitted on all hands, and perhaps this is nearly the only argument in its favour, that the income-tax was a very decisive measure, whether demanded or not by the acknowledged critical condition of the country and its finances; but if a measure be decisive, as for the moment, against a people, in its principle, so, on the other hand, it should be decisive in their favour, in its operation. There should be no vacillation nor uncertainty, and, as the extortion is complete, the means of extorting should be complete also. Now, we are credibly informed that in all the practical details of collection the means employed are most vexatious, owing to their want of contrivance and explicitness; that the papers are puzzling, intricate, and full of food for quibbling; in a word, that, however anxious the taxed victim is to expound the truth, the official documents will gag him in spite of himself. If this be true, Government has aggravated its oppression, and belied the general character of the Tories in the business detail of their legislation. The art has usually been to soften in practice what seemed harsh in theory, and never ought that art to be less lost sight of than at the present crisis of political discontent.

The numerous beautiful illustrations of the Queen's visit to Scotland which have adorned our paper from the commencement of that auspicious event, and will continue to embellish it, after our Sovereign's return, until the whole regal tour shall assume an entire aspect of completeness, will be, we hope, appreciated by all our readers, with due allowance for the order in which they fall. At a great distance from the metropolis, where events are waited for, art cannot, of course, keep up with railroads or intelligence, and the consequence is, that our news rather anticipates our embellishments, although it will require only ordinary discretion in our readers to fit every subject to its place. For instance, there are several subjects of illustration in this week's paper which touch an earlier stage of the royal tour; and we have even now received from our artists who are accompanying the excursion of her Majesty a number of pretty and characteristic incidental episodes of the royal journey, which, if art had the lightning wings of type, would save us the necessity of preferring this explanation to our readers. Where such great exertions, however, as the proprietors of this journal have made, in reference to the event in question, are so completely displayed, the public will be too sensible to expect from a weekly newspaper the same lucidus ordo which might be expected to crown a carefully-prepared and leisurely-published work. For all this there is more truth of immediate application than could well be expected from us, and our readers are sure in their conviction that our next week's number will complete and classify the entire letter-press and illustrations of the Queen of England's visit to Scotland's hills and glens.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE RETURN OF HER MAJESTY FROM SCOTLAND.—The Queen and Prince Albert embarked on Thursday morning at Granton Pier in the Trident steam-ship for London. The suite will be conveyed in the Rhadamanthus, Shearwater, &c. Her Majesty is expected to arrive at Woolwich about noon on Saturday.

BANK OF ENGLAND.—A general meeting of the proprietors of Bank Stock was held on Thursday, for the purpose of considering a dividend. At twelve o'clock, William Cotton, Esq., Governor, accompanied by the Deputy Governor and Directors, entered the court, which was numerously attended, although not crowded. After some observations from various proprietors, the governor moved that a dividend of 3½ per cent. on the profits of the bank, for the half year ending the 10th of October next, deducting 7d. in the pound for payment of the income-tax be agreed to. Mr. Woollaston moved, as an amendment, that the words "7d. in the pound for the payment of the income-tax," be omitted. After a short discussion, the amendment was put to the vote, when only five hands were held up in its favour. The governor announced that the dividend warrants would be delivered and payable on Tuesday, the 11th of October next.

CHRIST CHURCH.—On Wednesday next, being St. Matthew's day, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, with the governors of the royal hospitals, will attend divine service at Christ Church, Newgate-street, where a sermon will be preached by the Rev. W. Harrison, M.A., one of the classical masters, morning preacher at the Magdalen Hospital, and domestic chaplain to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge; after which they will repair to the Great Hall in Christ's Hospital, where orations on the benefits of the royal hospitals will be delivered, according to ancient custom, by the four senior scholars, who are about to proceed to the University of Cambridge.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.—The author of the successful new play of "Love's Sacrifice," is Mr. Lovell, who married Miss Lacy, formerly an actress on the London boards.

ROYAL SOUTH LONDON FLORICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The grand autumnal dahlia and miscellaneous flower-show of the above society, was held on Tuesday in the Surrey Zoological Gardens. The extreme fineness of the weather, added to the announcement that the present exhibition would be the last this season, contributed to render it one of the most successful since the establishment of the society; and the various specimens of flowers, fruit, and vegetables were generally admitted to be far superior to those shown at the corresponding period last year. Seventy-two prizes were awarded on this occasion, and the floral productions were tastefully arranged (in marquees erected about the grounds) under the superintendence of Messrs. Cuming and Warwick. The gates were opened to the public at one o'clock, and at half-past three his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge arrived, accompanied by his aide-de-camp, and was conducted through the various tents by Mr. Cuming, the honorary secretary to the society, and Mr. Cross. His Royal Highness expressed himself much gratified with the exhibition, and entered into conversation with several of the competitors. The Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, attended by Baron Knesebeck, arrived at the gardens about four o'clock, and having joined the duke, the royal party again paraded the tents, the band striking up the national anthem.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.—The list issued by the Court, of bail cases to be heard, contains sixty-one, and the insolvents are all confined in the metropolitan prisons; thirty-six of them are in Whitecross-street. At the present period no diminution has taken place in the business in consequence of Lord Brougham's Act, which comes into operation on the 1st of November. Persons are, however, it is said, waiting to see the rules and orders to be issued by the Court of Bankruptcy. The new measure was passed for the benefit of persons out of custody, whilst the Insolvent Debtors' Court is to relieve persons in custody, and who are allowed to except £20 of property in each case from the creditors. There is, however, no provision of that character in Lord Brougham's Act. There are now between 300 and 400 prisoners in Whitecross-street Prison, 200 in the Queen's Prison, and about 50 in the Fleet. Some alterations are shortly expected in the Queen's Prison, which has been visited during the past week by the General Inspector of Prisons, by the authority of Sir James Graham. It is understood that there will be "four classes," the chief of which will be for persons remanded, and who refuse to file their schedules under the compulsory clause of the Insolvent Act. A place with iron bars is to be erected for the latter class. Scenes of debauchery have occurred in the Fleet and the Bench, and it is said that in the latter, by a regulation to be made, no person will be allowed more than a pint of wine a day. The coffee-room in the prison is to be pulled down, and all extravagance prevented. The rules are shortly expected to be issued.

ALLOWANCE FOR PICKING UP DROWNED BODIES.—At an inquest, held on Monday, before the coroner for London, at the vestry-room of St. John's, Horsleydown, the forman, a licensed victualler, stated that a waterman had mentioned to him that day that he saw a corpse floating down the river, and abstained from picking it up because the allowance of half-a-crown would not remunerate him for the trouble he should have. The jury concurred in considering the allowance too small, and that the public advantage required that it should be increased. The coroner said he was always anxious to do what the interest of the public required, and he should in future allow five shillings for bringing on shore a dead body; and more than that in cases where unusual circumstances, or more than ordinary trouble, entitled the parties to it.

NARROW ESCAPE OF THE PLANET STEAMER.—On Tuesday afternoon, at four o'clock, the Planet, a Gravesend steamer, belonging to the Star Company, left London-bridge wharf, with nearly 100 passengers on board. She had not proceeded far before it was discovered that the deck in the neighbourhood of the boilers was unusually hot, and that the vessel was on fire. Soon afterwards smoke ascended from the engine-room in large quantities; the passengers became greatly alarmed; and the captain brought up without delay to the tier off Alderman's stairs, Lower East Smithfield, when the Planet was made fast to the Duke of Cornwall, a Dublin steam-ship. The pumps of the Cornwall were put in requisition, and Captain Fisher, the superintending harbour-master, and the crew of a Thames police galley, with George Judge, their inspector, went on board to render assistance. The flames, fortunately, were extinguished before they had extended beyond the deck. While the fire was raging, Captain Smith, the master of the Vesper, another Star steamer, came on board, and found the boilers nearly red hot, and very little water in them, owing to some neglect on the part of the engineer or his assistants, and upon asking for an explanation, none could be afforded. Inspector Judge, of the Thames police, while assisting to put out the fire, was severely burnt on one of his hands. It will be recollected that the Medway steamer, belonging to the same company, caught fire a few years ago, lower down the river, and was burnt to the water's edge; and the Planet would probably have shared the same fate, if the fire had not been discovered so early as it was, and immediate assistance rendered.

Furious Driving.—For some months past the neighbourhood of Islington and Holloway has been the scene of much excitement, in consequence of the opposition maintained between the omnibuses of Mrs. Wilson and Messrs. Colson, and more than once the lives of the passengers have been put in jeopardy as the result. On Tuesday one of the omnibuses ran over a person at the Blue Coat Boy, near the Angel, and inflicted injuries, which will most probably soon cost the sufferer his life.

Attempted Suicide.—Last week an attempt at suicide was made by Captain Beechencroft, at his residence in Mary-street, Hampstead-road, by cutting his throat with a razor, in his bedroom. Surgical assistance being procured, the wound was sewed up, and some faint hopes are entertained of his recovery. The unfortunate gentleman is between 50 and 60 years of age, and was a resident in the East Indies many years.

A Female found Drowned.—On Tuesday, the body of a female, apparently about 40 years of age, was found dead in the Regent's Canal, in the parish of Stepney. She was four feet in height, of fair complexion, had brown hair, and was dressed in a half-mourning gown, coloured shawl, green silk bonnet, black boots, and white stockings, one of which had the name of Barret, or Blessett, marked on it. The body was taken to the Ben Johnson public-house, Stepney.

Coach Accident.—An accident occurred on Monday evening to the Hendon and Mill-hill coach, on its return from town. When descending Golders-hill, on the north side of Hampstead-heath, the coach, drawn by three horses, came in contact with a fly, which the driver had drawn across the road on the wrong side, and which he neglected to draw aside, notwithstanding the repeated calls to him by the driver of the coach to do so; the consequence was, the immediate upset of the coach, for the shock, which was not sufficient to overthrow the fly (a common one-horse heath fly), broke the pole short asunder at its junction with the bed of the carriage. Most providentially the first plunge of the horses forced the traces over the roller bolts, and they were clear of the coach. The passengers thus escaped certain destruction.

Fires.—Shortly before three o'clock on Wednesday morning, a fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Leadbetter, japanner, Belvidere-place, Borough-road, behind the Queen's Bench Prison. Various engines soon arrived. After some time the firemen extinguished the flames, but not before considerable damage was done. The fire originated in the drying rooms. The damage will amount to nearly £200, and is not insured. The same premises were damaged by fire three months since.—About half-past two a fire was discovered raging in the timber-yard of Mr. Blower, in Paul-street, Finsbury. Engines arrived, but were not wanted. The police had extinguished the fire in the interim. The loss is trifling, and is insured.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Chatsworth.—Among the fashionables now visiting the Duke of Devonshire here are—the Marquis of Normanby, Hon. G. H. and Lady Louisa Cavendish, Right Hon. F. Leveson Gower, Lady Elizabeth Grey, Lady Webster, Matthew Webster, Esq., of the Rifle Brigade, D. Barton, Esq., &c. The Duke's drawing-room band has just arrived from London, and preparations are making for a grand fête.

The Duke of Sussex has left Kensington-palace for Alton Towers, to honour the Earl of Shrewsbury with a visit.

Earl de Grey, at the date of the last despatches, had left Dusseldorf, on the Rhine, where he had accompanied the King of Hanover, for Frankfort. His lordship is expected to arrive in St. James's-square at the close of the ensuing week.

Louis Philippe's daughter, the Princess Clementine, whose hand was sought in marriage by a Prince of Saxe Coburg, asked three months to reflect. The time specified has just expired, and the Princess has answered in the negative.—Letter in the Post.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge went to Coombe Wood on Saturday, and spent the day shooting. His Royal Highness afterwards returned to his residence at Kew.

Hanover, Sept. 8.—"His Majesty the King continues to grow better, and left his bed to-day. The convalescence continuing, no more bulletins will be issued. Dusseldorf, 6th Sept. 1842.—C. Baring, Dr."

We hear that Prince Esterhazy is expected to prolong his stay at Dover for some days longer, for the advantage of the marine baths. His Excellency will proceed to Middleton Park shortly after his arrival in town, on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Jersey.

Woburn Abbey.—No day is yet named for the reception of the distinguished visitors who are expected. It is probable, however, that the Duke of Cambridge, Prince George, the Earl and Countess of Jersey, and Lady Clementina Villiers, will arrive on Saturday or Monday next.

Windsor, Tuesday.—It is now considered as not at all improbable that her Majesty's sojourn in the north will be so prolonged beyond the time originally fixed upon for the departure of the court, as to delay the period of the arrival of the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert at the Castle until the middle of next week.

The preliminaries of a marriage are said to be arranged between the Marquis of Blandford and the Lady Fanny Vane Stewart, eldest daughter of the Marquis of Londonderry; but as the noble Lord is still a minor, the nuptials will be deferred until after his Lordship comes of age, which will be in June next.

Sir Robert Peel is expected to join Lady Peel and family at Drayton Park at the close of the week, from attending on her Majesty during her tour in Scotland. Sir Robert will entertain a select party at Drayton, the first week in the ensuing month, to enjoy the sport of pheasant-shooting over his well-stocked preserves.

The Bishop of Barbadoes had an interview with Lord Stanley on Tuesday at the Colonial Office.

Despatches from the Governor of British Guiana were received at the Colonial Office this week.

The Earl of Auckland and the Hon. Miss Eden have left Eden-lodge, late Gore house, on a visiting tour. The Hon. Miss Fanny Eden is staying on a visit to her sister, the Dowager Countess of Buckinghamshire, at Blackheath.

Lord and Lady John Russell and family are not expected to return to town till the middle of November.

Lord Rabolesdale and the Earl of Durham have been both pursuing their studies under the Rev. Mr. Joyce, at Dorking.

The works in progress for the erection of a new royal Conservatory at Buckingham Palace have been suspended. The splendid furniture in the state apartments has been covered up, and some of the rooms dismantled, as, according to present arrangements of the Court, her Majesty and her illustrious family will not come to town until the latter end of January.

Her Royal Highness the Princess Augusta of Cambridge, attended by the Baroness Ahlefeldt and Baron Kneyebeck, arrived in town on Wednesday morning from Kew. Her Royal Highness visited and inspected St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey. The Princess also paid a visit to the Pantheon. Her Royal Highness, attended by Baroness Ahlefeldt, returned to Kew in the afternoon.

His Serene Highness Prince Esterhazy returns to town to prepare for the reception of his Imperial Highness the Archduke of Austria. The Archduke, after visiting Portsmouth, will come to town on the 20th to pay his respects to her Majesty at Windsor. His Imperial Highness has come to England to visit the marvels of the naval art we possess, and to fit himself for the command of those armaments of Austria in which he has already distinguished himself in an inferior rank.

FROM OUR LATE EDITION OF LAST WEEK.

THE QUEEN'S TOUR.

Edinburgh, Tuesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert, with the royal cortège, left Dalkeith Palace before nine for Queensferry; and arrived at Newhall at eleven, where the royal party embarked on board the Queen Margaret steamer. Only the Prince and two ladies accompanied her Majesty in the boat, which bore her from the shore of Lothian, and which took a westward sweep for a considerable distance, partly perhaps to obtain a view of the surrounding beauties on either bank of the Forth, and partly to afford time for the embarkation of the other official attendants, and the carriages by another boat, which cut right across, and having landed at the North Ferry its passengers and freight, left the quay, while the boat with her Majesty on board, after sailing eastward beyond Inchgarvy, neared the pier, and disembarked at twelve o'clock at noon, the royal steamer firing a salute, and the gathering on the quay and heights of North Ferry greeting the landing by signals which we could see but not hear.

Perth, Wednesday.—The towns and villages through which the royal cortège had to pass in her Majesty's journey northward, vied with each other in decorations and devices in honour of the Queen. At the confines of the county, and about ten miles distant from Perth, the road intersects the Ochill hills, through Gleufurg. The Farg, an inconsiderable mountain rivulet, meanders down the glen to which it gives its name: and so narrow is the pass, that in many places there is barely room for the road and the brook to keep clear of each other. Emerging from this defile, the luxuriant and richly variegated vale of the Earn opens gradually upon the view. This fertile and delightful strath is enlivened and enriched by the mansions of the nobility and gentry, exhibiting all that cultivation and refined taste can add to natural fertility and beauty. Her Majesty kept the Great North-road, cutting right across the valley until the cortège reached its verge, then turning off by the base of the northern hills, proceeded to Dupplin Castle, the seat of the Right Hon. the Earl of Kinnoull, which was reached at two o'clock. In this splendid mansion the Queen did the noble family the honour to partake of a sumptuous déjeuner. Dupplin Castle commands one of the best views of the valley of the Earn, both to the east and west. A deputation of the town-council, consisting of the Lord Provost, magistrates, and city clerks, was received at Dupplin, and had the honour of presenting an address to the Queen.

From Dupplin en route eastward to Perth the most striking and prominent object is Mordan, or Moncrieffe hill. Lifting the eye off this delightful scene, and following the course of the river, the ancient city of Perth arrests the attention, with its stately bridge, its towering steeples and spires standing out in bold relief.

Beyond Perth, and on the opposite bank of the river, stands the ancient Royal Palace of Scone, once the residence of the Scottish monarchs, and still a princely fabric, peering out of the thickly-wooded policies in which it is embedded. Here the sovereigns of Scotland were crowned in days of yore: and with many interesting events in civil and ecclesiastical history Scone is intimately connected. As the eye stretches northward, the distant views assume an Alpine sublimity and magnificence. First, the lower range of the Grampians borders the expansive plain in the body of the scene, and then behind them rise, in towering grandeur, the lofty summits of the upper range, until the view is bounded by their cloud-piercing peaks. Never was this sublime and splendid scene beheld by human eye under more auspicious circumstances than it was this day seen by Queen Victoria. The sun had now reached the far west, casting his rays over the enchanting scene, and producing the perfection of light and shade on its hills and plains; and a full tide of the Tay, bearing on its bosom vessels of various burden, all glittering and gay in honour of the royal visitant.

Descending from this delightful eminence, the Queen approached the ancient city of Perth, through the avenue which intersects the South Inch, one of the city parks. At the South Port the Queen was received by the magistrates and town-council, and the Lord Provost, in elegant court attire, presented the keys of the city, which were graciously received and returned by the Sovereign. The gates of the city were now thrown open, and her Majesty and retinue passed through under a magnificent triumphal arch which had been erected for the occasion. The magistrates and council, in carriages guarded by the high constables, escorted the Sovereign and retinue through the city, passing through Prince's-street, St. John's-street, and George-street, to the bridge. Every opening in the streets was fitted up with platforms, and every window crowded with a well-dressed and joyful population. As her Majesty passed along, the densely thronged multitude rent the air with their deafening cheers, and the waving of handkerchiefs from the casements indicated the universal joy. Her Majesty appeared in excellent spirits, and remained and returned the gratulations with much condescension and grace. The multitude which passed into Perth from all quarters during the night, and throughout the course of the day, was beyond all precedent. Not fewer than from 40,000 to 50,000 strangers were added to the population. In the evening 500 gentlemen sat down to a sumptuous banquet in the County-hall in honour of the royal visit, while bonfires and coloured lights illumined the neighbouring heights. Her Majesty honoured the Earl of Mansfield by dining at Scone Palace, at eight o'clock. She is to sleep in the same royal residence. May she enjoy "pleasing dreams and slumbers light."

Scone Palace.—Her Majesty left Scone Palace at eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning, and arrived at Dunkeld at half-past one. The carriage stopped in the Bowling Green, and her Majesty having alighted, took the arm of Prince Albert, and slowly walked round the green, manifesting, by her gratified looks, the admiration with which she beheld the gallant array of Lord Glenlyon's clansmen, who had assembled to the number of not less than a thousand, all clad in "the garb of old Gael." The spectacle was of the most animating description; and the bells rang a merry peal in honour of the illustrious pair. Having changed horses, the Royal carriage proceeded on its route to Taymouth castle, amidst continued acclamations.

Bushy-park.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager having, by the advice of her physicians, decided on passing the winter in the south of England, the mansion and grounds of Lord de Mauley, called Canford-park, have been taken by her Majesty for two years.

Accidents.—On Friday afternoon two accidents occurred to the workmen employed in Water-lane, Fleet-street. Some portion of the sewer in progress had been completed, and while one of the labourers was in the act of refilling the opening, a wheelbarrow of clay slipped from his hand, and fell on a bricklayer named Scroggins, who was engaged at a depth of 25 feet from the surface, inflicting a severe wound on the back of his head. This poor fellow had scarcely been removed to St. Bartholomew's Hospital before another labourer, named Manning, received very severe injuries from a hod of bricks falling upon him through the carelessness of a man employed in conveying them into the sewer.

Destructive Fire in Bloomsbury.—On Thursday night, after the family of Mr. William Ostell, of Hart-street, Bloomsbury, had retired to bed, they were aroused by the police constable with an alarm of fire. The inmates endeavoured to effect an escape by the street door, but from the shop and landing-place being on fire, they were compelled to get out at the top of the house. The engines from Crown-street, High Holborn, Farringdon-street, and others, quickly attended, and from the good supply of water obtained, they were instantly put into operation. By these means the upper part of Mr. Ostell's premises were saved, but nearly the whole of the valuable contents of the shop were destroyed. Mr. Ostell is insured in the Sun Fire-office. The property destroyed is estimated at £800.

Extensive Robbery at Preston.—Information was received at Bow-street on Friday of a robbery having been committed in Preston, to the amount of nearly £2000. It appears that the property, which consists entirely of notes, was enclosed in a maroon-coloured pocket-book, which was stolen from the pocket of a gentleman, whilst walking in the streets of that town. The numbers and amount of the stolen notes are known and published. A reward of £100 is offered for the apprehension of the offenders and the restoration of the property.

Serious Accident to Mr. Carter.—Another accident occurred to Mr. Carter, the rival of Van Amburgh, on Tuesday evening, which has incapacitated him from appearing on the succeeding nights at the English Opera-house. In the piece called The Lion King, Mr. Carter had to encounter a lion and other animals confined in a cage. On Tuesday night, on Mr. Carter entering the cage, the lord of the forest made a sudden spring, and before Mr. Carter had time to prevent him, seized him by the hand with his teeth. Mr. Carter commenced striking him with all his might with the butt-end of a whip. The audience applauded most vociferously, little thinking that it was a combat in reality. The scene was dropped; and Mr. Carter, having bound a handkerchief round his arm, left the cage, the animal growling at him as he went out. He was attended by Mr. Braine, a surgeon. This is the second time Mr. Carter has been bitten by the same animal within the last week.

Suicide at Waterloo Bridge.—At an early hour on Thursday morning, a female about 25 years of age, dressed in fashionable style, committed a most determined act of suicide, by throwing herself into the river from the first arch on the Middlesex side of Waterloo-bridge. She had a few words with a gentleman immediately previous to her committing the rash act. A reward has been offered for the recovery of the body, but up to 10 o'clock last night it had not been found. Jealousy is said to be the cause. Her name is unknown, but she resided in Webber-street, Lambeth.

Coombes and Newell.—The great sculler's match for £100 between these men, was decided on Thursday. The men to row from Westminster-bridge to Putney. They started at a quarter past four, and Newell took the lead, which he increased at Wandsworth to 150 yards, and then shipped a wave which filled his wherry, and she went down, Newell having just time to get into his cutter. Coombes then rowed close in shore, and arrived at Putney a few minutes before five, winning the match, much to the disappointment of Newell.

Salford Sessions, Wednesday.—Sentences have been passed on several of the late rioters. They were placed in batches before the chairman and bench of magistrates; and after being addressed by the chairman, received sentences, varying from two years' imprisonment to one month, and finding sureties for good behaviour.

Police.—Thames Office.—On Thursday Captain Philip Partridge, late master of the ship Jarrow, of Liverpool, was brought before Mr. Ballantine for final examination, charged with the wilful murder of three Spanish seamen on the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England. The prisoner was formally committed to Newgate for trial at the next Old Bailey sessions.

Bow-street.—James Samuel Brown, a clerk in the General Post-office, was committed for trial, for having forged Post-office money-orders.

William Parry has been brought up at Union-hall, charged with stabbing Elizabeth Diggle, and inflicting a severe wound on her arm. He was committed on the charge.

Edith Rouse was re-examined at Guildhall, charged with stealing three diamond rings, valued £40, the property of Mrs. Greenhaugh, of Smithfield-bars. A further remand was made.

Union-hall.—A timber-dealer and wharfinger, named Daniel Good, was remanded for further examination, on suspicion of uttering a forged bill of £163 13s. 9d., purporting to be accepted by Evans, Brothers, and Co., Three Cranes Wharf.

Several paupers of the Greenwich Union were brought up at the police-office of that town on Thursday, charged with disorderly conduct there, and purposely tearing their clothes to pieces, leaving themselves naked in the ward. Three were sentenced to one month's imprisonment, three for 21 days, and the remainder for 14 days, in Maidstone gaol.

A letter from Frankfort of the 1st instant states that the King of Hanover had followed the example of the ex-King of the Netherlands, and married, towards the close of the last month, the widow of the President Beulwitz.

Madrid, Sept. 1.—This being the second anniversary of the grand Pronunciamento of 1840, which is looked upon as the birthday of the present Government, it was celebrated with becoming solemnity.

Chemnitz, Sept. 1.—We have just received the melancholy intelligence that the town of Sayda was this morning burnt to the ground, with the exception of 20 houses. A report states that Tetschen is in flames, and several hundred acres of forest.—Hamburgh papers, Sept. 6.

DONCASTER GRAND STAND.—THE ST. LEGER RACE.

THE DONCASTER ST. LEGER RACE.

A race! a race! at rapid pace,
And Doncaster is now the place,
Upon the best of courses.
For Doncaster their speed men spur,
It will make many a donkey stir,
E'en let alone the horses!

Oh! many a man ere this day week,
Although no ditcher's fate he'd seek,
Will wish he'd been a hedger!
And through our brain a thought will range,
That there'll be an uncommon change
In cash books, through this Ledger!

The man who looks you thro' and thro',
With "I'm as good a man as you"—
A flash, bold, slang, dead-setter,
Will drop his chops, and mutter, "Fish,
As good as you!—I only wish
I'd never been a better!

The horses start:—Where's Rosalind?
There' Seahorse!—such seahorse you'll find
As proves at sea on few decks!
The Post calls Rosalind a host,
But Rosalind's not near the post!
And what becomes of Judex?

Where's Attila?—what nowhere found!
The odds are veering round and round;
How hard a prophet's fate is!
Oh, Attila, thy heels are light!
But, being fairly out of sight,
Why what becomes of Vates?

Where is the Queen Victoria? where!
Why, in the Highlands, taking air.

Ha! then a million on it!
If she's in any Scottish place,
The little mare that wins the race
Is sure to be Blue Bonnet!

Ay! there she is! the mare has won
For Scotland and Lord Eglinton
A triumph for the North.
Most gallantly she cantered in,
And thought it Policy to win
As first, instead of *Forth!

They say her jockey, by the bye,
Is nothing but a living Lye;
And not a soul can doubt it.
But we affirm, upon our word,
That no lie ever yet was heard,
With so much truth about it.

Now, brother Prophets, mind your eye,
While we propound this prophecy,
And wisdom sure begins it.
We here predict of the next race,
The horse that has the foremost place,
Will be the horse that wins it!

THE DONCASTER CUP.

The subject for the Doncaster prize for this year is the battle of Richard and Saladin at Azostos, where, according to the historian Badakin, the lion-hearted Plantagenet, who was everywhere in the field, not only as a most skilful commander, but as one of the bravest of soldiers, is supposed to have met Saladin; but whether this be historically correct or not, the poets of every country, having eulogized their favourite heroes of the Crusades by placing them in combat with the hero of the east, as Scott's Sir Kenneth, the Conrad of Germany, Charles Martel, &c., give ample poetic license for this production—without naming Cooper's spirited painting of the same subject; though, were it perfectly ideal, the beauty of the group would be an excuse quite sufficient for its composition. The fiery war-horse of Richard has in the charge overthrown the lighter Arab steed of Saladin, which, from some wound in the shock, is shown in the agonies of death, with great effect and truth to nature; whilst the agile Saladin, nothing daunted by his fall, is seen reaching over his prostrate horse in graceful but vigorous attitude, watching to take ample vengeance on Richard, whose manly figure, seated firmly (as a rock) on his horse, rampant over the body of the fallen steed, is well prepared with a giant grasp of his deadly axe for a closer approach.

The contrast of costume in the flowing drapery of Saladin with the close coat-mail of Richard—the graceful form of the former with the herculean figure of the latter—the dying horse with the life and vigour of the other, renders this one of the most beautiful groups we have seen; and such strict attention has been given to the detail of all this, that we are at once led to the subject. The prize is the selection and gift of the Earl of Chesterfield, and from the manufactory of Messrs. Mortimer and Hunt. Height of group, 2 ft. 4 in.; weight, 495 oz. A detail of the Doncaster Cup will be found in p. 302.

BUCK SHOOTING IN THE HIGHLANDS.

NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—This triennial festival commenced on Monday last by the performance of the customary rehearsal. The orchestra is formed of the leading instrumentalists from the metropolis, whilst the choral band, numbering nearly 300 persons, are from the different choral associations in the town and neighbourhood. The principal vocalists are Madame Caradori Allan, Signora Pacini, Miss Hawes, and Miss Rainforth; Mr. Hobbs, Mr. Phillips, Mr. Balfe, and Signor Rubini. Mr. F. Cramer leads, and Mr. Edward Taylor conducts. The selections for the evening concerts include the favourite overtures of Mozart, Spohr, Weber, and Cherubini, and the best-known symphonies of Beethoven, Mozart, and Haydn. Mendelssohn is altogether overlooked, which, as he is now admitted to be the greatest oratorio, overture, concerto, and symphony composer of living musicians, is a matter of some astonishment. The rehearsal of this morning was occupied with the performance of a new oratorio of Spohr, entitled The Fall of Babylon, and an altered arrangement of the oratorio of Samson, by Handel. The Samson of Handel has been entirely re-arranged by Mr. Edward Taylor, and appears with advantage. Some good choruses are introduced from Handel's other oratorios, and so also some songs from his less known works. The chorus-singers seem to have enjoyed excellent rehearsals, and the talent of the band is unquestionable. The performances, therefore, are likely to afford a high and rare treat to the lovers of music in this musical part of England.

REDUCTION OF THE AMERICAN ARMY.—It is now certain, although no bill has yet finally passed Congress, that the army will be reduced.

THE QUEEN LEAVING THE DUCHESS OF ATHOLL'S.

THE QUEEN'S TOUR.

At three o'clock on Wednesday her Majesty took her departure from Dunkeld, when a royal salute was again fired from the battery. The royal cortège was accompanied by a guard of Lord Glenlyon's Highlanders, sixty in number, each carrying a Lochaber axe, and preceded by eight Highland pipers. Her Majesty seemed highly delighted with the animating scene, and smiled and bowed in return to the cheers of the assembled multitude as she passed. A bonfire was kindled on Birnam Hill on Tuesday evening, and a young lad who had joined some others in a little frolic in kicking an old pan, rolled down a precipice of upwards of 100 feet. He was found at the bottom apparently lifeless, and little hopes are entertained of his recovery.

HER MAJESTY AT TAYMOUTH CASTLE.

Taymouth was a scene of the greatest bustle, animation, and excitement on Wednesday, the day of her Majesty's expected arrival. From a very early hour the population poured in from all quarters. Vehicles of every description, groaning with loads of passengers, and troops of pedestrians, were wending their way to Taymouth —many from very distant parts—from Greenock, Dumbarton, Inverary, Oban, Inverness-shire, Forfarshire, Banff, Aberdeenshire, and from the metropolis of Perthshire, the Fair City, in great numbers. At half-past twelve o'clock, the Breadalbane Highlanders were marched to the front of the Castle, and underwent a review; and a finer body of men, about 200, could not well be selected in any part of Scotland. They were divided into five companies. The first company, with their swords and targets, had a very splendid appearance; while the light company were dressed as foresters, in shepherd tartan dresses, kilts of course, and had firelocks. This company was also much admired, as indeed were the whole corps, and especially the grenadiers, a giant parcel of men. At half-past two, a body of about sixty men, from the estate of Menzies, elegantly dressed in Menzies' uniform, came forward under the leadership of their chief, Sir Neil Menzies of that ilk, Bart., and took their stations on the lawn; and also about thirty men from Mr. Menzies of Chesthill's property. The different companies were liberally provided with pipers, flags, &c. The Menzies' company had two very elegant banners of white silk, one of which had the Menzies' arms, and the other "God save the Queen." There was an endless variety of designs on the Breadalbane flags. A company of the 92nd Regt., and a number of the 6th Dragoon Guards, were also on the ground. The target men were drawn up in a circular line in the front of the colonnade, and the dragoons were stationed at the west corner of the main body of the castle, immediately behind them. The marquees were to the left, and drawn out on both sides of the carriage-way. On the west side, in front of the new wing, were the foresters, while the 92nd were placed immediately opposite the main entrance and on the south of the square, and having the other companies of the Breadalbane men on their right and left. In this position they awaited her Majesty's arrival

At five o'clock a flag was hoisted on the top of the Crag of Dule, as a signal that the Queen was approaching. At twenty minutes to six her Majesty entered the elegant triumphal arch at the front of the Castle, and, escorted by a party of the Carbineers, drove slowly along in her open carriage and four, followed by six other carriages and four, and several pair of single-horse vehicles. The cheering of the many thousands who lined the road along rolled on to the vast multitude who were assembled on the lawn, and who joined in the universal hurrah—nine times nine—to which the surrounding hills re-echoed. She alighted at the main door of the princely abode at sixteen minutes to six, when a royal salute was fired, and the royal standard—brought from England for the special purpose—was substituted for the Breadalbane flag on the top of the Castle.

The Breadalbane Highlanders were ranged on the lawn in front of the Castle, and the marquis stood in front, about 150 yards in advance of his men. As soon as the Queen approached, the marquis called out, "Highlanders, attention!" and all followed the marquis in giving the grand salute. When her Majesty entered the Castle, she was conducted to the balcony by the marquis, when the Highlanders gave nine hearty Highland cheers. Her Majesty and Prince Albert immediately made their appearance on the balcony, when the cheering was again resumed, and graciously acknowledged. She then retired within, and the vast multitude thereafter dispersed, to assemble again in the evening to witness the fireworks. The dinner took place at eight o'clock, her Majesty and Prince Albert occupying the centre of the table, the Marquis of Breadalbane on the left of her Majesty, and the Marchioness on the right of Prince Albert. In front of the Castle there were platforms erected, where Highland dances took place by torch-light, and her Majesty witnessed them from the balcony. On the lawn were the words, "Welcome, Victoria and Albert," in transparent lamps, which had a magnificent effect. The fort on the hill, opposite the Castle, was covered with variegated lamps, and bonfires blazed on every promontory. Many of the trees were hung with lamps, which gave the grounds quite the effect of a fairy land. Mr. Menzies, Mr. Fox Maule, Mr. G. Campbell, of Front, and many other gentlemen,

THE QUEEN'S ENTRY INTO THE CITY OF PERTH.

PROVINCIAL.

BUXTON.—On Sunday last, an earnest and a powerful appeal was made in St. John's Church, to a highly respectable audience, by the Rev. Robert Pennyman Hull, B.A., incumbent of this place, for the benefit of the charity fund for the relief of the infirm poor, resorting to the Baths at Buxton, when the sum of £29 8s. 2d. was collected.

LEAMINGTON, Wednesday, Sept. 14.—During the past week—three days of which were devoted to the attractive sports of Warwick races, and their accompanying amusements—the principal hotels here were quite besieged with visitors, and the town, generally, extremely full of company. Among the nobility and gentry who took up their quarters at Leamington were the Duke of Beaufort, the Earls of Chesterfield, Wilton, Howth, Miltown, &c.; Lords G. Bentinck, Ossulston, Forester, Seymour, Oranmore, Bagot, A. Lennox, C. Beauclerk, Lindsay, &c.; Hon. Captain Rous, M.P., Hon. Colonel Anson, M.P. Rubini's farewell concert, at the Music Hall, on Saturday morning last, was very fully and most fashionably attended, nearly 400 persons being present, including Lord and Lady Leith and family, with a large party from Stoneleigh Abbey, where a numerous circle of distinguished visitors had been hospitably entertained during the week, his Lordship having acted as one of the stewards at the races. Much disappointment has been felt at the sine die postponement of another concert intended to have been given on the 20th inst., and for which Madame Grisi, Signori Ernesta Grisi, the Lablaches, Mario, &c., had been engaged, but which has been unavoidably abandoned, owing to the indisposition of the unrivalled prima donna. The Leamington grand dahlia show, at the commencement of the week, produced a most pleasing exhibition.

DUEL.—A hostile meeting took place at Tenby, on Tuesday morning, in a field near the town, between C. Wells, Esq. (the mayor) and Capt. Freeling (son of the late Sir Francis Freeling). Two shots were exchanged, but happily without effect.

TYRANNICAL ABUSE IN DOVER GAOL.—At the Dover police-court, James Fitzjames and Edward Gladstane, comedians, were charged by Frederick Fox Cooper with assaulting him on the previous evening. The charge being proved against Fitzjames, he was fined 10s., including costs. The same parties were then charged with threatening the life of Mr. Cooper that morning, and were required to find two sureties in £20 each to keep the peace for two months, and in default were committed. They found bail after being confined three or four hours. From this incarceration arose a charge on their part against the gaoler and turnkey of Dover gaol, for exceeding their duty in causing their hair to be cropped after the fashion of common felons during the short time they were in their custody while bail was procuring, according to the decision above. The magistrates met on Friday to investigate the case, when Mr. Bass appeared as the solicitor for the complainants, and submitted that, although, in order to bring the matter before the justices, he had advised the parties to take out summons for assaults, the proper course would be to treat the matter as one involving a tyrannical excess of duty on the part of the officers,—to which course the magistrates assented.—Mr. Fitzjames was sworn, and stated, that on being placed in custody till they found bail, they amused themselves with singing the song of "All's Lost," when the gaoler came to them, and threatened, if they did not leave off singing, to place them where they would not get bail for three days. He then made them take off their coats and hats, and tuck up their shirt sleeves. After this their hair was cropped short, by order of the gaoler. They were placed among the debtors, but were ordered not to speak. The turnkey told them that they must pick oakum, or go without their dinner. He (Mr. Fitzjames) declined both. The gaoler threatened that if they did not conform to the rules of the prison, they would be publicly whipped. He clearly understood that if he did not pick oakum he would have no dinner. The gaoler's manner was such as to intimidate him. Gladstane asked the surgeon if it was necessary they should have their hair cut. The surgeon said he thought not. The gaoler said, "If you do not submit to the rules, you will be placed upon bread and water." They both remonstrated with the gaoler on having their hair cut; and Mr. Gladstane requested him to wait till their friends returned with bail. Their hair was cut off about a quarter of an hour after they were put into gaol. One of their friends stated, in the hearing of the gaoler, that he would go and get bail for them.—Mr. Gladstane corroborated the statement of Mr. Fitzjames, and added, that they expostulated with the officers not to take off their hair, as they would be bailed in a few minutes, and the want of their hair would be detrimental to them in their profession as actors. To this the turnkey replied, in jest, that he would cut off their heads if the gaoler bid him.—The gaoler stated that, while in his house he heard a noise some time after the complainants were locked up, on which he went to the gaol, and found them bellowing and singing. He informed them that if they infringed the rules of the prison they would be placed in solitary confinement for three days. He admitted that he ordered the complainants to be "cropped," and subjected to the same treatment as other prisoners committed for misdemeanour. They had been examined by Mr. Coleman, the surgeon of the gaol. They were clean. They neither of them asked to have their hair left on. He told Macdonald to treat these men as misdemeanants. He was bound to take their description. All prisoners were treated in the same way, and the rules of the prison left him no alternative. Persons of the higher classes of society, he said, had been served similarly; and instanced a Mr. Baring and a Mr. Beresford, who had their hair cropped in Dover gaol.—Mr. Coleman, jun., surgeon, had examined the complainants in gaol. He told Mr. Cockhard he should treat them as other prisoners; and he thought the gaoler did quite right. He did not say it was unnecessary to cut their hair. He thought it was about two o'clock when he examined them. They were treated the same as other prisoners. He saw no harshness exercised towards them by the gaoler. The gaoler did not tell him for what complainants were committed.—Mr. Robins said he went to the gaol to offer bail about three o'clock.—Mr. Fitzjames said, "There was no noise: we merely sang."—One of the justices said, the case for their consideration was, whether the officers had exceeded their duty; and, if not, whether they had been harsh in the exercise of it.—Mr. Bass submitted that they had done both; that they ought not to have entrapped the surgeon into an order to treat these gentlemen as other prisoners, without having informed him that they were only waiting for bail; that they had evidently knowledge that bail was about to be given, as a person, in the hearing of the gaoler, had told the parties that he would go and fetch bail; and that the necessity of the case did not require any such severity as had been used; and he then left the case to the decision of the Bench, quite confident that they would, as well for the sake of justice as for the honour of the town, prevent the perpetration of such outrages by their officers.—The Court was then cleared, and after being in deliberation a considerable time, the parties were called in, and the Mayor said the Bench had, after well weighing the evidence, come to the conclusion that the governor of the goal was perfectly justified in ordering the hair of the prisoners to be cut off, and therefore they dismissed the case.

DOVER, Sept. 12.—This morning, at 10 o'clock, Mr. Russel, inspector of prisons, entered upon an investigation of this case at the goal of Dover. There was a full bench of magistrates in attendance. The inquiry, however, was conducted privately, and, therefore, we are unable to give a detail of the proceedings. From what has transpired, however, we understand that the evidence of Messrs. Fitzjames and Gladstone, and the gaoler and turnkey, was taken by Mr. Russell, who is to draw up a report to be submitted to the Secretary of State. Mr. Russell, we hear, reproved the gaoler for the haste with which he had the parties cropped, although he did not assert that that functionary had overstepped, strictly speaking, the prison rules laid down for him. These rules, however, we understand, are to be revised, so as to prevent a similar occurrence in future.

EXTENSIVE FIRE AT LIVERPOOL.—A fire took place at a large bonded warehouse situate in Galton-street, Dundee-street, and Paisley street, the property of Sir John Tobin. It is called Tobin's bonded warehouse, No. 212, and is occupied by Messrs. Graham and Taylor. The front, or gable-end of the warehouse, which looks to the west, is in a narrow street called Paisley-street. The south side of the warehouse is in a rather broad street, now called Galton-street, but better known by its former name of Robert-street North. The north side of the warehouse is in a narrow street called Dundee-street, on the opposite side of which is a long range of lofty warehouses. On the eastern end the warehouse adjoins private dwelling-houses. The upper stories of this extensive warehouse were filled with cotton, coffee, sugar, rice, &c. The vaults are stored with materials of a still more inflammable character, such as palm-oil, turpentine, saltpetre, and rum. The warehouse was closed at the usual hour, four o'clock, and all was then safe as usual. In little more than an hour after, or about twenty minutes past five o'clock, smoke was observed to issue from the door of the jigger-loft, and very speedily the flames became observable, and spread with remarkable rapidity. Information of this was promptly communicated to the nearest police-station, and at half-past five Mr. Whitty, Superintendent Leverett, and other officers, were on the spot. Engines quickly followed, and though the fire had then gained considerable head, it might probably have been subdued before it had penetrated to the story underneath, had there been an abundant and ready supply of water. Mr. Hewitt, Mr. Whitty, and the men under their command, exerted themselves with all the daring and skill for which they have become celebrated, in order to arrest the progress of the destructive element; but it nevertheless slowly descended into the lower apartments, and began to assume a terrific, though magnificent aspect. Men were busily employed in emptying of their stores those rooms to which the flames had not penetrated, and a good deal of cotton and other articles was got out, and deposited in an adjoining street. Whilst engaged in this work, some of the bricks forming the arch of the uppermost doorway fell down upon one of the labourers, who was crushed to the earth. He was found to be severely bruised and crushed about the lower part of the body, whilst his head was fractured. He was conveyed to the Northern Hospital, and is in a dangerous state. The roof of the warehouse fell in about half-past eight o'clock, and from that time the prospect of saving the upper part of the building seemed almost hopeless. The fire-police, however, mounted on tall ladders to the upper doors and windows, and directed the hose of the various engines to those parts where the conflagration was the fiercest. The vast mass of water thus steadily directed upon the blazing pile seemed at one time (about ten o'clock) to be slowly obtaining the mastery over the fiery element, and a confident expectation was entertained that it would be prevented from progressing below the third or fourth story. At one time the mass of flame emitted from the glowing pile extended nearly across Galton-street, and some fear was entertained for the safety of one or two of the houses on the southern side of the street. A report, in fact, was circulated that one house had actually taken fire; but this was not correct. The sheet or wave of flame speedily became contracted in volume, and all fear for the southern side of Galton-street was at an end. The inhabitants of the houses on the north side of Galton-street, adjoining the burning warehouse, naturally became soon alarmed, and removed the whole of their effects.

In the midst of this awful and solemnly imposing scene, a circumstance of an almost ludicrous character took place. A considerable quantity of the half-consumed coffee was ejected into the street; the heated water thrown back from the glowing walls of the flaming interior, poured into the channels, and carrying with it the roasted coffee and quantities of melted sugar, formed a beverage which some portion of the vast crowd of spectators were eagerly employed in scooping up in the hollow of their hands and drinking. At half-past one o'clock the exertions of the police had succeeded in greatly reducing the fire, and all apprehensions of its extending beyond the building in which it originated were dissipated. It is not known, and probably never will be, how the fire originated. It is stated that the loss of property, exclusive of the warehouse, will not be more than £15,000. We learn from another authority, that, including the building, the loss will not exceed £20,000. The warehouse was fully insured, and it is believed that most of the goods were covered by policies.

FIRES IN LANCASHIRE.—On Monday information was received at the principal insurance-offices in the metropolis of the occurrence of an alarming fire on the night of Friday last, at the extensive saw-mills of Messrs. Fowler, in the town of Bolton, Lancashire. It appears that the premises in question cover a large extent of ground, and consist of twelve lofty and capacious erections, technically called sheds, engine-house, &c., and contained a large quantity of timber. The flames were first discovered about nine o'clock, raging furiously in No. 2 shed, and although the alarm was instantly given, and the engines were promptly in attendance, and the most energetic efforts were adopted by the authorities for the suppression of the flames, so powerful a hold had they obtained, that the fire was not subdued until the warehouses numbered 1 to 4 were completely destroyed. A deal of the timber on the premises was also burned, and a portion of the machinery damaged, but the loss is, we understand, covered by an insurance in the County Fire-office. From an investigation which has since been instituted into the origin of the conflagration, there is too much reason to believe that it was caused by the act of an incendiary.

THE ROBBERY AT LADY LISLE'S, AT MILLBROOK.—The butler at Lady Lisle's, whose name is Barnes, having made himself very officious in rebuking the policeman for allowing a suspicious person to pass him on the night of the robbery, and the police-inspector being satisfied that the robbery was effected by some person well acquainted with Lady Lisle's premises, the butler was at length suspected of being the thief; and some portion of the stolen plate having been found in a place which confirmed the suspicions against the butler, Barnes was accordingly apprehended and lodged in gaol on Tuesday night. The butler has been in the service of her ladyship a great number of years, and was a servant in whom she placed the greatest confidence.

SINGULAR COACH ACCIDENT.—On Friday week an accident happened to the Ulverston coach on its way to this town, which had nearly proved fatal to all the passengers. On arriving at the river Esk, at Ravenglass, they found that the tide had made considerable progress. The coachman, however, endeavoured to pass the river, and when near the middle it became so deep than the water ran through the coach, and by some means or other the traces slipped, and the horses were disengaged. Thus was the coach left in the middle of the stream, with a heavy tide rapidly advancing upon it. Mr. Smith and the Misses Smith, the vocalists, now performing in our theatre, were amongst the passengers, and actually gave themselves up for lost. At this critical moment, however, four strong men, who were outside passengers, descended from the top of the coach, and plunged into the river up to the waist. They caught the horses, succeeded in fastening the traces to the coach, and then, placing their shoulders to the wheels, presently got the vehicle on the move, and in a few minutes more had it safe on terra firma.—Cumberland Pacquet.

RARE PLANTS IN FLOWER.—There is now in full bloom at the nursery grounds of Mr. John Fox, Rosevale, Penzance, two of those magnificent plants, the "Yucca Gloriosa," between eight and nine feet high, and having on each from a thousand to two thousand lovely flowers, which are likely to continue opening for a fortnight. These plants are similar to the aloe, and seldom flower in this country.—Plymouth Journal.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Saturday last as six men and a boy were returning from their work, in crossing the river from Bredwardine to Letton, five of the party were precipitated into the water by the sudden shock of the boat striking the shore, having been carried a little lower than they had proposed, to a spot where the stream was both rapid and deep. Two of the men succeeded in regaining the boat, and were saved; but, we deeply regret to say, the boy and the other two men perished. All attempts to discover the bodies have hitherto proved ineffectual.

BRIGHTON, Tuesday.—This morning a dreadful accident happened on the London and Brighton Railway to a policeman in the employ of the company, named Gorringe. It appears that in consequence of the immense quantity of goods brought down by the luggage trains it is necessary, in certain parts of the line, to sprinkle the rails with sand to make the wheels of the engine "bite." About two o'clock this morning Gorringe was engaged in the Clayton tunnel (the longest on the line), about eight miles from Brighton, sanding the rails, when the train approached, and before he could get out of the way the wheel of the engine caught his right arm and nearly severed it in two. The engineer, who was proceeding at a very slow pace at the time, immediately stopped the train and took up the poor fellow, and conveyed him to Brighton. A fly was then procurred, which took him to the Sussex County Hospital, where he has since undergone amputation. Gorringe was a very steady man, and has been in the service of the railway company upwards of three years.

TREMENDOUSLY DARING FEAT.—An American seaman, named Michael Smith, aged 23, proposed to leap from the east side of Sunderland-bridge into the river, on Wednesday last. His intention was, however, frustrated by the police; but about six o'clock in the evening of the same day, determined not to be diverted from his purpose, Smith went privately on to the bridge, and despatched his companions to apprize certain parties who had befriended him of his determination to leap; several were, however, disappointed, having, before they arrived, perched himself on the summit of the lamp-frame, from whence, waving his cap gallantly, he sprang into the river Wear—a height of upwards of a hundred and ten feet!! On reaching the water he struck out and swam "like a sea-bird," to a keel or barge, from whence he saluted the spectators on the bridge and on the heights, in the style of a true Jack Tar, which was immediately returned by a round of hearty cheers from the astonished multitude. It is almost unnecessary to inform our distant readers (for there are few but must have heard of the far-famed iron-bridge at Sunderland) that it is so constructed that large vessels of 400 tons sail underneath it without striking their masts. Smith has done what no man ever did before; and what, very probably, no other man will dare to attempt again. Smith is an active, brave, jolly-hearted fellow, short-made, and about 23 years of age. He has frequently leaped from the highest yards and masts of ships into the sea; and, in several instances, has been instrumental in saving the lives of his fellowmen, at great peril. After coming out of the water he was rewarded by being taken to the station-house.

THE LATE STORM.—HIGH WYCOMBE.—About seven on Wednesday evening, this town was visited by one of the most awful tempests ever known. The thunder was dreadful; and the lightning, though forked and violent, was awfully grand, followed by the heaviest rain that has been for many years remembered. The whole town was inundated, and that in a great measure owing to the neglect of the surveyors of the road in not having the gutter-gratings up, so as to let the water into the common sewers. -Bucks Gazette.

Wednesday evening this town was visited with a tremendous storm of thunder and lightning, accompanied with a heavy fall of rain.—Aylesbury Gazette.

This city and neighbourhood was visited on Wednesday night, about eleven, with a storm of equal severity to that of that day fortnight. The lightning was exceedingly vivid, illuminating in continuous flashes the entire sky, while the thunder kept up an almost perpetual roll, with a heavy but refreshing rain. The lightning of Wednesday night killed two fat bullocks, the property of Mr. Taylor, of Bylaugh. When found on Thursday morning, they were lying under a large oak; one on the top of the other, as if struck at the same instant. The lightning appeared to have run along and singed their fore legs. Upon being skinned the inside was perfectly black as also the blood, which still retained its fluid state. The tree had been struck, several of the branches slightly shivered, but the trunk was riven through. Fortunately the rest of the herd escaped. The bullocks were worth about £23 each.—Norwich Mercury.

DANGER OF INCONSIDERATE OFFERS.—A gentleman in this county who was much annoyed by wasps, rather thoughtlessly offered a shilling for every wasp's nest which could be brought to him. All hands in the neighbourhood immediately set to work, and the unlucky gentleman had to pay nearly £40, there being nearly 800 nests brought to him.—Derbyshire Courier.

CHEESE FROM THE ANTIPODES.—We have had submitted to us a convincing proof of the goodness of the pastures in South Australia, as well as the excellent dairy management of some of the inhabitants, in a portion of a cheese forwarded by Mr. T. N. Mitchell, of Port Adelaide. We can safely say, that the cheese is fully equal in richness to any English cheese that we have ever tasted, not excepting the far-famed Stilton. A second specimen has been sent to Netherby, as a present to Sir James Graham.—Liverpool paper.

EXTRAORDINARY FACT.—At eight o'clock on the morning of Monday last, the workmen of William Hancock, Esq., of Wivelliscombe, commenced reaping a field of wheat, part of which was immediately carried, thrashed, sent to the mill, ground, made into bread, again brought into the field, and consumed before five o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, actually before the whole of the field was cut. Nor was this all; the "worthy banker" produced two straw hats made from reeds which had been growing in the morning. These hats were worn by two of the reapers.—Somerset Gazette.

DREADFUL EXPLOSION IN A COAL-PIT AT OLDBURY.—We are informed that an explosion of fire-damp took place at Mr. Haines's pit, at Oldbury, on Thursday, which caused the loss of several lives.—Ten Towns' Messenger.

EDINBURGH, Saturday Morning.—The organs of the church are busily engaged in discussing the conduct of her Majesty in not attending divine service in the Established Church on Sunday last. These writers look upon it in the light of a slight offered to the establishment, and they consider their opinion to that extent to be confirmed by the fact that her Majesty had service performed in Dalkeith Palace by a clergyman of the Scotch Episcopal Church, and not by one of her own chaplains of the Established Church of England. There can be no doubt her Majesty contemplated no such offence as the one imputed to her; but in the present sensitive state of the high church party, one cannot wonder that the subject has been warmly taken up.

LEICESTER.—EXTRAORDINARY ROBBERY.—On Saturday last, a robbery was committed in the house of Mr. John Taylor, under the following singular circumstances: -Mr. Taylor has two residences, one at Leicester and another at Belgrave. Having been attacked with illness, he remained at the latter place till Saturday, leaving a girl of about seventeen years of age to manage during the absence of the regular housekeeper. In the night of Friday the girl arose, and proceeded to a room in which her master had deposited a sum of money; breaking open a drawer, she took 16 sovereigns therefrom, and then cut her hair close off, so as to resemble that of a man; she afterwards entered a room in which two or three men-servants were sleeping, and putting on a suit of clothes belonging to one of them, left the house. The man to whom the clothes belonged, missing them upon rising, searched the house, and finding a quantity of hair that the girl had cut off, and the girl herself missing, he gave an alarm. Mr. Taylor, being made acquainted with the circumstance, caused information to be given to the police, who succeeded in capturing her, in her disguise, with the principal part of the property upon her, near Melton. She was immediately taken before a magistrate, who at once committed her to the quarter sessions.

INCENDIARISM.—An alarming fire broke out about 12 o'clock on Saturday night last, in a stack of hay, in Bramley-lane, Conicleton, belonging to Mr. Chaddock, liquor-merchant, an old and respectable resident in that ancient borough. The engine was promptly on the spot, attended by Mr. Williamson, police-officer, and his attendants. So great was the delay occasioned by the want of water, that it was about half-past four before the fire was completely extinguished. There was another stack near the one which was on fire, but the lucky expedient of covering it with tarpaulins was hit upon, by which it was saved from the flames. The quantity of hay in the stack was eight tons, and about three tons were saved. It was evident, from examination of the hay, that it was not spontaneous combustion, and that it must have been the work of an incendiary.—Macclesfield Courier.

MELANCHOLY SUICIDE.—An inquest was held before J. L. Ellis, Esq., coroner, on Friday, at the Sea House Hotel, Worthing, on the body of Mr. Richard Parker, aged 62, formerly of Arundel and West Tarring, and since of this town. It appeared he was generally cheerful and pleasant in his disposition; that, owing to recent misfortune, he was without house or home—a wanderer in the town, and destitute; also, that as one of the trustees of a benefit club, he had appropriated £2 9s. of a sum directed to be deposited by him in the savings' bank, and had to meet the members on the Tuesday evening, or about that day. This circumstance, it was thought, might have contributed to the distress of his mind. Verdict, "Temporary Insanity."—Sussex Advertiser.

THE LATE STORM.—From the various accounts received from different parts of the kingdom, we regret to state that the storm which visited the metropolis on Wednesday week, and the hurricane of the following day, have been felt throughout the kingdom, particularly along the coast, and have been attended with the loss of a vast deal of property, besides human life.

A DRUNKEN COW.—On Friday evening last a beer-house keeper at Merthyr put two pails of wort to cool outside his house; a cow, which was grazing close by, went and drank about twenty quarts. It is not known where she spent the night, but early on Saturday she was observed by many running up and down, evidently under the influence of Sir John, and, in the course of the same day, the unfortunate cow died in consequence.—Monmouthshire Merlin.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Sept. 12. On Tuesday last Lord Eliot, accompanied by his brother and Mr Nichols, poor law commissioner, visited the Rathdown Union Workhouse. His lordship expressed himself much pleased with all the appointments.

All the wheat under the Queen's lock in this port has been liberated at the eight shillings duty, including that from Malta, the duty on which has been paid under protest. The total quantity was 21,000 quarters, the revenue collected on which tended to swell the receipts of the August month, generally the least productive in a financial view, to an amount as respectable as that of the busy periods of the year

The Quixotic Tom Steele is said to be recovering from his late illness. The Dublin Garrison races commenced this morning in the Phœnix Park. Lord F. Gordon, Major Hodge, Captain Cambis, &c., are among the stewards. Great improvements have been made in the ground, and a superb as well as substantial standhouse has been erected.

The Lord Bishop of Limerick held a confirmation at Limerick Cathedral on Thursday, when 336 persons partook in that rite.

The 8th Regiment, at present forming part of this garrison, have been furnished with percussion muskets.

Sir Michael O'Loughlin, Master of the Rolls, has left for England in a bad state of health.

Great "swimming matches" have become a favourite pastime in Cork.

On the evening of the 5th inst., says the Carlow Sentinel, two men, named James Farrell and James Kennedy, two notorious characters, stopped a draymen of Mr. Cassidy's, of Mountgarvan, on the road near Colonel Bruen's demesne, and took therefrom a cask of ale, intended for one of Mr. Cassidy's customers.

A few days since a gentleman, as is wont, for lack of other conversation, remarked to one of his labourers that the weather was most propitious for the harvest, "that it was uncommonly fine weather;" when Paddy replied, "in troth, yer honour, it is; and if yer honour had the waterin' pot in one hand and the sun in the other, you could not make it better for us nor it is."

Charles Powell Leslie, Esq., arrived at Glasslough on Thursday last from the Moors in Scotland, where he had been spending some time.

Lady de Grey has kindly subscribed £10 to the fund for erecting a spire on the church of Enniskillen, in addition to £50 before contributed to the church.

The Marquis of Clanricarde, Earl and Countess Glengall, Earl and Countess of Dunraven, Sir Aubrey De Vere, Bart., and Lady De Vere, Mr. and Mrs Croker, Hon. Mr. Burrell, and Captain Williams, son-in-law of Earl De Gray, have been on a visit to the Earl of Clare, at Mount Shannon.

Of the 130 union workhouses in this country 81 are declared fit for the reception of paupers, and by the end of autumn 100 will be open the whole at a cost of at least £1,150,000.

A deputation from the Senior Fellows, and a large portion of the constituency within the College had a long interview with Lord Eliot, on Saturday, to remonstrate with his lordship on the impolicy of persisting in the present contest for the representation of the University; but his lordship did not yield to the remonstrances urged. Mr. George Hamilton's committee continues to meet daily at East Chapel Buildings College.

A Belfast correspondent states that a warm altercation, which was near to terminate in the duello, has taken place between Mr. Tennent and a Mr. Caldbeck, for many years sub-sheriff of Down and Antrim counties.

DUBLIN THEATRE.—ILLNESS OF GRISI.—The opera of Norma was announced for Wednesday week, but owing to the continued indisposition of Madame Grisi, it became necessary to make a change in the performances.

Madame Grisi once more assumed her position on the scenic boards on Saturday, and was warmly greeted by a numerous and brilliant audience. The opera of Norma was performed, and all the parts were sustained with an effect rarely surpassed. The Prima Donna was in excellent voice, and seemed nearly perfectly restored to health.

IRISH LINEN YARNS.—The Belfast Northern Whig contains the following (to the locality) gratifying announcement:—"On Thursday last a Belfast linen yarn spinner sold to a Leeds house, to be shipped to Leeds, 20,000 bundles of yarn. In addition to this gratifying proof of the advantages we enjoy here in the linen trade, we can state upon authority that, taking the manufacturing districts of the North of England, of Scotland, and of Ireland, the only mills working full time are those of the Belfast district."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

PORTSMOUTH.—Admiral Sir Edward Codrington, the Commander-in-Chief at this port, will resign his command in November next, when his time for holding it will expire, having been appointed on the 22d of November, 1839. It is not known who is to be his successor here; rumour gives the appointment to Admiral Sir Byam Martin, but at present nothing has transpired to authenticate this statement, and several other officers have been named as likely to be appointed.

THE ARCHDUKE FREDERICK OF AUSTRIA.—His Imperial Highness landed at Devonport on Saturday, at two o'clock, having arrived in command of the Austrian frigate Bellona, at an early hour of the day. She came to anchor in the Sound, and at twelve o'clock the Admiral's tender, the Sylph, was despatched to the vessel to bring his Royal Highness on shore. The Archduke is the nephew of the Emperor of Austria, and his name is well known to the naval profession in this country, and indeed to the public generally, from the reputation he acquired by his activity and skill in the naval operations on the coast of Syria, in conjunction with the force under the command of Admiral Stopford. His appearance is extremely youthful and rather prepossessing; he is slight, but well-formed, with a florid complexion and dark blue eyes. When he landed he wore the uniform of a captain in the Austrian navy.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL, Sept. 14.—On Wednesday the Earl of Haddington, first Lord of the Admiralty, Sir George Seymour, the Right Honourable H. Corry, and the Honourable S. Herbert arrived, and formed a Board of Admiralty at Greenwich Hospital on matters connected with the schools of the Royal Naval Asylum, &c. Their lordships came in the Admiralty barge, which, after their debarking, returned to Whitehall.

WRECK OF HER MAJESTY'S CUTTER SWAN.—During the gale of wind which blew so tremendously on Wednesday week, this beautiful little craft, about 30 tons burthen, was unfortunately driven ashore on a shoal of rocks running out from a small creek, a little to the westward of Clovelly, and became a total wreck. The crew, with considerable difficulty, succeeded in saving their lives.

The late General Lord Vivian was one of the best Light Dragoon officers in the service. It is a fact that the deceased veteran, who reached, and most deservedly, the highest honours of the military profession, was originally intented for the law, and served part of his time as an articled clerk to a solicitor in the west of England. This is not the only modern instance in which a pen has been advantageously exchanged for a sword. Sir James Kempt, an officer equally distinguished as Lord Vivian, and also Master-General of the Ordnance, was a clerk in an army agent's office.

NEW GOVERNOR OF GIBRALTAR.—It is stated in the United Service Gazette, that General Sir Robert Wilson has been appointed Governor of Gibraltar, in succession to Sir Alexander Woodford, K.C.B., whose term of service is expired. Sir Robert Wilson entered the army in 1793, and served in Flanders and Holland in that and the succeeding year; in the rebellion in Ireland in 1798; in Holland again in 1799; in the Egyptian campaign of 1801; at the capture of the Cape of Good Hope in 1806; and raised and commanded the Lusitanian Legion in 1808 and 1809, in Spain and Portugal. He also served in several campaigns with the Russian army in Russia, Poland, Germany, and France, and with the Austrian army in Italy. In August 1821, the name of Sir Robert Wilson was erased from the army list, in consequence of his conduct at the funeral of Queen Caroline. He was at the same time deprived of various foreign decorations bestowed upon him. Sir Robert will repair to Gibraltar in October, in one of the Mediterranean steam vessels.

THANKS TO THE MILITARY AT LEEDS.—We understand that the magistrates of Leeds, at a special meeting held on Wednesday, unanimously passed a vote of thanks to Major-General Brotherton, Colonel his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, Lieut.-Colonel St. Quintin, and the officers and the privates of the 17th Lancers, and the military generally, for their excellent and efficient conduct, characterized with much zeal and moderation, when aiding the civil power to preserve the public peace, and to protect property within this borough.—Leeds Intelligencer.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.—The reserve battalion of the 71st Highlanders, soon after their arrival at Chichester Barracks, expressed their unwillingness, as Presbyterians, to be marched to the Episcopal Church. As there is no Presbyterian kirk in the city, they chose to worship at an Independent chapel, where the services differ little from their own. In the course of a week a letter was received from the Major-General commanding the district, authorizing Mr. Benson to preach to the Presbyterian troops during their stay in Chichester, and ordering the men to be marched down to the Independent chapel by the Captain on duty for the day.

The remaining portion of the 73rd Regiment left Woolwich on Wednesday morning, to proceed—some by the Birmingham Railway, to Birmingham, Manchester, &c.; others by the Great Western Railway, to Bristol, Newport, &c. There were no less than from forty to fifty waggons employed in conveying the baggage, &c. They are relieved at Woolwich by a detachment of the Royal Marines.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

NARROW ESCAPE FROM FOUNDERING OF A TIMBER SHIP.—The ship Laurel, Captain M'Bride, on her recent passage from Quebec to this port, and while in longitude 39 55, and latitude 37 35, or thereabouts, on the 26th ult., at 11 at night, came in contact with an enormous iceberg. The bows of the vessel were completely smashed and flattened in; the planks on the starboard side in particular, opened out and disrupted many inches apart. Luckily she had on board an exclusively timber cargo, and that, too, of a floatable description. Great praise is, we think, due to the captain, and his officers and crew, for their manful exertions in saving the ship, and bringing her to her destined port.—Liverpool Journal.

THE STEAM-SHIP HINDOSTAN.—This spendid vessel, commanded by Captain Moresley, arrived at Kingstown on Tuesday evening, a few minutes before six. She sailed from Liverpool at five minutes past seven A. M., and performed the entire distance, against a 21 feet tide all the way to Holyhead, in 10 hours and 58½ minutes. The mail steamer, Urgent, left Liverpool for Kingstown 58 minutes before her, and was passed by her about half way between the two ports at noon, and did not reach Kingstown till one hour and a half after the Hindostan got to her moorings. The Hindostan is the handsomest steamer we have yet seen, and has excited great interest and curiosity. Her cabins are splendid in the extreme, and she is in every point fitted up and equipped in a manner that bids defiance to all competition.—Dublin Evening Post.

ACCIDENT AT LIVERPOOL.—This morning (Thursday), between eleven and twelve o'clock, as a boat, attending upon the New York packet-ship Virginian, was in the act of bringing a hawser ashore, she unfortunately came in contact with a small steamer proceeding down the river, when, to save themselves from being crushed, two of the men leaped overboard; one succeeded in laying hold of a rope, and was saved; but the other was unfortunately drowned.

PORTSMOUTH, Friday.—Yesterday afternoon the Aurelian, timber-ship, outward bound to Quebec, hoisted the ensign with the union downwards, while lying at the moorings in the harbour: a signal of distress being rather an unusual display from a ship snugly moored in Portsmouth harbour, one of the most capacious, and at the same time the most secure in the world. Upon investigating the cause, it appeared that the sailors were dissatisfied with the quality of the provisions served out to them, both bread and meat, which they alleged was such as to render it quite unfit for human food. The cause of complaint has, however, been promptly removed, and the men have returned to their duty.

SHIP FOUNDERED AT SEA, AND SHAMEFUL CONDUCT OF THE CAPTAIN OF THE BRIG SEABIRD.—The schooner George, of London, Thomas Bowser, master, bound from Marseilles, with wheat, for Glasgow, became so leaky when crossing the Bay of Biscay, that on the 8th instant, being in a sinking state, she was obliged to hoist the usual signal of distress—the Jack with the union down. In the evening they were observed by a brig, who made sail towards the George, but darkness approaching, they lost sight of her. Captain Bowser, however, kept a light burning on deck all night, and in the morning of the 9th the north country brig Seabird, bound to Falmouth for orders, came within hail. The captain of the brig was informed that the George was sinking (in fact, her fore quawale was under water at the time), and was also told that the crew wished to come on board. He inquired the longitude, and having shown his own longitude, a difference of three degrees was observed. He promised to stay by the sinking vessel, but as soon as he got the longitude, he made sail and abandoned her in her distress. This cruelty was the more heart-rending from the fact of Captain Bowser's sister, her husband, and two infant children, together with a disabled seaman, being passengers on board the George. Fortunately, about three hours after, the American barque Byron, Commander Robert H. Pierson, from Havannah, bound to London, hove in sight, under double-reefed topsails, and having ascertained the state of the George, the mate of the Byron, Henry Waldo, and two black men, part of her crew, nobly volunteered to rescue their fellow-creatures from their desperate situation. The sea was running very high, and at the commencement the Byron's boat half filled with water. By perseverance, however, in three trips, they accomplished their laudable purpose, and, under Divine Providence, conveyed all safely on board the Byron, which vessel arrived in the Channel on the 11th, and when about five leagues south of the Eddystone, passed Captain Bowser and his unfortunate companions into Long's pilot-boat Pallas, of Cowes, from which they were safely landed at Plymouth on the morning of the 12th, without fee or reward.

THE HINDOSTAN STEAM-SHIP.—A splendid entertainment was given at Southampton, on Tuesday morning, on board this magnificent ship, by the directors of the Oriental and Peninsular Steam-ship Company, to a numerous and distinguished party. It was the intention of several of her Majesty's Ministers to have been present, had they not been engaged attending on her Majesty. The Right Hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer was the only one whose official duties allowed him to attend. Among the party present were Admiral Sir Edward Codrington (the Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth), Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker (the Superintendent of Portsmouth Dockyard), Rear-Admiral Dick, Major-General Sir James Lushington and Lady, F. Carleton, Esq., and Lady; Capt. Ward, R.N., the Mayor of Southampton, Capt. Elliott, R.N., Capt. Codrington, R.N., Rev. R. J. Robinson and Lady, Sir John Campbell, &c.

NOTICE TO MARINERS.—A lighthouse was building on Shortland Bluff, at the entrance of Port Philip, and was expected to be lighted about July last.

CAUTION TO MARINERS.—IMPORTANT DISCOVERIES.—The Pearl, arrived in the Downs from China, reports: "On our voyage from Sydney to Manilla, having, on the 24th of September, discovered an island not laid down in the charts; it lies in lat. 21 59 S., long. (by good chronometers) 168 30 E., it is a fine-looking island; well wooded with cocoa-nut trees close to the beach. At noon we were within three miles of the east point, which is in the middle of the island; off the point a reef projects about a mile to seaward; it stretches in a N. by E. direction 20 to 25 miles; the captain, supposing it to be a new discovery, named it Burrow's Island. Two days after we made the Island of Erromanga, which proved the chronometers to be correct. After we got to the northward of the N. E. point, we saw land stretching a great distance to the N. W.; it appeared to be detached from the first island, but night coming on we could not ascertain. On the 4th of April, in sailing down the China Sea, we observed the bottom quite plain; we sounded in nine fathoms, and found the bottom to be coral; this bank is not laid down in the charts of 1840; the bank is in lat. 7 36 N., long. 111 28 E., by two good chronometers, and lunar taken the day before. Although we had nine fathoms water, there may be less in some parts, and requires a good look out in this part of the China Sea."

THE QUEEN'S ENTRANCE INTO DUNKELD.

joined in the dance, which was on the occasion wholly confined to the kilted portion of the assembly, and to the reel of Huilachan principally, till twenty-five minutes past eleven o'clock, P.M. The royal and noble company within witnessed the display from the windows above; and her Majesty, on being again recognised, was loudly cheered. On the word dismissal being announced at half-past ten, the crowd immediately dispersed, more than delighted with what they had witnessed. The weather during the whole afternoon was very auspicious, enhancing in no small degree the festivities of the occasion, which might otherwise, from their out-door character, have been considerably diminished.

PRINCE ALBERT ON THE HILLS.—DEER-STALKING.

On Thursday morning the Queen and the Prince breakfasted alone at eight, and a few minutes past nine Prince Albert started for the hills. He was mounted on a Highland pony, and dressed in a black velvet shooting coat, shepherd's plaid trousers, shoes and gaiters, and attended only by the Marquis of Breadalbane. He proved himself a good shot; for he returned to the Castle about three o'clock, after having, with his own hand, shot nineteen red-deer, besides hares, rabbits, grouse, black-cock, and capercailzie. It was pleasing to see "Whig and Tory all agree" on this grand occasion, and a proof of it was given in Sir Robert Peel and Fox Maule galloping away to the hills together; and their servants being out of the way, Fox Maule held Sir Robert's horse till he mounted. In the afternoon, her Majesty and the royal party took a short drive to Kenmore, and round the marquis's grounds, on the Tummel-bridge road. The royal visitors sat down at eight o'clock to a most magnificent entertainment. In the evening Mr. Wilson sang, in the grand hall, several of the songs of Scotland, with which her Majesty expressed herself highly delighted. The Queen, in addition to those in the programme, requested Mr. Wilson to sing "Wae's me for Prince Charlie," and "Pibroch o' Donnel Dhu." The songs appointed by her Majesty to be sung by Mr. Wilson were, "Farewell to Lochaber," "The Lass o' Gowrie," "The Flowers of the Forest," and "Auld Robin Gray." Mr. Wilson sang many others at the request of the Duke of Buccleuch, and other noble lords and ladies. The Queen and Prince Albert retired at half-past eleven. It was expected yesterday that her Majesty would enjoy a sail on Loch Tay, and also visit the Falls of Achern and other places. There is to be a ball at the Castle in the evening. She leaves Taymouth Castle, it is said, on Saturday morning for Drummond Castle, taking the road to Killin. In consequence of the immense number of strangers who have been attracted hither by the festivities at Taymouth Castle, and the scarcity of accommodation, the price of victuals, lodgings, stabling, &c., has risen enormously. Food is at least charged double; and a guinea a-night is not an uncommon sum for a bed. So much as half-a-guinea is even charged for garret-rooms and stable-lofts. On the journey to Taymouth, her Majesty and Prince Albert, on passing Inver village, the birthplace of Neil Gow, seemed much amused at their reception there. At the triumphal arch 240 villagers assembled with a piper, each in their hand had a glass of whisky, and just as her Majesty came up the toast was given, "The Queen, God bless her," with three times three. Her Majesty rose and bowed, as also did Prince Albert. During the giving of the honours her Majesty smiled, again bowed to the villagers, and drove off. The Hon. Captain Murray rode by the side of the carriage to the bounds of the Athol property at Balnaguard, a distance of twelve miles. During the journey her Majesty engaged herself in writing down the names of the places she passed.

BROAD SWORD DANCE—TAYMOUTH CASTLE.

HIGHLAND REEL.—TAYMOUTH CASTLE.

CRIEFF, NEAR DRUMMOND CASTLE.

PERTHSHIRE, Saturday, Sept. 10. — Her Majesty opened the ball last night at Taymouth Castle with the Duke of Buccleuch. Prince Albert danced with the Duchess of Buccleuch. Reels were the principal dances. There were also waltzing and quadrilles, the composition of Strauss, Lanner, and Labitzky. The ladies were principally dressed in white, and wore the tartan of the respective clans. The costume of her Majesty was a white costume de bal. The ball was kept up with great spirit till nearly daybreak this morning. The Queen and his Royal Highness retired, however, long before the general company broke up.

This morning her Majesty was up at her usual early hour, and previously to her leaving the Castle for the seat of Lord Willoughby D'Eresby, she planted two trees in the park, on the eastern side of the Castle—an oak and a Scotch fir. Her Majesty handled an elegant mahogany spade, made expressly for the occasion, with the skill of an experienced gardener. His Royal Highness Prince Albert also planted an oak and a Scotch fir close to the other two trees. At eleven o'clock the departure of the royal party from the Castle was announced by the firing of artillery from the fort, and no sooner was the sound of the guns heard, than a crowd of spectators hurried to the bridge of Kenmore to witness the embarkment of her Majesty and the Prince on board the barge, which was to convey them down Loch Tay to Achlady, where there is a seat of the Marquis of Breadalbane, close to Killan, and where an elegant déjeûné was prepared. The Queen and her illustrious Consort embarked on board the barge prepared for them, at half-past eleven o'clock; they were accompanied by the Duchess of Buccleuch and the Duchess of Norfolk. In the next boat were the Earl of Aberdeen and Sir Robert Peel, and several more of the late guests at Taymouth Castle. There were several other boats, steered by the royal bargemen, and rowed by sturdy Highlanders. There were two boats, one filled with the band of the 92nd Regiment of Highlanders, and another with bagpipers. As the roy l fleet passed under the principal arch of the bridge, the cheers of the spectators were given with enthusiasm, and in a few minutes more, as it passed the little island just below the bridge, a discharge of small cannon was given; the salute was re-echoed and reverberated from the lofty hills by which the loch is bordered, in the grandest manner imaginable. The scene was full of beauty; the dark hills, the clear water, and the almost fairy-like fleet floating on its bosom, had the effect of magic; the landscape was perfect. Fortunately, the morning was fine, the sky clear blue, and the sun riding high and brilliant in the heavens.

The distance along the loch before the fleet of boats reached Achlady was fifteen miles; the royal voyagers landed after about two hours' rowing, and having partaken of the déjeûné, entered their carriages which were in waiting for them, and proceeded along the road to Drummond Castle, which is about twenty-five miles distant beyond Loch Earn-head. At seven o'clock the royal cortège reached Drummond Castle, and entered the park amidst the huzzas of the multitude assembled to do her Majesty honour and show their loyalty. The tenantry of Lord Willoughby D'Eresby were assembled on horseback, and, with a large cavalcade of farmers and yeomanry from different quarters of the country, followed the carriage of her Majesty, and rendered the scene more animated and imposing. Unfortunately, the day at three o'clock became overcast with clouds, and shortly after the rain came down in heavy showers. The carriage in which the Queen and the Prince rode was in consequence closed, and the good people of Crieff had not a favourable opportunity of getting a view of her Majesty. As, however, she is to remain at Drummond Castle until Tuesday next, the inhabitants will have an opportunity of viewing royalty, and of gratifying their curiosity, and testifying their loyal feelings. At night there was a bonfire in Drummond-park, and the principal houses in the town of Crieff were illuminated.

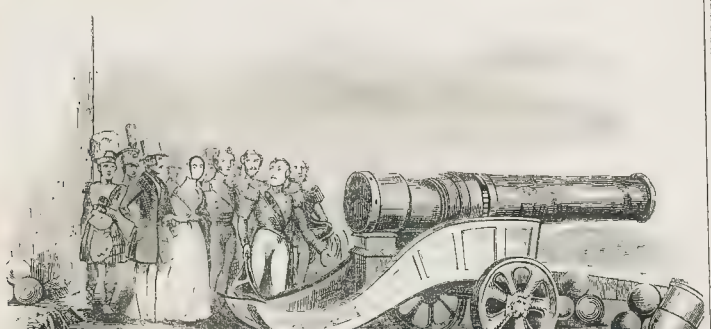
past six, preceded by a body of tenantry on horseback. Warning was given of the royal approach by a salute from the battery at Ochtertyre, at two miles distance from Crieff. The inhabitants of this place turned out along the road, in anxious expectation of the royal arrival, the shops being all shut and business suspended, and the interior of the place appearing quite deserted. When the Dragoons were seen, it happened that the mail from Stirling to Perth was journeying up hill on the road leading from Drummond Castle, and of course immediately in the way of the royal cortège. At one time a collision seemed inevitable, and just at the awkward angle of the road, but by great exertion the driver got the horses pushed up the brae, and the coach drawn in the opposite direction, just in time to leave a clear way for the party of Dragoons approaching rapidly in advance of the royal carriage. On passing through a beautiful triumphal arch, erected at the entrance of the town, the inhabitants of Crieff were not behind other places in loud demonstrations of loyalty. In a few minutes afterwards the royal party arrived at Drummond Castle, the avenue of which was lined by 500 of the tenantry on horseback, along with a much greater number on foot. At the entrance of the castle a body of the 42nd was drawn up as a guard of honour, and upwards of 100 Highlanders in the Drummond tartan completed the cordon. The band of the 6th Carabineers was stationed on the lawn. The royal carriage had been closed after passing through Crieff, in consequence of the state of the weather and the approach of the evening. There was great cheering along the whole avenue, which was, if possible, redoubled on her Majesty's alighting from her carriage. Lord and Lady Willoughby D'Eresby received the royal guests at the entrance, and conducted them with all form into the castle. The troops and the Highlanders were then dismissed, the latter being summoned to assemble again on Monday morning. On passing through Crieff her Majesty and Prince Albert both appeared somewhat fatigued after their journey. In the evening Crieff was brilliantly illuminated, and there was a display of fireworks in honour of the event. Bonfires blazed on the adjoining hills. Banners floated from the tops of many of the houses in Crieff, and in many conspicuous situations. On Thursday last 60 men of the 42nd Highlanders arrived from Scone Palace, and have since encamped on Thornhill, which is a short way to the west of the castle. The preparations, which are here on an extensive scale, have been proceeding for some time. Upwards of 100 of the Highland tenantry are equipped in the Drummond tartan, some with Lochaber axes, others with rifles, and the remainder with swords and bucklers. They have been zealously drilled during the last two days by two officers of the 42nd, in the presence of Lord and Lady Willoughby D'Eresby, and the other noble guests who are sojourning at Drummond Castle. The pavilion, where her Majesty with the royal party will dine, is splendidly fitted up with the Drummond arms—the three waving bars, &c. The walls are hung with red and yellow drapery, decorated with dahlias and other flowers, and different devices, executed in gold. This edifice is supported by twenty imitation marble columns, placed at equal distances, the space between each being filled up with the Drummond arms. The roof is twixt each being filled up with stars. The pavilion is 50 feet hung with blue lining studded with stars. The pavilion is 50 feet by 25 in dimensions. It has been arranged that his Royal Highness will this day (Monday) proceed on a hunting excursion to Glenartney, which is distant about two miles from Drummond Castle.

EDINBURGH, Tuesday Night.—Her Majesty passed through this city, on her return from the Highlands, at half-past four o'clock this afternoon, and at about five, or a few minutes after, reached Dalkeith House in perfect safety. Her Majesty seemed in excellent health and spirits; but travelling in an open carriage, exposed to the fresh and balmy air of the mountains, has somewhat embrowned her face, though it has detracted nothing from her beauty. At nine o'clock this morning her Majesty and the Prince left Drummond Castle, and, taking leave of her hospitable and kind-hearted hosts, Lord and Lady Willoughby D'Eresby, set out on her journey to Edinburgh. Her Majesty changed horses outside of Edinburgh at half-past four o'clock, and then proceeded through the town to Dalkeith House in a private manner. Her Majesty, it is said, remains at Dalkeith House until Thursday morning, when she will embark at Granton Pier for London. The Town Council of Edinburgh give a grand dinner to-morrow in honour of her Majesty. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, together with Sir R. Peel and the Earl of Aberdeen, it is stated, were invited to be present at it, but they declined the invitation.

The annexed curious piece of ordnance was minutely examined by her Majesty during her visit to the Castle of Edinburgh, as detailed in our paper of last week.



MONS MEG.

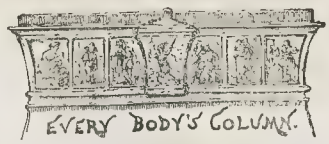
Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal have been taken during the week for their usual airings in the private grounds attached to the castle, attended by the Dowager Lady Lyttleton. The Prince and Princess were also driven out for a carriage airing in the neighbourhood of the Great Park, calling at Frogmore Lodge upon their return to the castle.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSIONS.—We may now state with certainty (says the Staffordshire Advertiser) that her Majesty has directed letters patent under the Great Seal to be issued, appointing special commissions for the trial of the persons in custody on charges connected with the disturbances in the manufacturing districts. That for Staffordshire will be opened on Saturday, the 1st of October: on Sunday the judges will attend divine service, and on Monday he trials will commence. Chief Justice Tindal will preside.

We understand that three learned counsel will appear for the crown at the forthcoming special commission at Lancaster; and that Sir Gregory Lewin and Mr. Wortley are two of the number already appointed. Standard.

THE NEW STAMP ACT.—The act of the 5th and 6th Victoria, chap. 82, which on the 10th of October next will come into operation, imposes a penalty of £100, and 10 per cent. on the amount of the stamp-duty payable on the probate or administration, upon any person who shall take possession of, and in any manner administer, any part of the personal estate and effects of any person deceased, without obtaining probate of the will, or letter of administration of the estate and effects of the deceased.

OPERATION OF THE NEW TARIFF.—In addition to several head of cattle brought on Monday into Smithfield market from Hamburg and Holland, and other adjacent countries, were twenty-two oxen brought from Spain for sale, by one salesman, being the first introduced into an English market from that country. They were of a large size and of excellent quality, and excited great attention.



WORLDLY HAPPINESS.

Alas! how hard it is to be happy! The casualties of this world come on like waves, one succeeding the other. We may escape the heavy roll of the mighty ocean, and be wrecked in the still smooth waters of the land-locked bay. We dread the storm and the hurricane, and we forget how many have perished within sight of shore. But yet a secret fear is ever present with us when danger hovers near.—Jack Hinton, No. 9.

When Maurice Margarot was tried at Edinburgh for sedition, Lord Justice Clerk Braxfield, who always talked broad Scotch upon the bench, said, "Hae ye ony counsel, mon?" "No." "D'ye wish to hae ony appointit?" "No; I only want an interpreter to make me understand what your lordship says."

AN OUTRAGEOUS PUN.

At a splendid "spread" at the Reform Club, where B—— was in every sense of the word the entertainer, one of the company made a remark upon the value of Shakspere's works. "True, there is one line alone of Shakspere's," said he "undoubtedly worth two shillings:"—

"'Tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis 'tis true."

Now there are four 'tis's in it, and four tizzies, according to Cocker, amount to two shillings.—Cronquill in Bentley's Miscellany.

DISCOVERY OF ENGRAVING.

The art of print engraving, like many other important inventions, was the result of accident. A poor woman having entered into the studio of the celebrated goldsmith, Maso Finguerra, bearing in her hand a packet of wet linen, incautiously placed it upon a table on which lay a small silver plate that the artist had just finished engraving. In order to see the effect before it was enamelled, he had filled the lines with a composition very nearly approaching our common printing ink, composed of lamp-black and oil, and the woman, upon taking up her parcel, found a very neat impression of the subject upon the wet napkin in which it was enveloped. Such is the story told by Vasari, and, if not exactly true, it has, at least, the merit of being highly probable.—Dublin Review.

SAFETY IN A STORM.

During the late terrific thunder-storm, R—— (who says the best things in London) stated that he had taken refuge in the safest place in town. Being asked where that was, he replied, "In an omnibus." "Why?" "Because it has a conductor."—Literary Gazette.

A GOOD JOKE.

The Millerites are prophesying that the end of the world is to be in April 1843; and yet, at the same time, in this month of August 1842, they are taking subscriptions for a newspaper, for one year in advance!! Not bad that.—New York Herald.

EXTRAORDINARY PRESENT.

The New York Herald of the 15th ultimo contains the following extraordinary advertisement:—"Child.—To be given away, an interesting and healthy child, aged 14 months; American parents. Any person wishing to adopt a child as their own, will find a rare opportunity by addressing a line to A. B., New York, giving address, and when to be called upon."

INDIAN ARMY.

The warfare of the Indian army at present is no joke. This century has presented before us foes as determined and as brave as any European army that ever took the field. The Rajpoots, the Burmese, and the Affghans are about as ugly customers in the way of fighting as the most death-loving soldier could desire. With these the case is one of life or death. No capturing, no quarter is given. If you fall into the hands of the foe, it is not to be shut up in a prison. Your life is instantly taken, and your body left for the benefit of the jackals, and other beasts of prey. Your memory is soon obliterated—your gallant deeds unsung. No pompous gravestone tells how you fought and fell. The name of the action in which you met your doom is scarcely demanded even by your nearest relatives; they are content to know that you were "killed somewhere in India." No Peninsular honours, no Waterloo-like medal rewards the hero who is lucky enough to escape from the Eastern wars. The achiever of the most valiant exploits in Asia gains no renown, no fame, for all his bravery, westward of the Cape of Good Hope.—Bentley's Miscellany.

"THE LAST OF HIS HOUSE."

"Yes, Jack," said he, on concluding a narrative of continual family misfortune, "there would seem a destiny in these things; and, if we look about us in the world, we cannot fail to see that families, like individuals, have their budding spring of youth and hope, their manhood of pride and power, and their old age of feebleness and decay. As for myself, I am about the last branch of an old tree, and all my endeavour has been to seem green and cheerful to the last."—Jack Hinton the Guardsman.

HEBREW VOLUME.

The Charleston Courier notices a rare literary curiosity in that city. It is a Hebrew prayer-book, thirteen hundred and fifty-seven years old! The Courier says it is an immense volume, written in the Hebrew character, on parchment of the finest quality—altogether a masterpiece of penmanship.—U.S. Literary paper.

BARTHOLOMEW FAIR.

This being the period of Bartholomew Fair (the last year, in all probability, of its existence), the following notice of its origin may be acceptable to our readers:—About the year 1102, in the reign of Henry I., the Priory, Hospital, and Church of St. Bartholomew, in Smithfield, were founded by one Rahere, a minstrel to the King, and "a pleasant-witted man." It seems that Rahere was determined to this pious work in a fit of sickness, during a pilgrimage he made to Rome, agreeably to the custom of the times, when St. Bartholomew appeared to him, and required him to undertake the work, and perform it in Smithfield. Before that time, Smithfield, or the greater part of it, was called "The Elms," because it was covered with elm trees. "Since that time," says Stow, "building there has so increased, that now there remaineth not one tree growing there." Smithfield derives its name from being a plain or smooth field. Regarding Rahere's occupation as a minstrel, it may be observed, that minstrels were reciters of poems, story-tellers, performers upon musical instruments, and sometimes jugglers and buffoons. Rahere "ofte hawnted the Kyng's palice, and amo'ge the noyseful presse of that tumultuous courte, enforsed himself with jollyte and pleasure," but he afterwards retired from the world, and became a model of piety and devotion. He was the first prior of his monastery. Stow says that "to this priory King Henry II. granted the privilege of a faire to bee kept yeerly at Bartholomew-tide, for three daies to wit, the eve, the day, and the next morrow, to which the clothiers of England and the drapers of London repaired, and had their booths and standings within the churchyard of the priory, closed in with walls and locked every night, and watched for safety of men's goods and wares. A Court of Piepowders was daily during the faire holden for debts and contracts." "But," continues Stow, "notwithstanding all proclamations of the prince, and also the act of parliament, in place of booths within this churchyard, there be many large houses builded, and the north wall towards Long-lane taken downe, a number of tenements are there erected for such as will pay rents." "The forainers," he adds, "were licensed for three following daies, the freemen so long as they would, which was six or seven daies." This was the origin of Bartholomew Fair, over which the charter of Henry II. gave the mayor and aldermen criminal jurisdiction during its continuance.

The late Dean of Westminster was a native of Ashburton in Devon, where his father was a respectable tradesman. He was educated at the grammar-school there, and having taken up his degrees, accepted a small curacy in the neighbourhood. He afterwards made the continental tour as tutor to a nobleman's son about the time of the French revolution. On his return he was appointed to the vicarage of Croydon, which he held for some years, and then he married a lady nearly related to the Bering family, and was soon honoured with the preferment of a Prebendary at Westminster, which in the end led to his appointment as Dean. Dr. Ireland, Canning, Gifford, and George Ellis, were the principal writers in the Anti-Jacobin. Dr. Ireland has left no descendants, his nearest relatives being a nephew and four nieces, the children of his deceased sister, Mrs. Searle.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

DONCASTER RACES.—MONDAY.

The Doncaster races of 1841 were remarkable not less for the poverty stricken character of the sport than for the energetic measures resorted to for the purpose of restoring them to something like their original excellence. Several meetings and conferences were held with this view, and their results appeared to justify the inference that in the adoption of a new and more vigorous system the municipal authorities and their patrons had taken the only effective means of obtaining their object. The corporation consented to resign the entire control of the races to a committee of noblemen and gentlemen belonging to the Doncaster club, and to place at their disposal the sum of £1000, to be applied towards the promotion of sport. The committee turned this power to excellent account. The Great Yorkshire Handicap, and the Five Hundred Sovereigns Stakes, were its immediate fruits, and they were followed by some judicious alterations in the conditions of the Cup for the following the present year, and the St. Leger for 1843. The committee did not confine their attention to the stakes; the Earl of Chesterfield and the late Duke of Cleveland cheerfully accepted the stewards-ship; Mr. Clark, "Chef Jus-ice of the Turf," received the appointment vacated by Mr. W. Lockwood; Mr. R. Perris, of Newmarket, that of starter; and on the death of Mr. J. Lockwood, shortly after, Mr. Martin that of Clerk of the Course. The paying and receiving of the stakes was intrusted to Messrs. Weatherby. The same determination to keep pace with the times was conspicuous in the minor arrangements. The judge's chair, for the first time, was removed to a position that enabled him to take a correct view of the horses as they passed the post; viz., only fourteen inches above the ground, instead of six feet six inches; additional rails were placed near the sides of the enclosure in front of the stand, within which policemen were stationed, to prevent the fraudulent transfer of tickets from those without to those without—a plan that has been systematically and most extensively practised at Doncaster and Goodwood for many years. A strong body of the police were placed under the orders of Mr. Ritches, successor to the late Mr. Tymms and Mr. Leadbitter. The telegraph, wanting, however, the late improvements, was made available for the accommodation of the company, and the usual measures taken for the preservation of order and the prevention of accidents on the course. To fill up the evening, the theatre is opened under Mr. Ternan's management, with Mrs. Waylett, Mr. Paul Bedford, Mr. Wright, and Mr. A. Lee, as "stars;" and Weppert's band is engaged for the balls. The new betting-rooms are opened as usual, and the subscriptions up to this morning had considerably exceeded those received up to the same period in 1841. Under these flattering auspices the races commenced this afternoon with the Yorkshire Handicap, as a welcome substitute for the now obsolete Ritzwilliam Stakes, spoilt solely by the nomination of Mr. Orde's celebrated mare, Bee's-Wing.

Day), Priscilla Tomboy (Oates), Aristotle (Templeman), Scatters (Calloway), Happy-go-Lucky (Bradley), Marion (Cartwright), Cabrera (W. Noble), Pharmacopœia (Nat), and Ballinkeele (Robinson).

Won easy by a length.

Priscilla Tomboy was third and Fireway fourth, Attila nowhere.

THE RACE.—About a quarter past three fifteen out of the seventeen that started had taken their preliminary canters; some minutes after the other two, Attila and Master Thomas made their appearance in company, took a short gallop, and joined in the customary parade from the grand stand to the starting-post. After one slight failure, an effective start was accomplished, and the race commenced, Attila taking the lead at a strong pace, followed by Scatters and Eboracum—Marion, Priscilla Tomboy, Fireaway, Happy-go-Lucky, and several others treading on their heels, with every other horse in the race closely laid up, except Ballinkeele, Seahorse, and Cattonite. Marion receded from the front rank in a few strides, and Priscilla Tomboy, finding the speed too much for her, was fain to keep company with Serhorse and Cattonite in the rear. In rising the hill Scatteen was passed by Eboracum, who neared the favourite at the mile post, and forced the running so effectually that at the Red House it was evident even from the stand that Attila was in difficulty. In making the bend this was placed beyond all doubt, and "The favourite is beaten" was heard from all parts of the course. Eboracum and Scatteen retired with him, and the running was taken up by Fireaway. Blue Bonnet, who had been in the rear up to the Red House, showed in front immediately after with Priscilla Tomboy, and at the two-mile post they were close up with him, Blue Bonnet lying on his left close to the rails, and Priscilla Tomboy on his right; Cabrera was in their wake, and Seahorse, who had been most conspicuously in the rear to the turn, having passed the beaten horses rapidly, was lying in his track at the distance. About 200 yards from home Blue Bonnet wrested the lead from Fireaway, was never after caught, and won very easily by a length. Priscilla Tomboy went past Fireaway at the stand, but was herself challenged by Seahorse a few strides from the chair, and beaten by half a length. Fireaway cantered lamely before he reached home, began kicking, and was a bad fourth; Ballinkeele made a waiting race of it, and, by an effort at the last, ran his compatriot Fireaway to a length. Cabrera was some lengths behind, and was followed in by a crowd of horses, at the head of which, we understand, were Attila, Pharmacopœia, Polly, &c. Cattonite looked in bad condition, and ran as bad as he looked. He was beaten off in the first fifty yards. The race was run in three minutes eighteen seconds. Value of the stakes, £3669. Lord Eglinton, we believe, wins about £3000, and his trainer, Dawson (the owner of Ned, the winner of the Oaks), and friends, a much larger sum.

The Cleveland Handicap of 20 sovs. each, 10 ft., and 5 only if declared, with 60 sovs. added; the second receives £30. One mile. (23 subs, 13 of whom declared.)

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

PRESTON ADJOURNED SESSIONS.

These sessions, for the trial of the principal rioters in the late disturbances at Blackburn, and neighbourhood, were held on Monday morning. T. B. Addison, Esq., the recorder of the town, officiated as chairman; and on the bench were Colonel Austen, T. M. Lowndes, Esq., W. Bailey, Esq., and several other county magistrates.

The first prisoners indicted were John King, John Harwood, John Lord, Joseph Johnson, George Pilkington, and James Grimshaw, for a riot at Blackburn, on Monday, the 15th of August last. It appeared from the evidence, which was very conclusive against the prisoners, that an attack was made upon several mills in the town on the forenoon of that day, and that the mob succeeded in turning the hands of many of the principal establishments out of work. The prisoners were proved to be the most active of a large assemblage, who were all armed with bludgeons of a most formidable description. They were arrested by a strong body of special constables, aided by the military, and offered considerable resistance. Johnson and King pleaded guilty — Mr. J. Addison, the recorder of Chthero, and Mr. Ingham conducted the prosecution, and the four remaining prisoners were defended by Mr. Wrigley.—The jury, after a short deliberation, returned a verdict of guilty.—Lord Pilkington, and James Grimshaw, were sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment in Kirkdale gaol; Lord and King, who pleaded guilty, to six months' imprisonment; and Johnson, for three months in the House of Correction in this town.

Wm. Proctor, Wm. Hutchinson, Abraham Rogers, Wm. Smalley, Roger Walsh, and Squire Hutchinson, were next indicted for participating in the riot at Blackburn, on the same day. These prisoners headed the attack on the mills of Messrs. Eccles, at five o'clock in the afternoon, outside of which they violently assaulted and knocked down Mr. Montague Fielden, a county magistrate, whilst engaged in reading the Riot Act. Rogers was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, as was Proctor, for the assault on Mr. Fielden; Smalley and Hutchinson for three months; and Walsh and Wm. Hutchinson for two months.

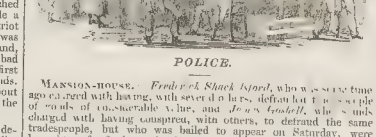
John Wilkinson and Joseph Rawlinson were next indicted for a riot at Blackburn on the same day. They pleaded guilty, and were sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

Wm. Rawlinson, Richard Holden, Ann Yates, Jane Catterall, James Hurst, James Driscoll, Wm. Hodson, and Joseph Yates, were indicted for having, on the 15th of August, turned several persons out of employment at Blackburn, and assaulting two of the police constables in the execution of their duty. Holden, Yates, and Hurst pleaded guilty. The prosecution was conducted by Mr. J. Addison and Mr. Walmsley, and the prisoners were undefended. The two women were very active in heading an attack upon a coach which was conveying several prisoners to the barracks; and the male prisoners, particularly Rawlinson, made use of very violent language, stimulating the mob to acts of violence. The prisoners were found guilty—the two females being sentenced to six months' imprisonment in Lancaster Castle; Yates and Hurst to six months' imprisonment at Rochdale; Rawlinson, who received a good character from several respectable persons, and who was proved to have received a wound in the head at the last "Preston Guide," which caused him to be insane when under the influence of drink, to six months' imprisonment; Driscoll one year, and Holden to two months.

Benjamin Wainscoat, Wm. Cook, Harry Thompson, James Barker, and John Hanson, pleaded guilty to an indictment charging them with coming riotously in a crowd from Accrington to Rackburn, where they violently assaulted the Yeomanry on duty by pelting them with brickbats from behind a hedge. Barker was sentenced to four months' imprisonment; Hanson, Wainscoat, and Cook, to two months; and Thompson to one months' imprisonment at the House of Correction in this town.

Robert Hartley, a man well dressed, and in a superior situation of life, Ratcliffe Ingham, Wm. Greenwood, Ratcliffe Hoyle, and Riley Catterall, were indicted for riotously assembling and endeavouring to enter into Blackburn, on the 16th of August, when they were intercepted by the military and police. The prisoners all pleaded guilty; and Ingham, who flourished a bludgeon over the heads of the police, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and the other prisoners to two months' each.

The Recorder, in addressing the jury, took occasion to remark that the results of the trials at the present and preceding sessions had shown that the parties engaged at the recent riots did not belong to the poorest classes of society. They were generally persons in good employment, who should have been content with the wages which they received, out who had, in a great many instances, subscribed towards Trades' Unions. They indeed aggravated greatly the offences under which the working classes laboured, and they would also be the sufferers from such illegal combinations.



POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—Frederick Shackelford, who was some time ago ordered with having, with several others, defrauded the occupiers of goods of considerable value, and James Goodall, who stands charged with having conspired, with others, to defraud the same tradespeople, but who was bailed to appear on Saturday, were brought up for final examination. Mr. Goddard, the solicitor for the prosecution, was in attendance. The evidence adduced in these cases was particularly important as regards the conspiracy. Thomas Harris stated that he resided at Maidstone, and that he went into the service of Beaumont (between whom and Shackelsford, it will be recollected, a connexion for the purpose of defrauding shopkeepers was upon the first examination established) as porter, about the middle of June last. The shop had been opened in Week-street, in the linendrapery line the day before. Beaumont was there himself, and also a person of the name of Charles Sydney Smith, and a man named James Gosbell. There was likewise a person of the name of Robert Beaumont present, who was represented to be Beaumont's father. All these three persons acted as shopmen to Beaumont. There was very little stock in the shop when witness first went thither, and he was there till the shop was closed by Robert Beaumont, and during all that time only one parcel of goods came in, and that was a lot of flannels and other drapery goods. There was very little custom to the shop in consequence of people coming repeatedly for goods which they could not be supplied with. There were no silks nor velvets. The whole stock of shawls appeared to be only four, which were hanging up in the shop. After the shop had been open about a fortnight, Beaumont and Smith left it. That was on the Monday morning, and they did not return home till about two o'clock on the following Saturday night, when Shackelsford was with them. Witness closed the shop soon after eleven, and left them all to the house, with Robert Beaumont and Gosbell. Upon inquiring at what time he should open the shop on Monday morning, Gosbell told him he would not be wanted until nine o'clock. When witness went to the shop on Monday morning he found Beaumont and he believed Shackelsford and Smith were gone away, for no one not see them. Beaumont was there, as was R. Beaumont, who told him he was not wanted just then, and witness went away, but returned again between twelve and one. When he returned he believed Beaumont had left the house, and he did not see Beaumont till the following Saturday night, when the persons he took age in were not Mr. Smith. They stayed about half an hour, and then went away together, and part of them returned since. The shop was kept open by Robert Beaumont and Gosbell till Wednesday, the 10th of August, when witness closed it in the evening, and Robert Beaumont said he would not have it open any more. He told witness to get a cart next morning, as the goods should be removed. When asked about the night, he begged Robert Beaumont to receive the goods and furniture to a house in York place. The furniture was very trifling, and the whole of the stock removed appeared to be worth about £50. He had not seen that the stock in the shop had been commenced on from the time Beaumont and Smith came down to Maidstone and went back again. Particular stock had been on the shop when witness opened, and the shop looked more naked—William Kay Bell—and he had been a good few at the Bull and Mouth tap, in St. Martin's-le-Grand, for about six months previous to the middle of July last, when he went to take the situation at the Great Western Railway. During the time he was at the Bull and Mouth, there were two or three persons, and several of them, amongst whose names were those of Beaumont and Smith, used to frequent the parlour. They came in repeatedly, nearly every day, inquiring for each other. He had several times seen brown paper parcels brought there by porters, and taken into the parlour and opened by the party present. There were silk handkerchiefs, velvet scarfs, shawls, and other goods. They used to set them out, and witness had seen Smith pay the rent money. He could not speak positively as to having seen Smith pay money to the prisoners, but the payment used to be generally made to Gosbell. Smith, and Beaumont used to take away the parcels, which were brought in cabs, and sometimes they used to send them away by. They had witness the goods were to go to a public-house in Barbican; at other times, to a public-house in Fleet; but he never took away any himself. His mistress suspected the party to be dishonest, and at length forbid them the house, but they continued to call as long as he remained in the place. Mr. Goddard having stated that the evidence was complete against the prisoners, the Lord Mayor said they stood committed for trial; Shackelsford for having defrauded the several parties who prosecuted, and Goodall for having conspired with several others to defraud them. His Lordship said the offence was bailable, and Gosbell's bail was accepted. Shackelsford was committed to Newgate in default of bail. The following is a statement of the different firms which have been robbed by the gang of rascals:—Mr. Patey, perfumer, Lombard-street, of goods to the amount of £58 4s. 5d. This tradesman succeeded in recovering another parcel which he had sent to the conspirators. Messrs. Welsh, Gregory, and Cubitt, of goods to the amount of £57 0s. 2d. Mr. Mumford, silk-warehouseman, Milk street, of goods to the amount of £55 8s. 2d. Messrs. Smart, Milk-street, of goods to the amount of £96 9s. 5d. Messrs. Ridge, Mellburn, and Jones, of goods to the amount of about £174. Mr. H. W. Ingram, Addle-street, of goods to the amount of £196 3s. 6d. Mr. George Frederick Minton, of goods to the amount of £165 5s.—It was stated that a number of tradesmen declined to come forward, under the impression that the prosecutions by the above firms would be sufficient to answer the purposes of the plundered. The bail required for each of the prisoners was two sureties in £200 each, and themselves in £200 each.

GUILDHALL.—Mr. Henry Bulpit, a clerk in the Post-office Money-Order department, attended before Sir George Carroll, to answer the complaint of Mary Bowley, the wife of a retired licensed victualler, lodging in Draper's-place, Burton-crescent. Mr. Peacock, the solicitor to the Post-office, attended to watch the case.—Mrs. Bowley stated that, about two months ago, she drew out £20 from the savings' bank in Montague-street. She was paid in new sovereigns, one being of King William's coinage, and the rest of Queen Victoria. Having occasion to remit £2 to her husband, who is a patient in Margate Sea-Bathing Infirmary, she went to the Post-office on Thursday in obedience to an order. Not having been there before, she waited to see three gentlemen make payments. She was then the only person remaining at that window; and the clerk having looked about and ascertained that she was the only person waiting, left the window without attending to her. After an absence of ten minutes, he returned to his seat. While he was absent, she had placed her money, two new sovereigns and a new shilling, on the window, keeping her hand over it. She took it off when he returned. He picked up the money, and again went away out of her sight for three minutes. He came back and said, "Two sovereigns: you want to send?" looking at her. She replied, "Yes, sir." Another clerk came and looked at her, and the defendant laughed. She then suspected something was wrong, and a third clerk came and looked at her. The defendant said nothing more to her: but a constable and a clerk came round to her, and took her to the office of Mr. Peacock, the Solicitor. The defendant then produced a medal, gilt, of the size of a sovereign, and having the Queen's head on one side, and a man on horseback on the other: such as men sell in the streets at a penny each, as sovereigns sold for a wager, and said that she had attempted to pass that as a sovereign. He produced an old sovereign of George IV., and an old shilling, as the other money she had tendered, when, in fact, all the money she had offered was quite new. She declared that both the sovereigns she had tendered were Queen Victoria's. Mr. Peacock asked him if this was not the second case? He said "Yes." Mr. Peacock asked if the other was not a woman, and the defendant replied, "Yes." She stated where she had received the money, and that she had eight more new sovereigns at home, in the paper from which she took the two. Her address was taken, and, after hearing her statement, Mr. Peacock said she might go. She returned with the eight new sovereigns, and showed them to Mr. Peacock, and told him she should seek redress for the sovereign which had been changed, when her husband returned. She kept her money locked in a teacaddy, and carried her key about with her. She frequently looked in the paper to see if her money was safe, as she sometimes went out to work, and placed the caddy in her landlord's care, not that she had the least doubt of his integrity. The defendant, in reply to this statement, said he took the shilling, sovereign, and counterfeit from the complainant. Without having first looked at it, he weighed the counterfeit, and seeing it was very light, he called the attention of Mr. Court, his fellow-clerk, to the fact. He then looked at it, and seeing it was counterfeit, he took it to the president, and left it in his hands. He afterwards went to Mr. Peacock's office to state the circumstances.—Sir George Carroll, after devoting an hour to the inquiry, said that a young man receiving £500 a-day would, if badly disposed, have so many opportunities of fraud, that he would not, like the defendant, have escaped imputation till now. On the other hand, the story told by the complainant was consistent in all its parts, and corroborated by the production of the rest of the new sovereigns. In the absence of more positive evidence, however, he was unwilling to give a more decided opinion; but he trusted that, in future, the money taken at the window would be tested in the view of the public, and so prevent such mistakes for the future.—The case was then dismissed.

BOW-STREET.—James Samuel Brown, clerk at the General Post-office, was finally brought up and examined upon the charge of forging money orders. The prisoner was fully committed for trial.

FOREIGN SWINDLERS.—On Wednesday a foreigner, who stated that he was the "Baron" Kame, and that he was a German, was brought before Mr. Twyford by Superintendent Pearce, of the A division, on a charge of stealing two gold rings with brilliants and a pearl pin, valued at £30, the property of Mrs. Charlotte Johnson, a widow lady, residing at No. 2, Palace-place, Whitehall.—Mrs. Johnson stated, that on Tuesday the 30th of August, the prisoner called at her house, and desired to look at some apartments which she had to let. After looking over the apartments, he approved of them, and said he wished, before engaging them, to show them to a friend. He called again the following day without his friend, and agreed to pay witness £20 per month for the apartments. Witness then asked for his card, when he said he had for not having one with him; but he produced what appeared to her to be a bank bill, on which was the name of "Baron Aivie Kolter," which he stated was his title. He added that the bill was for £500, and that he would get it cashed, and pay her £20 in advance. In the course of conversation, he said he had seen Lord Forester, who knew her late husband. On hearing this, she felt sure he was a gentleman. On Thursday he called again, while witness was in the parlour, taking off her bonnet after a walk. He was shown up stairs, where witness soon joined him (leaving her jewel-case on the table in the parlour). When she entered the drawing-room, she found him examining a liqueur-case which lay on the table. He expressed his admiration of it, and witness then remarked that she wanted to dispose of it. He said he was sorry he did not know that before, as he might have found a purchaser for it in the morning. He then said, "I think I shall become a purchaser myself; what will you take for it?" To which witness said, she would not take less than £20, which he promised to give when Lord Forester had cashed his bill. They then came down stairs together: and on entering the parlour, the prisoner observed the jewel-case on the table, and immediately went towards it, and admired the contents very much. He took up the two rings and the pin in question, which had belonged to witness's husband, and asked her if she wished to dispose of them, saying that he thought, if Lord Forester saw them, he would become a purchaser. Witness at first did not like to part with them, but, after a lengthened conversation, her scruples were overcome, and the prisoner persuaded her to allow him to take the property away, for the purpose, as he alleged, of showing it to Lord Forester. He promised to come in the evening, and bring Lord Forester with him; but he came alone, stating that Lord Forester could not come, and he had come himself, fearing witness might be uneasy about her property. He seemed in a great bustle, and proposed that witness should accompany him to a club-house in St. James's-square, when he would pay her the money in advance for her apartments, and also for the liqueur case. On witness asking for the rings, the prisoner said he should see Lord Forester at the club, when he would get his answer. They then proceeded to the square, where the prisoner desired witness to wait till he returned. He then left her, and, as she thought, entered the Wyndham Club-house. She waited about an hour for him, but he did not return, and she then went home. She had not seen the prisoner from that day until he was taken into custody. Constable Thornton, of the Detective Force, here produced the rings, which he had found pledged at a pawnbroker's in Oxford-street.—Mr. Twyford, after refusing to accept bail, ordered the prisoner to be remanded.

A young female, very elegantly attired, who gave the name of Madame Louise le Grange, alias Mirabello, was next placed at the bar by Superintendent Pearce, charged with stealing four diamond rings, value £100, the property of Mr. John Metcalfe, a jeweller, in Pall-mall. The Superintendent said that, on receiving information of the robbery, he traced the prisoner to Dublin, where he apprehended her; and, as he had reason to suspect that she was concerned with the last prisoner, and others not in custody, in committing several robberies in town, it would be necessary to remand her, to give time for further inquiries.—Mr. Twyford said he would first hear sufficient of the case to enable him to form a judgment of it.—Mr. Metcalfe said, that about two o'clock on the afternoon of the 19th ult., the prisoner drove up to his door in a splendid carriage, and requested to be shown some diamond rings, which was done, but she did not approve of any of them, and stated that "the Count" wanted some of a very elegant description, being about to make a present to a lady who was to be married on the following day. Witness upon this requested her address, promising most faithfully to execute the order in the course of the day. She then wrote, "Countess Noailles, 39, Albany-street, Regent's-park," directing the rings to be sent there, which witness did, and the prisoner coming again at six o'clock, he told her the articles had by that time arrived at her house.—Mr. R. Nash said he had been requested by the prosecutor to take a quantity of rings to 39, Albany-street, and on arriving found that the countess had not returned home. The landlady requested he would step in till the countess arrived, and presently the prisoner drove up. Witness then proceeded to execute his commission, the prisoner frequently apologising for the absence of the count. She went up stairs, saying she wanted to speak to her friend, and on her return, having looked at the rings, one of which she pretended to be much pleased with, she requested to be allowed to show it to her friend up stairs. There was a heavy walking overhead during her absence, to make it appear that two persons were in the room, and after she brought back the ring, she replaced the case with the rest, and at length persuaded witness to allow her to take the four rings in question. Witness acceded, and after a short time had elapsed, the landlady entered, and asked if witness had done with the lady, and then he discovered that she had left the house. Witness never saw her till she was in custody. The prisoner declined saying anything, and she was remanded to the same day as the other prisoner.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—On Tuesday Mr. John Webb, a tradesman, carrying on an extensive business as a hosier and outfitter, No. 422, Strand, was brought before Mr. Maltby, charged with the following felonies: William Henry Adams, porter at Jones's auction-rooms, Leicester-street, said he knew Mr. Webb as a frequenter of the rooms in the character of buyer and seller. This morning the prisoner came into the rooms, and looked over some property for sale. Witness saw him go towards a glass case, lift up the cover, and take out a necklace. The prisoner then went towards a portfolio of prints, and soon afterwards he put the necklace into his pocket. Afterwards witness saw the prisoner go behind a screen and take an alabaster bird and some other articles, with which he walked out of the room. Witness followed; but as soon as he got into Leicester-square he lost sight of the prisoner, in consequence of his running off. Witness met the prisoner in St. Martin's-lane, and taxed him with having robbed the rooms. The prisoner merely replied it was a fine morning. Witness said he was sorry to see a person of his respectability in such a situation. The prisoner said he had only taken the things to look at them, and that they were always returnable. Witness having met a policeman, gave the prisoner into custody, and the prisoner was taken to the station-house. On searching him, a necklace, a marble bird, two China figures, a taper-stand, a bottle and glass, &c., worth together about 10s., were found. These articles are part of the property in the sale-room, for which Mr. Jones, the auctioneer, was responsible.—A communication was made to the bench, which caused a doubt as to the prisoner's sanity. A person, said to be in the employ of the prisoner, made some statements which, if correct, would afford ground for the belief that the prisoner at times laboured under an aberration of intellect. Before the prisoner was sent off in the van, a clerk from Messrs. Machin and Debenham's auction-rooms came to the Court, and said that the prisoner was a frequenter of the rooms, and occasionally exhibited so much eccentricity in bidding, that his offers were sometimes refused. That very morning he had been at the rooms to inspect the goods, and after he had left a person from his house had brought back two billiard balls which he had taken away. Mr. Webb came in soon shortly afterwards, and he was seen to pocket four more balls. He was charged with the act, and the balls were restored. Mr. Maltby said he could do nothing under such circumstances but recommend the forbearance of the prisoner to lay all these particulars before the Judge when the prisoner appeared to take his trial.—Upon a further examination on Wednesday, it was determined to give Mr. Webb into the custody of his friends, a decided case of insanity being made out.

WORSHIP-STREET.—On Tuesday, John Henry Morgan, who it was stated had formerly held the situation of Commissioner of Police at Glasgow, was finally examined before Mr. Broughton, the sitting magistrate, upon various charges of fraud and forgery. The prisoner already stood committed upon a charge of defrauding Mr. M'Carthy, of the Angel Tavern, City-road, of 3*l.* by means of a fictitious check upon the London and Westminster Bank, and upon another charge of obtaining 12*l.* from Mr. Waldron, of the Ten Bells, Spitalfields, to whom he uttered a fictitious check for that amount upon the same bank. The evidence was also completed for his committal upon a charge of uttering a forged bill of exchange for 131 10s., drawn by himself, and purporting to be the acceptance of Mr. Hart, landlord of the King's Arms, public-house, Bishopsgate-street. Upon the bill he had obtained 16*l.* in cash, and wine to the amount of 4*l.* 16*s.* from a Mr. Renwick, who stated himself to be a wine-merchant. Mr. Hart attended, and proved the forged acceptance, and upon this charge also the prisoner was committed. The prisoner was fully committed to Newgate for trial upon four distinct indictments.—Isaac Morgan, his father, was also committed to Newgate upon the charge taken at the first examination of uttering a forged check upon the London and Westminster Bank to Mrs. Foote, landlady of the Tippling Philosopher, Liquorpond-street.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

SUICIDE OF A SILK-BROKER.—An inquest was held before Mr. Higgs, on Saturday evening last, at the Halfway House, Kensington-road, on the body of Mr. George Colebatch, aged 53, of No. 1, Upper Gore, Kensington. Mr. Edgar Barker said he was a silk-broker, in partnership with Mr. Loder, of No. 140, Edgware-road. About six months ago Mr. Loder attended the deceased, then suffering from insanity, and under his treatment he recovered so far as to be able to attend to his business of silk-broker in the City. Witness attended him about four months ago. The deceased's mother called upon witness on the Friday morning preceding, and said that her son had attempted to destroy himself. Witness returned with her in the cab, and found the deceased insensible in bed, and bleeding from the wound of a pistol ball in the right ear. The pistol was lying by his side. Witness rendered him all the assistance he could, and then despatched a messenger to the private lunatic asylum of Mr. Finch, whose patient he had formerly been, for an attendant. He soon came, but in two hours excessive hemorrhage from the wound ensued, and he died a few minutes after it commenced. The pistol was small, and, as the charge was not heavy, the ball did not go through the head, but lodged in the centre of the brain. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

Last week an investigation took place before Mr. Higgs, touching the death of Mrs. Mary Goodman, aged 42 years, who was found drowned in the cistern of her house, No. 26, St. James's-street. From the evidence of several witnesses it appeared that the deceased had been housekeeper to Lady Jane Howard. That from the savings she took the house in question, and sublet it to several lodgers; and that she had confided a sum of money to a foreigner who rented the shop, that he might pay her landlord, but that he deceived her, and left the country with the money. Verdict, "Temporary aberration of mind."

A CHILD KILLED BY ITS SISTER. On Tuesday an inquisition was held before Mr. Wakley, on the body of Eliza Chadwick, aged three years, the daughter of a stonemason, residing at No. 25, Ashley-street, St. Pancras. It appeared, about two months since, Ann Chadwick, a little girl aged nine years, was playing with her sister, and in the act of swinging her round she let go of her hands, and she fell on the kerb-stone and fractured her skull. She expired on Tuesday last. Verdict, "Accidental death."

SINGULAR DELUSIONS OF A PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.—An inquest was held on Tuesday by Mr. Wakley, at the Middlesex Hospital, on the body of Mr. John Taylor, who resided at No. 60, William-street, Regent's-park, and who was a professor of music. It appeared from the evidence that the deceased had for some time past laboured under the delusion that everybody was his enemy, and that fifty or sixty persons were in the habit of meeting in adjoining rooms, endeavouring to injure him by slander. On Friday night the deceased was found upon his bed in an insensible state, and it was ascertained that he had purchased between eight and ten drachms of landanum at Mr. Burke's, in William-street, which he had swallowed. A letter, addressed to "the coroner," in the handwriting of the deceased, was discovered in his room, the following is a copy:—"My persecutors and slanderers have at length succeeded in urging me to commit this most horrid offence. My blood must fall on their heads. God is witness as to the facts I now state. I care not, for their words against Deity cannot fail. Verdict, "Deceased destroyed himself while labouring under delusions."

FATAL STEAM-BOAT ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday an inquest was held at the Angel public-house, Rotherhithe, before Mr. Carter, the coroner for Surrey, on the body of Captain Joseph Paul, the master of the Eden, of North Shields, who was drowned on Tuesday the 6th inst., by a boat in which he was coming in collision with the Waterman steamer, No. 2, while going down the river, off Globe-stairs, Rotherhithe. After hearing a good deal of somewhat conflicting evidence, the jury, after an hour's deliberation, returned a verdict of "Accidental death," with a deodand of 250*l.* on the steamer, and recommended that the laws which regulate the speed of steam-boats in the port of London, which have been much infringed upon, should be in future duly enforced.

On Wednesday Mr. Carter held an inquest at the Angel Tavern, Rotherhithe, respecting the death of Mary Ann Osborne, aged 29, who committed suicide on Wednesday week by throwing herself over Waterloo-bridge. It appeared that deceased was a married woman, but owing to the bad usage of her husband had left him for five years past, since which time she had led a very abandoned life. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

On Wednesday an inquest was held on the body of Henry Manby, a licensed victualler. It appeared from the evidence of the witnesses that the deceased was a widower, and had been so for the last seven years. His wife was interred at the Kensall-green Cemetery, which the deceased had since been much in the habit of frequenting for the purpose of visiting her tomb. The deceased's wife and daughter had both committed suicide. Verdict, "Temporary insanity."

DISCOVERY OF A SUPPOSED ROMAN VILLA.—Considerable excavations having been lately made in a field called Cheshunt Field, nearly opposite to Mr. Woodward's house, on the Maldon road from Colchester, and a quarter of a mile from the Leather Bottle, in Laxden parish, the foundations of a building, supposed to be a Roman villa, have been laid bare: the extent is of such magnitude, that it is questioned if the remains of any Roman villa in this kingdom are of equal extent. Numerous coins have been thrown up during the excavations: amongst these, a "Titus," 2d., brass—reverse, "Judea Capta;" "Helena," 3d., brass; and a "Cara sius," 3d., brass, in fine preservation, struck upon the treaty made by that usurper with Diocletianus and Maximianus. The fragments thrown up are mostly of Roman antiquity.—Ipswich Express.

THE HARVEST.—Reports of the harvest are satisfactory. In Essex and along the east coast the quantity of corn gathered in is said to be immense. In the central counties the harvest is finished, and the yield is in many pieces enormous. Reaping proceeds well in Scotland; and in Ireland the produce is large, and of good quality. The accounts from the corn countries of Europe and from America are similar. All tell of abundance.—Ipswich Express.

A proposition has been made and a public meeting convened to invite Prince Albert to a public entertainment on a splendid scale.

A report is very prevalent in this city, and also in the neighbouring town of Newcastle, that it is the intention of the Queen and Prince Albert to return home from Scotland by land; and it is even said that her Majesty has promised to honour Lady Ravensworth with a visit to Ravensworth Castle, en passant. Sir Robert Peel is expected to visit the Duke and Duchess of Northumberland, at Alnwick Castle, on his return from Edinburgh.—Durham Advertiser.

UNEMPLOYED WORKMEN IN NEWCASTLE.—A meeting of unemployed workmen was held at Newcastle on Friday, to consider the best means of carrying out the system of emigration to Buenos Ayres. The Chartists, however, broke in upon the harmony of the meeting; and a resolution was passed, that workmen would do better in England if they could only obtain their political rights.

DEATH OF AN ELEPHANT.—A fine animal, which has been great object of attraction to thousands during the summer, at the Bristol Zoological Gardens, died suddenly on Saturday week, at the gardens. It was found that the cause of death was a rupture of the heart. He was the property of Mr. Batty, the celebrated equestrian, and was valued at £300; he was about nine years old. —Bath Chronicle.

SUICIDE IN THE ST. KATHARINE'S DOCK.—On Wednesday morning, at the early hour of three o'clock, the lock men on duty at the St. Katharine's Dock entrance, heard a splash in the water, close to the bridge, and a woman was seen in the lock struggling. The drags were immediately procured and thrown in, but not before the woman had disappeared. In less than five minutes the woman was recovered and taken into the house on the pier-head, and while some were knocking at the adjoining public-houses for admittance, others were despatched for medical assistance; but no surgeons would leave their homes, nor could an entrance be obtained or any aid be procured at the houses of public entertainment. There were 22 feet of water in the lock when deceased threw herself in. The following description may lead to her identification:—Age about 20, dark hair, fair complexion, dressed in a light-coloured chintz cotton gown, white straw bonnet, with coloured ribbons, black leather and cloth boots, brown shawl, and red necklace.

ACCIDENT TO A CHYMICAL LECTURER.—On Friday week an accident occurred to Dr. Ryan, of the Polytechnic Institution, Regent-street, while experimenting on some explosive compounds. Experiments of a dangerous nature, or involving any risk of explosion, being strictly prohibited within the precincts of the Polytechnic Institution, the explosive mixture was prepared and experimented upon in front of Dr. Ryan's house, Thornhill-park, Islington, great care having been taken to remove all risk of injury to any person or property. The first portion of matter exploded in a satisfactory manner, but a second portion being submitted to the test, failed; upon this Dr. Ryan, imagining that some part of the process had gone wrong, approached the mixture for the purpose of putting the apparatus to rights, when the mixture exploded, and he was struck by a large weight upon the arm, which laid him prostrate, and he remained insensible for many minutes. Upon examination, it was found that Dr. Ryan's left arm was badly fractured above the wrist. No serious results are apprehended, and Dr. Ryan has since resumed his popular lectures at the Polytechnic Institution. It is a matter of congratulation that Dr. Ryan has escaped so well, as his loss would be a severe one to science in the metropolis.

ACCIDENT IN SHOOTING.—On Monday morning last Robert Atkins, a gardener in the employ of Mr. C. W. Dawson, of Edgware, came by his death in a most afflicting manner. Mr. Dawson, jun., accompanied by the deceased, was engaged in shooting rabbits in the vicinity of Edgware, and having laid his gun on the ground for a few minutes, was in the act of taking it up again when the contents were accidentally discharged, and unfortunately inflicted a dreadful wound high up on the inner part of the thigh of the deceased, who was standing at the time within a couple of yards of Mr. Dawson. Assistance was immediately procured, but all efforts to preserve life proved ineffectual, and the poor man expired in 20 hours after the infliction of the injury.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XIII.

SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, F.R.S.

Sir Frederick Pollock was born in London, in the year 1783 He was educated at St. Paul's School, whence he was removed in October 1803, to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained the distinction of being in the first class at every college examination; and in 1806, was senior wrangler and Smith's prizeman, the first and second wrangler being each bracketed alone. In the following year, he was elected a Fellow of the same college, and became Commissary of the University in 1824, an office which he held till 1835.

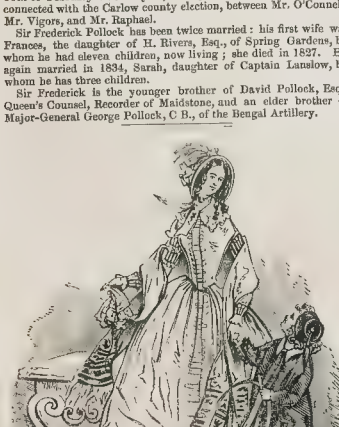
He was called to the bar in Michaelmas term, 1807, from which period he pursued his profession of the law with much ardour, and with distinguished success. Sir Frederick Pollock went the Northern circuit, and after twenty years of severe study and eminent practice, he was raised to the rank of King's counsel. In 1831, he was appointed a commissioner for inquiring into the practice and proceedings of the courts of common law.

He was returned for the borough of Huntingdon in 1831, and is now Attorney-General for the second time. In the latter end of 1834, when Sir Robert Peel was recalled from Italy, the office of Attorney-General devolved upon Sir Frederick Pollock; and the Premier of that day might have looked in vain for one whose character and qualifications fitted him better to fill that important and dignified position. His of course resigned with the Conservatives in 1835, his Attorney-generalship having been distinguished by no remarkable event; though, if an emergency of danger or of difficulty had presented itself, the bar of England possessed amongst its eminent members few upon whom more reliance could be placed. Sir Frederick Pollock had been previously Attorney-General for the county Palatine of Lancaster, to which he was appointed by Lord Holland, at that time Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Sir Frederick Pollock is not a frequent speaker in Parliament, but when he has addressed the House, his speeches have been characterised by superior ability. Those on the Russian Dutch Loan, Law Reform, and the Bankruptcy Bill, may be particularly instanced as displaying a thorough knowledge of the questions at issue, and that clear & d distinct perception of all the points they involved, which is so eminently conspicuous in his addresses to the jury in his capacity of an advocate. In 1836 he was the nominee of the Conservative party, on the select committee appointed on the 16th of February in that year, to inquire into the circumstances connected with the Carlow county election, between Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Vigors, and Mr. Raphael.

Sir Frederick Pollock has been twice married: his first wife was Frances, the daughter of H. Rivers, Esq., of Spring Gardens, by whom he had eleven children, now living; she died in 1827. He again married in 1834, Sarah, daughter of Captain Lanslow, by whom he has three children.

Sir Frederick is the younger brother of David Pollock, Esq., Queen's Counsel, Recorder of Maidstone, and an elder brother of Major-General George Pollock, C B., of the Bengal Artillery.



THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, Sept. 14, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—You must not be surprised at any extravagance in dress which the caprice of fashion may shortly dictate to her votaries. The French, who must have a sentiment and a pretension in all they do, have lately got into a notion of dressing themselves according to siècles.

Prepare your fair patronesses then for dresses à la Marie Antoinette, that is of the colours and shapes worn by that royal prisoner; and expect also, for we have them here already, fichûs and bonnets à la Charlotte Corday. The drawing I send you, the bonnet Antoinette, will surprise many a country milliner by the curious and novel fashion of its crown. The French ladies say that these bonnets have a grâce ravissante, but I think a little time will be requisite to reconcile so great an alteration and such a singular topknot to the more slowgoing and less historical taste of our English fashionables. Thus you see, Mr. Editor, there is to be a sentiment, and I hope a moral, in dress as well as in flowers, and the language of the eyes, so long supposed to be the interpreter of female intentions, is soon to be superseded by the language of the petticoat. The peculiar novelty of the dress in the figure before you is the curious style in which it is trimmed with tabs of the same stuff descending down the corsage, tapering slightly at the waist, and again spreading slightly in breadth to the bottom of the dress, which is of a dark sad coloured satin or satinette. The sleeves are compose l of three rows of tabs placed over each other and bound down at the ends; these three rows extend to the point of the elbow, whence the sleeve is plain to the wrist, where it terminates in another row of tabs. The ruffles and gloves of a primrose colour take off something of the darkness of the whole costume, which is further enlivened by a double collar of lace, and a light coloured cashmere scarf, richly embroidered in gay colours at the ends.

As fashions for children are somewhat rare in English homes, though here our young masters and misses have their own fashions, and dress according to siècles, I send you the latest mode for boys of fashion; a round coat, like your Chesterfields, Taglionis, or Yorks, I know not what you gentlemen call them, made of brown velvet, with a double row of buttons of silk or velvet in the same colour down the front, and braided all round at the bottom. The shirt sleeves have lace ruffles or edging; and this dress with white trousers strapped under boots of the pedicring oudinot, with a jaunty cap and tassel of purple velvet, will make a young gentleman a complete child of fashion, according to the latest Parisian authorities.

JULIE.

HER MAJESTY'S SLOOP MAGNET.—Accounts from Sweden state that the above vessel had been raised from the bottom of Malmo Roads, by means of a diving apparatus invented by Count de Wenkenheing. Her masts, sails, and rigging are stated to be in good condition. In the hold were discovered three skeletons, and the body of a man in nearly a perfect state of preservation. The Magnet (built of oak) mounting eighteen guns, foundered in the above roads in the year 1809, thus making the time of her lying under water a period of thirty-three years.

CARRIER PIGEON.—A few days since a fine pigeon flew into a room at Mr. Stevens's house, Bond-street, Brighton. Stevens secured the bird, and upon examination found some printing in the Dutch language, under the wings; that mode having been adopted instead of tying any paper to the bird, leaving it unencumbered. The storm caused the bird to lose its way. The pigeon is still in the possession of Mr. Stevens.

We have received, with feelings of regret, intelligence of the death of HEBIN, the intrepid sailor of Boulogne, who it will be remembered, so nobly risked his life in attempting to save the unfortunate female convicts shipwrecked in the Amphitrite. The Progrès du pas de Calais states that it was in attempting to bring to perfection an idea that he he had formed for saving the lives of his fellow-creatures that this ornament to the marine of France met with his untimely end.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—At Mark Lane, on Monday, an unusually small quantity of English wheat was brought forward; the trade, in consequence, was very firm, and the prices rose from 2s to 4s per quarter, and the whole of the parcels were disposed of. Although the supply of foreign was large, that article was in fair demand, at an enhancement of 1s. to 2s. per quarter. Since the above day the inquiry has ruled active, and, in some few instances, the rates have again risen 1s. per quarter. THE INCOME TAX.

Now that the manufacturing districts are in that half-lull which is preliminary to a fixed calm; now that the Boundary Question is settled and there are no more rumours of wars between Brother Jonathan and John Bull; now that the French have disposed of their regency question and hushed their noisy deputies for at least one interval of repose; now that corn is considerably imported and cattle coming over in droves to cheapen butcher's-meat and bread; now that Ireland is not "much fermented," and Scotland recovering from the excitement of the Royal Tour; now that the Queen herself is back among her halls and towers of Windsor "to woo the whispering of her native gales;" now, moreover, that Doncaster is past and Parliament dumb; now when, to borrow from the emphatic vocabulary of John Reeve, "there's nothing stirring but stagnation,"—people naturally begin to look out for a grievance, and such, unfortunately, is the present political constitution of our society, that our enterprising Prime Minister has not left them far to look. He has got one staring and intrusive oppression strong before them, plain and palpable as the handwriting on the wall, frowning down upon them like the head of Medusa, "all snakes and horrors," peering with ominous eyes into every corner of their castle, ferreting its dangerous glances among their secrets and into their pockets, coffers, and banks; in a word, shaking its gory locks before the startled vision of the domestic world, and assuming all hideous forms that may awaken in the public dread, repugnance, and disgust. And what is this "monstrum horrendum informe"—this national bugbear that pinches all men and pleases none? What, alas! but the crushing, merciless, hopeless, extorting INCOME TAX; and, what is worse, its operation is beginning, as we have said, just in the heart of a sort of social repose, when men's minds are not diverted by ten thousand conflicting considerations, but when they can afford to concentrate all their political abhorrence upon the first germs of the working of that particular measure of iniquity, which is most likely with the greatest amount of justice to call it forth.

Honestly we begin to see that the consequences of this odious tax will be much more dangerously felt than was at first contemplated: we doubt even if they may not engender a very serious feeling of general discontent, which, although not of so violent a nature as to disturb the peace and order of society, will yet be of that fretful and impatient kind which unsettles confidence, ruffles trade, and produces unnatural and unwholesome excitement every way detrimental to the happiness of the community.

Writers and contemporaries of nearly all shades of opinion are beginning to coincide in their sense of the evils of the tax, which within the last few days has undergone more general reprobation from the press than it experienced even in the first blush of its enormity; while the early steps that have been taken towards its collection have added greatly to the general disposition to regard it as a sad and galling practical calamity. Globe, Post, Examiner, and Spectator—the four cardinal points of Whiggism, Toryism, Radicalism, and neutrality—have all poured "words of fire" or "floods of gall" upon this most ungentle inquisition. The Globe could "go on multiplying instances of annoyance and oppression," and does not wonder that organs of public opinion, differing upon almost every other question of national policy, should unite in condemning this. The Post tells of the intricacies of its operation, that "many who are scarcely able to provide a dinner for their families have been obliged to call in the aid of an attorney, and to pay six-and-eightpence, or eleven shillings, according to the trouble given for filling up what they never ought to have been required to fill up at all." The Examiner confirms this position more strongly still. It declares "that every week brings fresh disclosures of grievance and vexation, varying in the degree of apparent wilfulness with which they are inflicted—instances of intolerable unfairness in the measure itself, and of deception on the part of those who, before it became law, gave the most positive assurances that the stern severity should be administered with the utmost possible tenderness that a nice discrimination, and a care for every case of delicacy and difficulty, might imply."

All this the Spectator crowns with a sort of intimation that the tyrannizing spirit of the tax has gone far to create a reaction of political feeling in the minds even of the public supporters of the ministry, and that "the middle class seems to fret itself back into Whiggery with disgust."

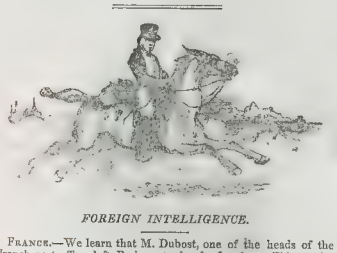
Now here is combination of testimony which incredulity itself would be hardly bold enough to resist, but we fear that the injury already commenced to be worked among us has put all doubt out of the question, and people are only guided in their just antipathies and complainings by what they too practically know.

We do not hesitate to declare that in all this nefarious matter the blame fairly attributable to Government should be exactly proportioned to the hardship which the community has to endure. Except upon the doctrine of necessity—and that is a doctrine which is nearly always wicked, profligate, and immoral, because it is presumed to recognise an abandonment of principle to expediency—the tax could not have been proposed; but once listened to under the infatuation of the legislature, and carried by the ministerial majorities with the desperation of men who, in the business of governing, were leading a forlorn hope, it then became a paramount act of justice, as it was a promised mercy, that the punishment which it was so soon to inflict upon the people should at least be administered in the mildest shape; whereas, it has assumed Asmodean forms of oppression and Protean changes of tyranny, and divided the means and appliances of the new torture into as many ramifications as the most perplexing and complicated machinery could work. This want of humanity and consideration on the part of the officials is as unfaithful as it is unfair. It is quite enough (and a great deal too much) to have a Briareus monster plunging his hands into our pockets at every move and turn, but it is more than patience can endure that, while he is rudely drawing out our money, he shall also wantonly tear our flesh.

Then the system of exposure. Oh, this is, indeed, the worst curse of this most exasperating tax. There is no seal of genuine secrecy upon any document in its operation that has been yet devised, because the commissioners refer back to assessors all the statements that have been privately forwarded into their hands. No—the inquisition is without exemption—private affairs must be divulged—private feelings outraged—malicious curiosity gratified—poor shrinking pride, be it never so honest, humbled and put to the blush—deceit, and the meanness of petty trickery, encouraged in evasion—and much appalling immorality spread with the abandonment of truth. Many a gentleman will sicken over the forms he has to bear with; and many a tradesman will become either ruined or a rogue. The sources of confidence will, meanwhile, in a thousand channels be dried up, patience will be exhausted, and a nervous irritability engendered, to destroy the comfort of aggrieved society—men's affairs will be in each other's mouths, with the mutterings of sympathy, the glance of envy, or the sneer of contempt—nobody will feel sure that his neighbour does not see into the recesses of his poverty, if his purse be empty of his treasure, if it be full—the tax-gatherers may blab through a flimsy oath as much mischief as may destroy the respectability which honest and industrious families have maintained for years; in a word, the force of the extortion drives it full into the hearts of the people, and probes them with cruel cankering and bleeding wounds.

The details we have already witnessed have convinced us that this is only too fatal a truth; and the Income Tax, of which worse terrors are to come, is a law of which thinking men of all classes should endeavour to procure, if not an immediate, yet the earliest repeal. Whenever the Legislature assembles, they should petition against it, and in the interim treasure up the thousand cases of individual hardship that will be experienced, to marshal them as so many cruel facts to array against the system, and to bring it under the withering influence of a general and indignant execration. The Income Tax will be levied with more wailing, paid with less cheerfulness, and flooded with more tears than any other impost that ever doled out anguish to a people in a time of public calamity—or elicited in its intensity upon a government the bitterness and hatred of a nation's heart.



FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

France.—We learn that M. Dubost, one of the heads of the French post-office, left Paris yesterday for London. This gentleman is charged by the Government to negotiate a new post-office treaty, on a much larger and more liberal basis than the existing one. The arrangements contemplated in M. Dubost's mission extend also, we understand, to the more rapid transmission of the Indian mail from Marseilles, and to the putting an end to the vexatious delays and difficulties which the couriers of the London press have hitherto experienced in carrying their despatches through France.—Galignani of Saturday.

The Augsburgh Gazette contains a letter from the banks of the Oder, of the 26th ult., which says:—"The harvest has been excellent throughout Germany, notwithstanding the dryness of the season, and no increase in price can be anticipated, a considerable exportation of corn not even being able to produce any very marked alteration. All the accounts which arrive from France are unanimous in stating the same thing relative to the harvest in that country. The Spanish Peninsula has but little effect in general on the corn markets of Europe, and in this respect it may be placed in the same category as Scandinavia. The accounts of the harvest in Italy are equally favourable, so that throughout the continent the usual consumption appears guaranteed, and, in those countries which export corn, there will be found certain surplus sufficient for all the demands that may arise elsewhere. In consequence of this abundance speculators are already somewhat at fault, and considerable losses may be expected."

The Presse, Count Molé's paper, continues on Monday its war upon England and the right of search. The treaty with America, it repeats, takes from the British Government all pretext for insisting even on the execution of the treaties of 1833 by France.

A smart quarrel rages about the gum trade, which, on all hands, is admitted to be expiring, and the colony of Senegal indebted little short of a million sterling. This is the trade which England is accused of seeking to disturb by the right of search.

Spain.—Madrid.—The Minister of Finance has dismissed three officers of his department, as unworthy of public confidence—namely, M. Bravo, Accountant-General; M. Magrath, Director-General of the United Rents; and the Administrator of the Customs of Seville. M. Magrath has been replaced by M. Thomas Rimenes, Intendant of Cadiz.

The Ministry, it appears, have succeeded in raising some funds—a circumstance the more fortunate, as the troops were beginning to murmur, and the colonel of one of the regiments of the Madrid garrison had threatened to resign his commission if his men were not paid.

It is the intention of the Cabinet to present the Cotton Bill at an early stage of the session. It will be supported by a certain number of deputies, who are strenuous advocates of free trade; but it will have to encounter the opposition of the coalition, which is determined to resist the ministry on every question, and of the deputies from Catalonia and the Balearic Islands.

M. Collantes, the judge who was suspended for ordering, on his own private authority, the liberation of a number of Republican prisoners, has been elected chief of the 4th battalion of National Guards of Barcelona.

Letters from Stutgard, received to-day, assert the Congress of the Zoolverein has determined on not raising the duties on iron at least. The most clamorous demands for prohibition and high duty were raised by the cotton-spinners, woollen-manufacturers, and iron-founders. All demanded protecting or prohibitive duties, not on complete manufactures, but on the materials of manufactures. Letters mention that the Congress have resisted these demands, on the interest of the manufacturers themselves. The Germans will have thus avoided imitating M. Guizot's prohibitions.

The Constitutionnel has the following:—"M. Olozaga, the Spanish Ambassador to France, has left Madrid for Brussels, on a mission of importance to the Belgian Government. From Brussels he is to go into Holland, to negotiate a treaty of commerce. It is added, that the Spanish Government, desirous of restoring its navy, has authorised him to propose an exchange of a certain number of Dutch ships for an adequate quantity of timber from the forests of Spain."

In consequence of the disorders which took place at Geneva on the 8th inst., petitions were presented to the Council of State, requiring the execution of the laws relating to foreigners resident in the canton, and especially demanding the expulsion of M. Lemot, editor of the Journal de Geneve. Letter of the 11th, in the Courrier de Lyon, states, that the Council has ordered M. Lemot to leave the canton. This, it was feared, was likely to cause another excitement, as the partisans of M. Lemot were unwilling to suffer him to depart.

Hanover, Sept. 8.—The statement given in the papers, as communicated from Magdeburg, that the King has contracted a marriage with the widow of the Chief President Von Beulertz, is unfounded. The King has lately several times honoured with a visit this lady, who, notwithstanding her advanced age, retains her beauty and graceful manners. The journals, too, have spoken of the elevation of a lady to the rank of Countess of Dieplitz, and there was a general report here, too, of an intended marriage of the King with this lady, but to this time, at least, no such marriage has taken place.

September 13.—His Royal Highness the Crown Prince returned to this city yesterday evening in good health. From Dusseldorf we learn that his Majesty continues to get much better, so that he can sit up for several hours during the day. The King will not, however, be able to return for some time; but let us hope that he may be home by the end of the month, when illustrious visitors are expected here. It is reported that the King and Queen of Prussia are coming. The Journal de St. Petersburg contains a programme of the festivities on occasion of the baptism of the young Princess Alexandra, daughter of the Crown Prince. The day of the ceremony, which will be performed in the chapel of the palace a Zast Kojezelo, is not yet fixed.—Hamburg papers, Sept. 16.

Austria.—Advices from Vienna of the 12th announce the complete success of the Servian revolution. Chekib Effendi, as well as the Pasha of Belgrade, overtly favoured the emigrant party, which had placed itself at the head of the movement. Prince Michael had been abandoned by the entire of his troops, and, not considering himself in safety at Belgrade, had repaired to Semlin, and invoked the protection and aid of Austria. The Consuls of Great Britan and France had accompanied the young Prince in his flight.

Russia.—A scientific expedition, under the direction of the Academy of Sciences of St. Petersburg, is about to proceed immediately to Siberia, to explore the vast country between the rivers Pjasada and Chatanga, extending to the Icy Sea.

Denmark.—Christiania, September 9.—The motion relative to the permission for Jews to reside in Norway has been rejected by the Storthing. It is true that 51 members voted for it, and only 41 against it, but as it is a question involving a change in the Constitution, which requires two-thirds of the votes, it was of course lost.—Hamburg papers, September 16.

Greece.—Patras, August 27.—The royal ordonnance, establishing the new Custom-house regulations, came into operation a few weeks since. Its provisions are so excessively absurd, so vexatious, and so utterly impracticable, as to have caused a general remonstrance, not only on the part of the Greeks, but of the foreign consular authorities. Still King Otho persists in endeavouring to carry it into effect, although cases are continually arising, showing the impossibility of the Custom-house authorities enforcing some of its provisions.

M. Anthimos, the former Greek Patriarch in Constantinople, died at Smyrna on the 27th ult., in the 96th year of his age.

Turkey.—Constantinople, August 31.—Izzet Mehemet Pacha, whose removal from office has been so long foreseen and so often foretold, has at length fallen in reality. The Tevojihat of announcing his dismissal, and the appointment in his place Rauf Pacha, now Grand Vizier for the third time in his life, was read at the Porte at an early hour. About the same time Sir Stratford Canning was engaged in audience with the Sultan, the ostensible object of which was to convey an autograph letter of thanks from her Majesty for the presents lately forwarded to her from Constantinople. Rauf Pacha, who was President of the Supreme Council, has been replaced in that post by Halil Pacha, the Sultan's brother-in-law; he is considered able and clever, but at the same time unprincipled and corrupt, but he does not openly set his face against reform, like Izzet Pacha; he is, on the contrary, perhaps, too friendly to innovation. Rauf, the Grand Vizier, is both with respect to his character and views, a perfect cipher; and he has evidently been put in his present post ad interim, till a more efficient minister be chosen to occupy it. There has been some more skirmishing on the frontier, between the Turks and the Persians. A corps, composed of about 700 of the latter, made an inroad into the Turkish territory in the neighbourhood of Bayazid, and they were met, it is stated in the letters from Erzeroum, by a body of 200 Turks, who killed fifty of them and put the rest to flight.

On the 5th inst. the town of Pisa was thrown into general consternation by the following dreadful accident:—While upwards of 200 persons were assembled at an amphitheatre, near one of the gates of the town, engaged in, and spectators of, the game of ball, a wall suddenly sunk under them, brought down other parts of the building, and buried them in its ruins. Immediate exertions were made, and the dead body of a child was first taken out. Fifty-six persons were found severely injured, the lives of several being despaired of. The rest escaped, some with slight bruises, the others unhurt. Many of the sufferers belong to the first families of Pisa.

A letter from Algiers, September 10, states that, in consequence of the revolt of the tribe of the Beni Menasser against the French authority, an expedition was to be sent against them immediately. The troops for this purpose were to assemble at Cherchell, and General de Bar was to have the chief command. They were to set out on the 14th, and after having reduced the Beni Menasser, were to join the troops under the command of General Changarnier, who had just set out from Bildah, at the head of a division of troops, to reduce the aghalick of Braz, situated on the north-west of the insurgent tribe. This division is composed of 300 chasseurs and zouaves, under the command of Colonel Cavaignac, the 26th Regiment of the line, a train of artillery, a body of engineers, a body of cavalry and gendarmerie, and a considerable staff, in all 2000. They carry with them provisions for six days, besides a considerable number of cattle. General Bugeaud was expected back from Oran, where he had gone to arrange matters for the autumnal campaign. The health of the troops is described as excellent.—Galignani's Messenger.

Pilgrimage to Mecca.—The "pious embassy" departed for the holy cities of Mecca and Medina the 23rd ult., with the usual solemnity, under the direction of Moussa Aga, after receiving from the Sultan the sacred carpet and the other presents destined for the tomb of the prophet. The cortège, composed of a large number of pilgrims of all classes, set out, preceded by the bands of several regiments of the guards. The first wife of Sultan Mahmoud, the mother of the wife of Said Pacha, and of the unmarried sister of the reigning Sultan, accompanied the caravan. This is the first time a Sultana ever proceeded on a pilgrimage to Mecca.—The Patriot.

Enterprising Orientals.—Some days ago, two young Turks, accompanied by an interpreter, arrived in Paris, and took up their abode at the Hotel du Globe, giving their names Hartinoour and Barrhour. They appeared to be rich, and spent money liberally, but still there were certain inexplicable peculiarities in their mode of life. They never went out till the evening set in, nor did they present themselves at the Ottoman Embassy. The mystery, however, was soon cleared up. In a few days, officers of police came, and took both the Turkish youths into custody. This was in consequence of a despatch from the French Ambassador at Constantinople, sent up by telegraph from Marseilles, announcing that the sons of two opulent merchants at Constantinople had decamped with large sums of money taken from the strong boxes of their respective fathers. In possession of these fine youths were found 50,000 francs in gold, and about 400,000 francs in negotiable bills upon Messrs. Ladbite and Co., and other Paris bankers. All this they voluntarily gave up, and then demanded to be taken to the Ottoman Ambassador, who claimed them under the law of nations, and who will, no doubt, take care to have them sent back to their parents.

Affghanistan.—[From the John o' Groat Journal.]—We have much pleasure in submitting to our readers, the following extract of a letter from Captain Vardon, of the Madras Engineers, which has been kindly furnished us by a friend, the uncle of Capt. Vardon, and cousin of the lady alluded to, and can, therefore, unhesitatingly vouch for its authenticity:—"Touching the Affghanistan news, which of course you, in common with most other Europeans, must be deeply interested in, Stafford has just had a letter from a lady friend, in which she gives an interesting extract from one of Lady Sale's letters. She says that Akhbar Khan treats the ladies very kindly, and entertains a much more exalted idea of the sex than formerly. He says he now understands why Europeans have but one wife. Lady Sale's heroic conduct must have impressed him with surprise, and taught him to respect the female character as he never did before. Lady Sale's letter commenced by acknowledging a parcel of clothes sent them by the officers at Jellalabad the beginning of February; and until that arrived they had not changed their linen since the 6th of January—the fatal day of the retreat from Cabul. Lady Sale, her widowed daughter, Mrs. Sturt (expecting her confinement every day), Lieutenant Mein, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace, of the artillery; Mrs. Trevor and seven children, and a European servant, are shut up in one room, at the Fort of Lughman; and, in a second apartment, Lady M'Naghten, with as many others, if not more. They have neither tables nor chairs, but each lady had succeeded in getting a little stool. Lady Sale was eating out of the same plate as her daughter and Lieutenant Mein: and, until General Sale sent a tumbler, her only drinking cup was a tin box. Poor Lieut. Mein had been dreadfully bitten, and unable to stand for some weeks: the servants were useless, and the ladies were obliged to cook. Akhbar supplies them with rice, ghee, attar, and three sheep are divided among the whole of the prisoners daily. She describes Akhbar Khan as a fine handsome man. He murdered Sir William M'Naghten with his own hand, and put out his own brother's eyes. Lady Sale says, 'there is a mulberry tree in the square, and we watch its leaves unfolding daily, for it will make a nice shade to our windows. The people who go to the hills to cut wood for us bring in bunches of myrtle, which we prize, and keep in water with bunches of narcissus, which the Affghans sometimes bring in; and once I had a spray of peach-blossoms; these are our luxuries. Our amusements are watching a swallow building its nest in our room.' The only books they have are a Bible and Prayer-book, which they were happy enough to pick up on the road from Cabul. Lady Sale says that out of these Lieutenant Mein reads prayers to them daily. Mrs. Lumsden was shot dead trying to escape from Ghuznee, disguised in officer's uniform; her husband at the same time was cut to pieces. Akhbar sent Captain Colin M'Kenzie, who is a prisoner, on his parole to Jellalabad, to treat for the ransom of the prisoners. It was expected a much worse fate for the women than death; but it appears there exists, even in the midst of their savage laws, one of rude chivalry that will guard the women from insult. The truth on that point, of course, will never be ascertained exactly. Poor Mrs. Jacobs, who, you remember, going up one of the passes was confined in the Palkie, has lost her husband at Candallee, and is going home overland. She sent the three other children away to play at some distance with the bearers; when they had returned she was sitting by the road-side dressing her new-born babe. She was a pretty, delicate, lady-like young woman. Such are the vicissitudes of an Indian life—sometimes living in splen-dour, sometimes like outcasts and beggars. There are subscriptions all over India for the Afghan sufferers. Lady M'Naghten was a great jewel fancier; and having a large private fortune, she indulged her propensity. Every one Akhbar made her give up, sets of splendid diamonds, &c. I cannot understand how the prisoners will ever be released. General Sale offered 30,000 rupees for his wife and daughter, and was refused. Altogether it is a sad business."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Survey of Torres Straits.—Her Majesty's ship Bramble arrived at the Cape on the 24th of June, and was to commence the survey of the Torres Straits immediately.

Sir Arthur Clifton has been removed to the 1st Dragoons, and replaced in the Colonelcy of the 11th Hussars by Lord Greenock. —U. S. Gazette.

Death of the Father of the Indian Army.—General Henry Marley died on the 14th June, at the age of 99. He entered the service in 1771, and died near Barrackpore.

Heroic Conduct of a British Soldier.—The colours of the 44th Regiment were preserved to the very last extremity, and until the battalion was reduced to twelve men, worn out and exhausted, after six days' constant fighting with a vastly superior force, in the midst of frost and snow. Lieutenant Souter was then made prisoner with the Queen's colour, but the man who had the regimental colours wrapped round his body surrendered the precious charge to the ferocious enemy only with his life, for he was butchered on the spot. He was colour-sergeant, and an Irishman. His name was Carey.

Military Savings' Banks.—By an Act which was passed on the 30th July last, it is declared "that it is expedient to establish savings' banks in the several regiments of cavalry and infantry in her Majesty's service, for the custody and increase of small savings belonging to her non-commissioned officers and soldiers serving therein." The deposits may be applied to the public service instead of investing the money in public securities, and payments made out of the grants of Parliament for the army. The depositors to be paid interest at the rate of £3 16s. 0½d. for every £100. Rules are to be made by the Secretary at War, with the concurrence of the Commander-in-Chief and Commissioners of the Treasury. By the 4th section, trustees and others are not personally liable, except in cases of wilful neglect or default. The accounts are yearly to be laid before Parliament. Under this act the savings' banks to be established in the army are not to be considered as within the meaning of the other savings' banks. The banks are to extend to foreign stations (excepting the territorial possessions of the East India Company).

In connexion with new military arrangements for the northern districts, Preston is to become the future northern depôt of a large body of troops. There have hitherto been no barracks in the town, and the troops now here, consisting of 130 Rifles, are quartered in temporary barracks, in a factory in Water-street, in addition to another detachment who are doing duty on the turrets of the gaol. A site of twenty-five and a half acres on Fulwood Moor, and in the centre of the former race course, has been secured by Government for the erection of barracks capable of containing 2000 troops. An active correspondence has lately been carried on with the Board of Ordnance, and it is daily expected that contracts for estimates will be advertised. The spot has been selected by Captain Burrows, Barrack Master at Blackburn, and Captain Rutherford, Engineer to the Board of Ordnance at Manchester, and many plans and estimates have been sent up to London for the approval of the Government. The circumstances which have dictated this choice over the place proposed for the erection of barracks at Blackburn, in order to make that the northern depôt for troops, appear to be the facility of their transport by railroad to the south, and to Ireland and Scotland through the new port of Fleetwood. The inhabitants of Preston and Blackburn have both taken up the matter very warmly, and in the latter town a site of land was offered gratuitously for the erection of barracks. The matter has, however, been finally set at rest by Government having acknowledged the superior advantages of this town. This decision was come to chiefly from the opinion of the Duke of Wellington, who gave his approbation to Preston, in preference to any other place which had been pointed out in the northern district.

Movements and Reliefs.—1st battalion 45th, to relieve 5th Foot, ordered home. Reserve battalion 45th to Gibraltar, to replace 48th, ordered to Jamaica, to replace 82nd, ordered to Nova Scotia, to relieve 64th, ordered home. Reserve battalion 42nd, to Malta, to replace 19th, ordered to Corfu, to replace 77th, ordered to West Indies, to replace 81st, ordered to Canada, to relieve 7th, ordered home. Reserve battalion 97th, to Corfu, to replace the 1st battalion 42nd, ordered to Malta to join the reserve battalion. First battalion Rifle Brigade, ordered from Malta to Cork, as an addition to the force. Reserve battalion 12th, to the Mauritius, to relieve 87th, ordered home. The Service Companies of the 3th, 64th, 70th, and 87th Regiments to return home.

Regiments Stationed in Canada. 1st Dragoon Guards; 7th Hussars; 2nd batt. Gren. Guards; 2nd batt. Coldstream Guards; 2nd batt. 1st Foot: 14th, 23rd, 43rd, 56th, 67th, 68th, 70th, 71st, 74th, 83rd, 85th, 89th, 93rd, and the Royal Canadian Rifle Regiment.

New Barracks.—The Ordnance department has issued bills, stating that the board is ready to receive tenders for the building of barracks in Ashton and Bury. They will be on a very extensive scale. Those who have seen the specifications assert that the outlay at each place will be £9000 and upwards.

Experiments in the Marshes at Woolwich.—On Friday week Major-General Drummond, C.B., Director-General of Royal Artillery; Colonel Constable, Colonel Paterson, Colonel Lacy, Lieutenant-Colonel Dundas, R.A., Lieutenant-Colonel Chatham, Lieutenant-Colonel Dawes, Major Hamilton, K.H.; Major Sandilands, and Captain Palliser, of the Royal Artillery; and Colonel Sir George Hoste, C.B., of the Royal Engineers, assembled in the Marshes, to witness experiments with concussion shells, invented by Captain Norton; and a massive block of wood, about five feet long, and two feet six inches broad, formed of two pieces, about fifteen inches square, joined together by the cement noticed on a former occasion, and the invention of Mr. Jeffrey. There were nineteen shells fired, on Captain Norton's principle, nine of them being eight inches in diameter, fired from a 63 pounder gun, at four hundred yards range, and were constructed with leaden fuses, ten of these shells answered remarkably well, but four did not burst. The other ten shells (32-pounders) were constructed with wooden fuses, and nine out of that number burst on striking the bulkhead. The other did not burst.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

Improvement of Cronburgh Light.—During the necessary arrangements for the improvement of the light of Cronburgh Castle in the course of this month, the old light in the tower will be removed, and a temporary fixed light in the outer gallery will appear at the same elevation.

The White Sea.—A lighthouse has been established on the northern extreme of Gaidginsk Island, in the entrance of the Bay of Orega, in latitude 62 12 17 N., and longitude 36 57 30 E. It will show a fixed light 148 feet above the level of the sea, and visible from all parts of the horizon distant 17 miles.

Morshovsk Light. A lighthouse has been established at the N.W. extreme of Morshovsk Island, in the entrance of the Bay of Mezen, in latitude 66 15 40 N. and longitude 42 29 E. It will show a fixed light 162 feet above the sea, visible at the distance of 18 miles from N.N.W. ¾ W. (westward) to S.W.

Orlovsk Light.—A lighthouse has been established at Cape Orlov, on the coast of Lapland, in latitude 67 11 30 N., and longitude 41 22 15 E. It will show a fixed light 232 feet above the sea, visible from N. by W. ½ W. (round by E.) to S., at the distance of 20 miles. The above will be lighted the 13th of this month.

Burning of a Vessel at Sea.—Among the numerous communications received on Tuesday at Lloyd's, was the subjoined, respecting the destruction of a vessel by fire. "Havre, Sept. 8.—Captain Garton, master of the ship Prospérité, which arrived at this port yesterday from Marseilles, reports that on Monday last, the 23rd of last month, when in lat. 39 7, long. 12 57 west, he observed at a distance of some ten or twelve miles, a great mass of smoke, he immediately bore down towards it, for the purpose of ascertaining the cause, when it proved to be a vessel on fire. It appeared to be an English schooner, about 200 tons burthen, and laden with cork. The masts were consumed, and had fallen overboard, and she was burning rapidly to the water's edge. He remained near the unfortunate vessel for a considerable time, and sent several of the crew up aloft, to discover, if possible, the ship's boat, and those belonging to her, but none could be seen. At seven o'clock in the evening he proceeded on his voyage; the ship was still burning, and the flames were distinctly seen for hours afterwards. Her name could not be ascertained, in consequence of the dense smoke with which she was surrounded.

The Shipping Interest.—We hear loud complaints of depression which this interest, in common with the other great interests connected with trade, is now suffering. Freights from foreign ports, besides being scarce, are lower than they have ever been known before; while at home freights are not only low, but cargoes with difficulty made up. So scarce indeed is employment for shipping, even at rates which will scarcely pay freight and charges, that the number of ships laid up in Liverpool alone, is beyond all past experience. In most of the docks there are unemployed vessels, and vessels on sale; but the Brunswick dock, large as it is, has, if not two-thirds, certainly more than half, its space occupied by ships of large tonnage, with brooms (the sign of being on sale) at their mast-heads. The west side is wholly filled with tiers of vessels on sale, and on the adjoining quay all trade has ceased. We have heard it mentioned that one firm alone has from 10,000 to 12,000 tons of shipping thus laid up.—Liverpool Albion.

Extraordinary Preservation of the Priscilla Timber Ship.—On Saturday last the above vessel was towed up to Deptford from the Downs, having made her passage across the Atlantic under circumstances of peculiar difficulty. She has been engaged in the timber trade for some time past. It appears that, in shipping her last freight at Quebec, great want of caution must have existed, for during the voyage, while under sail on the larboard tack, her cargo shifted, and threw the vessel completely on her beam-ends. The weather was fortunately calm, or the ship must inevitably have been lost. An accident of this nature, with a similar result, is of rare occurrence—the loss of timber ships under similar circumstances is notorious, and calls for legislative interference as to the mode of loading vessels in the colonies.

Mutiny on Board the Kilmaurs of Glasgow.—Captain Silver, of the American ship Sumatra, of Salem, writes home from Batavia as follows:—"On the 21st of April, Java Head bearing S. by W. ½ W. 25 miles distant, I saw under our lee a sail that appeared to be in distress. I immediately bore down for her, and at 7 a. m. brought to, under the lee of the British barque Kilmaurs of Glasgow; her topsails were lowered, courses partly hauled up, thrashing and badly split, and, to my great astonishment, saw no one upon deck but a female, who appeared almost frantic with despair—we immediately got out our boat, went alongside, and brought her on board the Sumatra. She was a young lady, eighteen years of age, the wife of Captain Smith of the barque; she stated that the Kilmaurs left Batavia two months previous with a cargo of sugar for Europe: that soon after leaving, the crew mutinied and came near killing the captain (her husband) and herself; but the captain finally succeeded in securing them below in different parts of the ship, and endeavoured, with only two boys to assist him, to work the ship back to Batavia, and on the morning previous to my meeting them she missed her husband and the two boys. She thought that a part of the crew in the night had freed themselves, and thrown the captain and boys overboard, and taken the boat and pulled for the land. Her feelings can be better imagined than described. After searching the ship for her husband, and being convinced that he could not be on board, she took her stand at the 'rail,' firmly resolved, should the mutineers break loose, to commit herself to the sea, rather than fall into their merciless hands. In twenty minutes after she got on board the Sumatra, and while I was considering the practicability of getting the ship into port, I perceived, by the aid of my glass, the men crawling from the hatches and liberating each other; they then ran aft, and put her 'helm hard up, and her head sails filled.' I immediately filed away the Sumatra, and gathering headway very fast, enabled us to avoid them, or otherwise they might have given us much trouble, as there was a high sea on at the time—they tacked several times after us—the next morning she was fifteen miles to leeward. Thus ended a most unpleasant took care of the lady, as there is no English consul here."—Glasgow Argus.

The Shearwater, Government steam-vessel, which left Granton just shortly after the Trident, met with an accident during her passage, which was of a very serious and dangerous character. Shortly after three o'clock on Friday morning, when between Flamborough Head and Shields, she came into collision with a large collier. The whole of her figure-head, a great portion of the cutwater, and part of the bowsprit were completely knocked away. Her paddle-box on the larboard side was also knocked in. The collier was so much damaged that it was not expected she would be enabled to reach Shields in safety. The Shearwater, instead of proceeding to Woolwich, was obliged to put in at Harwich, where the vessel arrived between eleven and twelve o'clock on Saturday morning. Amongst the members of the Royal Household who were on board were the Earl of Liverpool and the Earl of Hardwicke.

CHINESE COIN.

Lord Jocelyn remarks, "When the dollar first comes into the possession of a Chinese, he gives it a stamp, or chop, thus extracting a small portion of the metal; receiving the same usage from each hand it passes through, it is reduced from its coinage value to that of merely its weight. The possessor of this chipped money, finding the bulk inconvenient, melts it down into the form of sycee silver, a species more easy to stow than if it was in the former coin, in which 1000 dollars might not exceed the value of 200. The sycee silver is more valuable than any other, on account of its containing portions of gold dust. It is generally in the form of a canoe, with a stamp in the centre."

A LAWYER'S DEFENCE.

He makes law expensive, not from a paltry desire to enrich his own coffers, but from a magnanimous and patriotic wish to prevent the poor man from indulging in hatred and uncharitableness, and to deter the rich, by a forcible appeal to their pockets, from a habit of oppression towards their inferiors, and of opposition towards their equals; therefore, let the costs of your legal adviser be ever so exorbitant, discharge his claim at once, and consider that you have only taken an expensive lesson in morality. If the lawyer does promote litigation, it is from the consideration that a country without a chancellor would be little better than a ship without a helm; and, living in a country with a chancellor, he looks upon it as the bounden duty of every one to prevent so honourable a functionary receiving his money for doing nothing. – A Shilling's Worth of Nonsense.

THE ENGLISH RESIDENTS AT ST. PETERSBURGH.

Next to the Germans come decidedly the English, who form in various respects a more distinct colony than the Germans; many of the latter having become citizens of Petersburgh and Russian subjects, or having always been such; while the former merely belong to the "foreign guests," as they are called, who in time of peace enjoy the advantages of denizenship without its burdens. The English mercantile body call themselves the Petersburgh factory. They have their own chapel; and, despising all other nations, but most especially their protectors, the Russians, they live shut up by themselves, drive English horses and carriages, go bear-hunting on the Neva as they do tiger-hunting on the Ganges, disdain to lift the hat to the Emperor himself, and, proud of their indispensableness, and the invincibility of their fleets, defy everybody, find fault with everything they see, but are highly thought of by the Government and by all, because they think highly of themselves, and reside chiefly in the magnificent quay named after them, where, however many wealthy Russians also have splendid mansions.—Russia and the Russians, by J. G. Kohl.

ORIGIN OF THE WORD COLONY.

Colony is a body of people drawn from the mother country to inhabit some distant place. The word originally signified no more than a farm, i. e. the habitation of a peasant, colonus (hence the word clown), with the quantity of land sufficient for the support of his family. It is derived from the Latin word colo, I till or cultivate; hence colonus, a husbandman, and colonia, a body of farmers sent to cultivate the ground in a distant country, and, by metonymy, the place itself. Mr. Vaillant has filled a volume in folio with medals struck by the several colonies, in honour of the emperors who founded them. The ordinary symbol then engraved on their medals was either an eagle, as when the veteran legions were distributed in the colonies; or a labourer holding a plough, drawn by a pair of oxen, as when the colony consisted of ordinary inhabitants.—Saturday Magazine.

HUSBANDRY IN ANCIENT TIMES.

Husbandry is not only the most ancient, but also the most useful of arts. This alone is absolutely necessary for the support of human life; and without it other pursuits would be in vain. The exercise, therefore, of this art, was justly accounted most honourable by the Ancients. Thus, in the earliest ages of the world, we find the greatest heroes wielding the share as well as the sword, and the fairest hands no more disdaining to hold a crook than a sceptre. The ancient Romans owed their glory and power to husbandry; and that famous republic never flourished so much as when their greatest men ploughed with their own hands. Lucius Quintius Cincinnatus was found naked at the plough, when he was summoned to take upon him the Dictatorship; and when he had settled the Commonwealth, the glorious old man returned to the tillage of his small farm, laden with the praises of the Roman people. Caius Fabricius and Curius Dentatus, those patterns of temperance, who drove Pyrrhus out of Italy, and vanquished the Samnites and Sabines, were as diligent in cultivating their fields as they were valiant and successful in war. But when the virtuous industry of this great people gave way to luxury and effeminacy, the loss of their glory attended on their neglect of husbandry, and by degrees they fell a prey to barbarous nations.—Professor Martin's Preface to the Georgics.

WOMEN'S LOVE OF FLOWERS.

In all countries women love flowers—in all countries they form nosegays of them; but it is only in the bosom of plenty that they conceive the idea of embellishing their dwellings with them. The cultivation of flowers among the peasantry indicates a revolution in all their feelings. It is a delicate pleasure, which makes its way through coarse organs; it is a creature, whose eyes are opened; it is a taste for the beautiful, a faculty of the soul which is awakened. Man then understands that there is in the gift of nature a something more than is necessary for existence—colours, forms, odours, are perceived for the first time, and these charming objects have at last spectators. Those who have travelled in the country can testify that a rose-tree under a window, a honey-suckle around the door of a cottage, are always a good omen to the tired traveller. The hand which cultivates flowers is not closed against the supplications of the poor or the wants of the stranger.

NEWFOUNDLAND HOSPITALITY.

The great difference between a small farmer's kitchen at home and here, consists in the absence of strings of onions, hams, and bacon, depending from the ceiling joists. Here you see sealing guns, fishing apparatus, a fresh herring, or some other fish just caught, supplying their place. But still the good things of this world are not wanting. I never walked into one of these kind-hearted people's dwellings (and very often did so during my rambles last summer) without immediate and silent preparations for the stranger; for they do the same to all respectable persons, and in my instance, very frequently, at first they did not know me. The good wife puts some tea in the pot, spreads a clean cloth if she has one at hand, or time admits, boils some eggs, produces a pat of fresh butter and a large jug of milk, with a loaf of home-made bread, or, if that is wanting, white biscuit; and, without saying a word during the preparation, expects her visitor, whether he is hungry or not, to fall to; being perfectly satisfied if you drink three or four cups of tea (luckily the cups are usually small), and eat a good deal of bread and butter and two or three eggs, which she always takes good care shall not hurt your digestion by their hardness. They never offer fish; of which I dare say, from experience, they think you have daily enough; and of course fresh meat is seldom seen but on rare festive occasions, when the fatted calf or the household lamb graces the board. They have usually, however, a store of flour and of salt beef or pork, which, with their poultry, would afford at all times a good table, were it not that the latter are too profitably employed in producing eggs for the shops, and the former too dear to eat much of.—Newfoundland in 1842, by Colonel Sir Richard Bonnycastle.

MAP OF THE BOUNDARY BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND AMERICA, AS FIXED BY LORD ASHBURTON'S TREATY.

We here present to our readers a map of the British and North American territory, of which so large a portion has been in dispute between the two nations of Great Britain and the United States for more than half a century, and for which the contention is at last happily terminated, by the treaty which has been the consequence of Lord Ashburton's mission from this country. We expressed our opinion in last week's NEWS, that the result arrived at would be advantageous to both countries, an opinion to which we firmly adhere, although the carpings of party are loud upon the subject to lead the public astray. We also, in our last number, gave the gist of the treaty itself in a condensed form, and the map which is here exhibited displays the exact line of boundary as it is at length fixed by the mutual consent of the two powers, now fortunately in undisturbed alliance.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.—In the treaty between Great Britain and the United States the following most important and gratifying articles occur:—Art. 1. The parties mutually stipulate that each shall prepare, equip, and maintain in service, on the coast of Africa, a sufficient and adequate squadron, or naval force of vessels, of suitable numbers and descriptions, to carry in all not less than 80 guns, to enforce separately and respectively the laws, rights, and obligations of each of the two countries for the suppression of the slave trade; the said squadrons to be independent of each other, but the two Governments stipulating, nevertheless, to give such orders to the officers commanding their respective forces, as shall enable them most effectually to act in concert and co-operation, upon mutual consultation, as exigencies may arise, for the attainment of the true object of this article; copies of all such orders to be communicated by each Government to the other respectively. Art. 9. Whereas, notwithstanding all the efforts which may be made on the coast of Africa for suppressing the slave trade, the facilities for carrying on that traffic and avoiding the vigilance of cruisers, by the fraudulent use of flags, and other means are so great, and the temptations for pursuing it, while a market can be found for slaves, so strong, as that the desired result may be long delayed, unless all markets be shut against the purchase of African negroes; the parties to this treaty agree that they will unite in all becoming representations and remonstrances, with any and all powers within whose dominions such markets are allowed to exist; and that they will urge upon all such powers the propriety and duty of closing such markets at once and for ever.

The following, from the Irondaire Française, is a striking instance of the still uncivilized state of Corsica:—"The bandit Santa Lucia, having threatened the medical man at Rocsaera with assassination, the latter, as a measure of prudence, sought an asylum in the chief town of the department. A few days afterwards, at six o'clock in the morning, he was seen in the street by Santa Lucia, who instantly raised his gun and shot him dead. At the report of the gun the neighbours assembled in considerable numbers, and surrounded the murderer, but with great coolness he drew forth his stiletto, and threatened to stab the first who should venture to lay hands on him. The crowd opened a passage for him, and he retreated quietly through the streets. As he passed by a post of custom-house soldiers, he was summoned to surrender. 'Come and take me,' said he, concealing his stiletto. A soldier having attempted to seize him, he again drew out his stiletto, and stabbed the man in three places. He then continued his route, and two soldiers, without their muskets, having ventured to follow him, he discharged his carbine at them, but fortunately without wounding them, and then, having again reloaded, rapidly disappeared in the country."

GRATITUDE OF THE JEWS.—A magnificent piece of plate is about to be presented to Sir Moses Montefiore from a large body of subscribers of the Jewish persuasion, as a mark of esteem and gratitude for his services on behalf of those among their race who were persecuted on account of the "Father Thomas" affair a year or two ago. It is a massive, yet elegant, work of silver, standing upwards of two feet in height, and weighing about 1300 ounces. On its four sides are representations exquisitely executed in chaste relievo of Sir Moses landing, of his presentation to the Sultan, of his announcing to the Jews their liberation, and of his thanksgiving in the synagogue; lower compartments being filled up on two sides with emblematical representations of the persecution suffered by the Jews, and of the noble part taken by England in their protection; on the third, being admirably pictured, is the grand subject of Moses engulfing the Egyptian host in the Red Sea, and in the front there is the inscription. At the four corners are beautifully modelled figures, two representing Moses and Ezra, and two figuratively representing the persecution and the emancipation of the Jews. Altogether, the work does high credit to British art.

WEST INDIA STEAMERS.—Considerable anxiety is expressed among several of the shareholders of the West India Steam Navigation Company as to their prospects of remuneration from the adoption of the new plan. One of them has stated his fears in writing, and has argued an annual loss of £17,000, exclusively of the loss by wear and tear, casualties, &c. The calculation on which he bases this opinion is as follows:—

Actual cost of steaming	£390,000
Actual cost of sailing	40,000
	430,000
To be received from Government	240,000
	190,000
Receipts from passengers, &c.	20,000
Loss	£170,000

CHINESE WAR-SHIPS.—The Chinese have launched two frigates. They are built after the European model, and are said to look well enough, with the exception of their sterns, which do not look "ship shape" to nautical eyes. They have two decks, and are pierced for nine guns a-side, carrying 18 iron 32-pounder carronades on the main deck, and brass guns on the upper deck. Below the guns holes are pierced through the sides for 60 sweeps a side, so that each vessel may be impelled by 120 rowers. As prizes they are not likely to prove very valuable, being probably built of fir.

DUTCH BOERS.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—At the North and South American Coffee-house, papers have been received from the Cape of Good Hope to the 20th July. These communicate the most gratifying intelligence from Port Natal, where Captain Smith and his small band of heroes have been rescued from destruction. From the 26th May to the 26th June, the Boers invested his camp, preventing all communication with him, and capturing his provisions, stores, &c., which obliged him to place his men on half rations, and to fight daily on disadvantageous terms. On the 26th June her Majesty's ship Southampton arrived and landed 500 or 600 men, who drove the Boers into the Bush, and relieved Captain Smith from his perilous situation. Lieut.-Colonel Cloete, commanding the reinforcements, afterwards offered protection to such of the Boers as would come forward and swear allegiance to her Majesty; but in answer to this, Pretorious, the leader of the Boers, wrote as follows:—"I must also inform you that we have made over the country to his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, and have called upon that power to protect us; so that we have every right to expect that our cause will be supported in Europe." Already the Zoolus and Caffres had recommenced their attacks on the wandering Boers, killing and plundering such as fell into their power.

IRISH HIGHWAYS AND BY-WAYS.

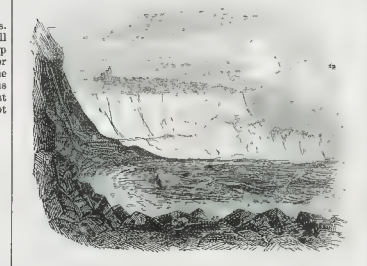
CURRAGHMORE.

Curraghmore, which has long been justly celebrated for its beauty and extent, is situated at the distance of about eleven miles from the ancient city of Waterford.

Passing through the entrance-gates, which stand but a short way from the manufacturing village of Portlaw, your road lies along a picturesque drive, on one side bounded by the river Clodagh, backed by a fine wood, and on the other side by sloping ground, bearing many a lofty oak. The first view obtained of the dwelling-house does not by any means give the stranger a fair idea of its size. The house and offices form three sides of a quadrangle; the upper end, which is a portion of the ancient castle, being the hall front, is surmounted by "a stag lodged"—the La Poer crest—the two sides being appropriated to coach-houses, stables, a riding-house, and, until lately, two dens for lions. The valuable stud, comprising many of the most celebrated steeple-chase horses of the day, are mostly housed in the right wing. The rear of the house, which is given in the sketch, commands some splendid views, extending to the lofty mountains of Curraghmore, over woods of vast extent. The tower on the hill, seen behind the house, was erected by the grandfather of the present marquis to the memory of his eldest son, the Earl of Tyrone, who was killed at an early age leaping his horse near the house. From this hill may be obtained the best view of Curraghmore and the surrounding country. The demesne, which is said to be one of the most extensive in the United Kingdom, covers upwards of four thousand acres, two thousand of which are under trees. During the violent storm of the 26th of January last, much damage was done to the plantations, some parts of the wood still retaining evident marks of the devastation which it occasioned.

Curraghmore has gained especial celebrity by the serious accident which befel the noble marquis and his bride while enjoying a drive through their lovely grounds. B.

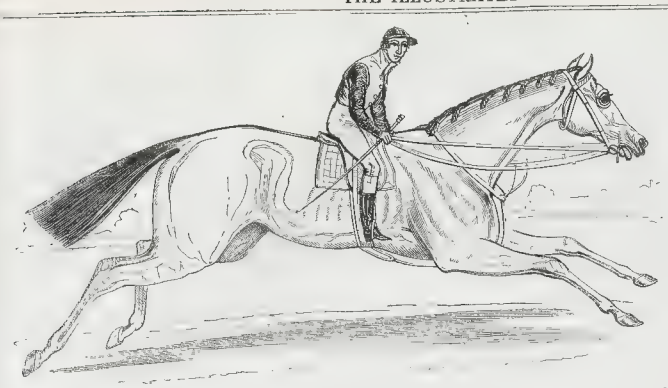
NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.



ALUM BAY—ISLE OF WIGHT.

Alum Bay derives its name from the quantity of that mineral found on the shore. A huge angle of rock, forming the Needle Point, is the boundary of the bay to the west. The chalk forms an unbroken face everywhere, nearly perpendicular, and in some parts formidably projecting; and the tenderest stains of ochreous yellow and greenish moist vegetation vary, without breaking, its sublime uniformity. This vast wall extends for more than a quarter of a mile, and is probably near 400 feet in height; its termination is by a thin edge of bold broken outline; and the wedge-like needle rocks, rising out of the blue waters, continue the cliff in idea beyond its present boundary, and give an awful impression of the stormy ages which have gradually devoured its enormous mass. The pearly hue of the chalk is beyond description by words—probably past it even by the pencil. The magical repose of this side of the bay is most wonderfully contrasted by the torn forms and vivid colouring of the clay cliffs on the opposite side. These offer a series of points of a sort of scalloped form, and which are often quite sharp and spiry. Deep rugged chasms divide the strata in many places, and not a vestige of vegetation appears in any part—all is wild ruin. The tints of these cliffs are so bright, and so varied, that they have not the appearance of anything natural. Deep purplish, red, dusky blue, bright ochreous yellow, grey nearly approaching to white, and absolute black, succeed each other as sharply defined as the stripes in silk; and after rain, the sun, which, from about noon till its setting, in summer, illuminates them more and more, gives a brilliancy to some of these nearly as resplendent as the high lights on satin.

CURE FOR THE CHOLERA.—(From a Correspondent.)—This painful and distressing disease, which is now exhibiting itself in various parts of the kingdom, has been successfully combated and effectually cured by the following medicine, which cannot be too widely made known to the public. Take equal quantities of spirit of sal volatile, essence of peppermint, and liquid laudanum (say a quarter of an ounce of each, which pour together into one bottle). Of this mixture take a small tea-spoonful in half a glass of brandy, to which add a little hot water, which swallow, and repeat the dose in two hours, if necessary. This has seldom failed to afford almost immediate relief; and a second dose mostly effects a cure. The above dose is for a grown person, and should be increased or diminished according to the strength and habit of the patient. The writer has felt immediate benefit from the use of it, and he has also given it to persons with the same success.



BEESWING.

We this week present our sporting friends with a correct portrait of "t' ould mare," taken from the well-known and spirited engraving published by Mr. Moore, West-street, Upper St. Martin's-lane, to whose kindness we are indebted not only for the present sketch, but also for that of the Doncaster Course and Stand which appeared in our last. The sire of Beeswing was Dr. Syntax, out of Tomboy's dam, &c.; and her performances are the most extraordinary contained in the annals of racing. The much-talked-of "Eclipse" during his career won only ten public races. "The Mare" has come in a winner on not less than fifty-four occasions; and we subjoin the details of her principal performances to the present time (Sept. 21). We may also state that many of her northern friends are so sanguine of her lasting qualities, that they will take long odds "t' ould mare" wins the next three Doncaster cups! Beeswing was bred, in 1833, by William Ord, Esq., and is still his property. On a recent occasion, when asked if he would dispose of her, he replied, with true English spirit, that "she was the property of the people of Newcastle, and never should be otherwise."

Cups and Stakes won by "Beeswing."—In 1835, at Doncaster, the Champagne Stakes; at Richmond (Yorkshire), the Sweepstakes. In 1836, at Newcastle, the St. Leger and the Gold Cup.—1837, at Newcastle, the Gold Cup; Doncaster, the Cleveland Stakes and the Gold Shield; Richmond (Yorkshire), walked over for the Gold Cup and the Plate; Northallerton, walked over for the Gold Cup.—1838, at Catterick Bridge, the Gold Cup; Newcastle, the Craven Stakes, a piece of Plate, and the Gold Cup; Doncaster, the Fitzwilliam Stakes; Northallerton, walked over for her Majesty's Purse.—1839, at Catterick Bridge, won the Craven Stakes and the Gold Cup; Newcastle, the Craven Stakes and the Gold Cup; York, the Queen's Plate; Stockton, the Gold Cup; Richmond (Yorkshire), walked over for the Gold Cup, and won her Majesty's Plate; Doncaster, the Fitzwilliam Stakes.—1840, at Catterick Bridge, the Gold Cup; Newcastle, the Craven Stakes; Lancaster, the Ashton Stakes and the Cup Stakes; York, the Queen's Plate and her Majesty's Plate; Doncaster, the Fitzwilliam Stakes and the Cup, also the 50 sovs. given by the Caledonian Hunt.—1841, at Chester, the Trial Stakes and the Stand Cup; Newcastle, the Gold Cup; Stockton, the Gold Cup; Doncaster, walked over for the Doncaster Stakes, won the Cup, and the Hornby-Castle Stakes; Richmond (Yorkshire), the Gold Cup and her Majesty's Plate.—1842, at Chester, the Queen's 100 guineas; Ascot, the Gold Cup; Newcastle, the Gold Cup; and at Doncaster, the Gold Cup.

HOP PICKING.

The foregoing cut represents a group of hop-pickers, who, at a certain period of the year, flock in hundreds to the counties of Kent and Sussex. They are made up of the most varied materials, and are of all ages and sizes. During the season it is not unusual to see them huddled together, and sleeping at night in the open air. At the close of the hop-picking season, now rapidly coming on, they return to their respective homes.

HOPS.—MAIDSTONE.—The produce in this district rather exceeds what it was generally laid at, and the quality is first-rate. The college-ground, we are informed, averages over five bags an acre, which is rather more than it did last year; but the average would have been higher, if the hops had been suffered to grow out more. The quality sustains the long-established reputation of this ground. Mr. Gurney's young piece is said to average nearly seven bags an acre. We mention these two grounds in consequence of their having been so generally inspected by visitors, and the numerous conjectural estimates that have been made of their produce. In the neighbourhood of Canterbury we learn the weight will be rather more than last year. The Tenterden district, comprising about 4000 acres, comes very short. Cranbrook about the same as last year. Staplehurst and the Weald generally very short. The duty, it will be seen, is up to £155,000; but we very much doubt whether the result will warrant that estimate.—Maidstone Journal. At Canterbury market on Saturday several samples of hops were shown, and a good deal of business was transacted. The prices varied from £6 to £8 15s.; several tons, being part of the growth of Mr. Neame, of Selling, realizing the latter sum. Some few grounds in the neighbourhood have had their crops gradually turn to a brown colour, and are, of course, in an equal ratio depreciated in value; whilst some, and we may say only a comparatively small portion, have not only retained the brightness of the pure hop, but have produced a considerably larger growth than was anticipated.—Kentish Gazette.

EXTRAORDINARY DECLINE IN THE CONSUMPTION OF WINE. A return has been made of the quantity of wines upon which duty has been paid for home consumption in the port of London, from the commencement of the present year until Thursday last. It exhibits a most extraordinary decrease as compared with the same period of last year, and furnishes strong evidence of the pressure upon their resources which the middle classes of the community have had to sustain. Of Cape wine the quantity cleared for home consumption this year is 106,035 gallons, a decrease of 13,875 gallons, or more than 11 per cent. upon last year. Madeira, for the present year, 36,859 gallons, being 18,872 gallons less than last year's consumption, a decrease of more than 33 per cent., or one gallon less in every three. Sherry, up to Thursday last, 055,576 gallons, being 64,036 less than last year, a decrease of more than 6 per cent. But the most astounding decline has been in the consumption of port. The quantity of port upon which duty has been paid this year is 486,716 gallons, showing the portentous falling off of 824,760 gallons upon the consumption of last year, being 40 per cent, or a gallon less in every two and a half. Wines not classified and particularized exhibit a falling off of 12,778 gallons upon the quantity cleared last year (155,417 gallons), more than 8 per cent. The costly wines of France, on the other hand, consumed by the wealthiest classes, whose personal luxuries the most depressed state of trade does not affect, as well as Hock and other Rhenish wines, have undergone no diminution of consumption, but exhibit an increase. The Claret, Champagne, and Burgundy cleared for home consumption this year (188,896 gallons) is 8254, or upwards of 4½ per cent. more than last year; and the Rhenish exhibits a slight increase of 150 gallons upon the 28,456 gallons cleared last year.

WINES AND SPIRITS IN FRANCE.—According to the accounts which have been received from Burgundy, it is expected that the vintage will commence in that district about the middle of the next week. It is the general opinion that the quality of the wine will be very good.

EXPORT OF PRECIOUS METALS.—By the official returns published by the Customs, the exports of the precious metals to foreign and colonial parts for the week ending Thursday last were as under:

Silver coin to Rotterdam	11,000
Gold coin to Prince Edward's Island ..	125

LORD PALMERSTON.

Here is the late Foreign Secretary: once the Cupid of the departed Administration, and now the Mars of the present Opposition. Nay, report has gone so far as to predict that the next session will find him something more than Mars—that he will become the Jupiter Tonans of the Liberals, and nothing less—that he will head the movement-party with an accelerating power which Lord John Russell does not feel inclined to abet—and that Reform will change its leader in the lower house. This statement has been publicly made by a morning paper advocating the general tendency of his lordship's opinions, with a confidence amounting almost to authority, although a Sunday journal has twice denied it also with a confidence amounting almost to—nothing at all! Whether, however, his lordship may open the next session as Opposition leader or not, it is pretty clear that he was chosen to close the last. He was the "reviewer" for the nonce of all the acts of the Administration—and his oration, which we may account as one of the ablest he ever delivered, had the effect of drawing from the Premier a brilliant improvisation of reply.

Lord Palmerston is a man of decided mark-personal and mark-political; and there is much to be said for and against him in either capacity. His reputation is, in its way, about as well supported by friends and beset by enemies as that of any living being who bears a prominent position in the history of the times. For our own parts, we will not allow him to be either divinity or devil.

If we are to speak of him personally, we may tax our recollection to remember him as a "handsome man"—one of the good-looking fashionables of his day; not, indeed, entirely irresistible, but with a twinkle in his eye, and a polish about his curls and his boots, and his dress and his manners—and with two or three points of the deportment of a gentleman that kept him in countenance then, and have not deserted him now. But he has set too much store by these landmarks of a former personal appearance—he has treasured them more tenaciously even than he did the disputed Boundary Question, although he stuck pretty fast to that—he has struggled to live on a good many years without getting a day older—and striven, in good looks and juvenile habiliments, to remain toujours le même. He will not say in despair, Non sum qualis eram—but Sum qualis eram, to be sure! Of course there is a touch of the frivolous about this—for, though not exactly in a green old age (there is nothing particularly green about him, to tell truth), yet he has passed the rubicon, and can hardly afford to be always playing off the appearance of the young beau. The result of the trifling, however, only amounts to this—that the world has dubbed him "Cupid," "Juvenile Whig," &c.—and that he has been well pelted by lampoons in the public prints.

But if it has been Lord Palmerston's fault-personal to have endeavoured to appear "always the same," his fault-political lays him open to no such imputation. He has had principles in as many varieties as there are tints to a Claude; and his light has shone through the windows of as many administrations as there are days to a wonder—which we believe may be emphatically taken at nine. His masters too, when he had masters, were of all shades of opinion. Liverpool, Canning, Huskisson, Wellington, Grey, and Melbourne alone make a good patchwork, but he worked it with more vigour than scruple, and, now that he has completed a garment of it, we must say that he bravely wears the coat. He has been better and more consistent lately; and, by exhibiting something like progress in the business of statesmanship, according to the view of it which he now takes, and displaying more oratorical boldness and brilliancy in proportion to the difficulties of his position, he has acquired "golden opinions" from his party, and has become "all the champion" that we described him when we set out on this notice.

Lord Palmerston has always been a good man of business, the habits of which he has become confirmed in by an everlasting residence in official places. In the House he does not speak vigorously, but he replies well, he is a good dissector of the speeches and expositor of the blunders of others, has a capital memory, parliamentary and documentary, evinces much neatness and smartness at a debate repartee, can marshal his points with some skill and more complacency, and is always a useful man to his party, be that party which it may.

LORD PALMERSTON.

He has acquired a reputation for protocolling, and among his friends, his foreign diplomacy is regarded in the highest light. His treatment of the Turkish question is, in this respect, the great card of his admirers, who also claim for him the credit, while in office, of having greatly outwitted the French politicians, and completely annihilated Thiers. The Spanish Legion was not quite so great a feather in his cap, nor did his management of the Boundary Question, while it remained in his hands, elicit much applause. All the Tories are at present blaming him for our Eastern war, and all the Whigs and Whig-Radicals are proportionately vituperating Lord Aberdeen. For ourselves, we leave the ground an unenclosed common, in an admirable condition of freedom, and refuse to be bottle-holder or second to either of the combatants at large. We have not even a single "Go it" to add to the spirit of the fight, but shall be, nevertheless, most ready to give credit to either party for any good which history may eventually show us they have done the country.

Lord Palmerston's bitterest personal assailants in print were, "in the days of his dynasty," the Anti-Metternich of the Times newspaper, and Mr. Urquhart, the violent opponent of Lord Ponsonby. All the journals, however, have had their fling at him, and, although bearing it with fortitude, he has not always been silent under the lash. It has been long believed that he has had an influence over the columns of the Globe, which he has occasionally used as the vehicle of smart retort; and latterly the Morning Chronicle (as it often did before) has contained articles which have borne internal evidence of proceeding from the Palmerstonian Pen.

His Lordship is member for the Borough of Tiverton, resigned into his hands by Mr. James Kennedy, erewhile proprietor of a newspaper called the Radical, and a briefless barrister, who is supposed to have got the judgeship of the Mauritius for the seat. Certainly at the time of the transaction it was worth the preferment to the Whigs.

Here we bid our diplomatist adieu. We respect his abilities, and believe that he has committed himself too far on the open road of liberalism to get out of the track again. Nay more, we rather favour the declaration of the Morning Advertiser, that Lord Palmerston will lead the van of the Opposition as soon as the gates of Old St. Stephen's shall be flung wide anew.

The second game ended in A. having King and white Bishop, B. King, black Bishop, and Pawn. A. planted his King before the Pawn, and B. protected it with his King; and now the two Bishops are useless, for A.'s Bishop cannot check B.'s King nor take the Pawn, they being both on black squares, and B.'s Bishop cannot check A.'s King on the white square. Do you consider this a drawn game, or B. the winner?—Answer. This is a drawn game.*

To the correspondent who complains that he cannot find a description of Mons Meg in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS we willingly afford the following information:—This curious piece of ordnance was cast at Mons, in Flanders, and is mounted on a beautiful carriage on the bomb battery of the castle of Edinburgh. It was used at the siege of Norham, and subsequently burst when firing a salute to the Duke of York in 1682, since when it has never been removed. Our illustration is deemed the best that has ever been given of Mons Meg.

☞ NEWS AGENTS in the country who will undertake to distribute bills, &c. relating to this paper, free of expense, are requested to address a line to the Publisher, 198, Strand, stating the name of their agent in town where parcels can be enclosed, also the number of bills that can be used to advantage.

As the great influx of letters now poured in upon us demands something like classification at our hands, and, as very many correspondents who have business with the Publisher address the Editor, and vice versâ, sometimes extending their favours to the Printer also, we have to request, as a general rule, that all letters may be addressed to the Office—198, Strand—those having reference to the sale, or supply of the paper, to the Publisher, and those applying to its contents, or the insertion of articles, to the Editor only.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1842.

There is a sad dearth this week of "fair game" for the "licensed sporting" of the neutral weekly journalist, if he wish to be anything like honest in his calling. The birds of intelligence are either few or wild upon the wing; and the coveys do not get up in the news-fields half as plentifully as we could wish, or as would be characteristic of the month in which we write. It is true, we have the Queen's visit. Well! shall not our readers have enough of that? It is true, we have the income-tax. Well! have not our readers more than enough of that? It is true, we have Lord Ashburton's treaty and the boundary question; and the readers of all newspapers have surely had enough of that, for morning and evening contemporaries have been making the question a bone of contention ever since it has been settled beyond dispute. We cannot see the wisdom of this, although we can acknowledge the policy of the treaty; but it serves the turn of the editors, and keeps the Wh g and Tory game alive. We leave our readers to judge of the geographical merits of the affair by presenting them with a map. For the political, we know that the treaty is beyond our veto if we disapproved it, as it is welcome to our congratulation as we approve. Corn-laws have been an eternal theme with the diurnals, on account of some variations in prices which were not nearly, being too much for the agriculturists and not enough for the League; but, upon the whole, rather favourable to the Peel modification. We do not, however, insinuate that we are as favourable as the prices; but, as in the instance of the boundary question, eschew the controversial war. The disturbance at Port Natal, with the triumph of the English arms, and the relief of the gallant detachment of the 27th Regiment, under Captain Smith, have formed subjects of elaborate narrative, but of no more leading remark than they seemed to require. Captain Smith, whom we well know to be a most spirited and experienced officer (and who, moreover, has high literary capabilities, and has celebrated, in beautiful verses, the poetry of a soldier's life), stood out in his little encampment to the last, doled out meagre provisions, fed upon horseflesh, and sustained his spirits upon hope until reinforcements came to his rescue and vindicated the prowess of our arms. The foes whom we had to contend with are called "Dutch Boers;" and although the grouping of them which we have given in another part of our paper does not present so formidable an aspect as would a regiment of well-plumed hussars, or a detachment of the gallant 27th, yet they are described as desperate men, acting not only under delusion, but under the protection of bushwork and bramble-fences almost impervious to any assailing force. The fact of our "petty conquest," such as it is, makes, therefore, a piquant little anecdote of the history of the week;—but vaïlà tout. There is really, in the words of the fortune-teller, "nothing on the cards." The article in the Quarterly in praise of Peel is too decided in its laudations to carry us the whole hog with it, although we agree with some of the more discreet commendations; and, on the other hand, the Chronicle goes to the opposite extreme. The Globe echoes the Chronicle, but neither speak fairly for themselves—they must have a contemporary to bespatter or to bully: it is all controversy, and its real intention is to eke out the dulness which intervenes between session and session, rather than to instruct the public in a phulosophical and thoughtful spirit. Their sound and fury signify nothing, and all the rest we take cum grano salis. Ditto of Times—ditto of Herald—ditto of Post. The fact is, there is no domestic news; and, like men who are at once starved and hungry, they feel the vacuum dreadfully. So do we. Queen's visit—income-tax—boundary treaty—corn-laws—Peel policy—anti-Peel policy—all seem worn out together; and Whig-is.n, Toryism, and Journalism are, at least for one se'nnight, in a comparative state of repose.

In another column will be found a paragraph account of a prize fight which took place on Monday at Salisbury, and which terminated in the death of one of the miserable combatants. We have condensed the narrative of the occurrence into as small a space as possible, because, in a paper so extensively taken by families as is the ILLUSTRATED NEWS, we would not prolong the detail of any incident that might shock the feelings of our readers; but, on the other hand, we would not omit a record of the brutal exhibition, because its insertion involves also the public duty of protesting against the heartless, cruel, and degrading practice, upon which it affords so awful though melancholy a comment. And here let us premise that we are in favour of a warm encouragement of all the manly sports of the people. We would rejoice over the increase of sound athletic exercise, and the fair fosterage of gallantry and courage—we would nerve the body, and recreate and refresh the mind, by all means which come legitimately within the character of manhood; but not by one insane gratification, or one debasing influence, would we tarnish the native purity of the English name. To make a man brutal is not to make him brave; and there can be nothing respectable, and therefore nothing national, in a mere sledge-hammer bout of bruising, where he who most deforms the body and humbles the mind of his adversary wins the greatest triumph in a battle that begins without the impulse of quarrel, and ends without one spark of glory to atone for guilt and blood. Can anything be more wretched than the sickening incident we have thought it right to record? Two young lads, not out of their teens, turn out, in defiance of the law, upon a trial of mere brutal strength. One literally beats the other to death—but not at once to death. He is first only blinded; but in this helpless and hopeless condition, encircled by hundreds of shameless spectators, his eyes are lanced, that he may be enabled to continue the conflict to the last—till, in fact, it hurls him, in the very frenzy of wanton cruelty, into the new presence of another world. Who gains here? Who is base enough to be gratified? The poor and henceforth conscience-goaded wretch who has spoiled the young beauty of manhood and sent a brother to the grave? The companions who have the punishment of their depravity crimsoned before them in the forms of a new and horrid remorse? The wanton, frantic, screaming, blaspheming spectators, with their oaths now hushed in blood, and either lingering to contemplate the mad ruin they have abetted, or flying with cowardly fleetness from the vengeance of the law? As for the sinner who has died, he has had "no hour with God," and all our mortal hope for him is in the boundless mercy which we are taught is registered in Heaven. Really, in every aspect, such horrors as these are dreadful to contemplate; and, while we denounce them with the loudest voice of indignation—while we proclaim humanity outraged by them, and Christianity abused—we cannot quell a disposition to rebuke and censure the natural protectors of the public peace. Magistrates and constabulary cannot be without the means of anticipating the occurrence of these debasing struggles. They are always attended with some sort of notoriety, and never fail to collect crowds of witnesses; and, if so many of the public can arrive at their foreknowledge, the protectors of the public ought to be at least as well informed as the public themselves. Vigilance would certainly make them so; and, when vigilance would prevent bloodshed, it ought to be more actively exercised on the public behalf.

We perceive since writing the above that a coroner's inquest has been held, and a verdict of "Manslaughter" returned against the principal parties implicated.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—Yesterday, at half-past twelve, the Queen and Prince Albert arrived at the Castle, escorted by a party of the 2nd Life Guards, her Majesty and his Royal Highness having travelled from town to Slough by a special train of the Great Western Railway.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert passed through Eton at about half-past one on Saturday the 17th instant, amid the acclamations of her loyal subjects, the Etonians, who saluted her with deafening cheers, and assurances of their loyalty. Unfortunately, notice had not been given beforehand of her coming, so that the people were unprepared for her, and the Etonians were not regularly collected to meet her, but still there were a great number about. As the Queen approached the Castle, the ordnance vociferated their salutes, and the bells sent forth a merry peal. Eton Chapel is still in a state of repair, the altarpiece being removed, and Provost Lupton's chapel chapel being taken in as accommodation for the lads of the college. A fine new stone pulpit is erecting, and also a reading-desk, which are placed near the altar. The old pulpit and reading-desk have been for some months in disuse, and temporary ones erected near the altar. The whole, when complete, will be a great improvement to the college.

WINDSOR, Tuesday.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert walked out in the royal pleasure-grounds this morning. This afternoon her Majesty rode out in the Park in a pony phaeton, driven by Prince Albert. The Countess of Mount Edgecumbe, the Hon. Matilda Paget and the Hon. Miss Stanley, followed in a pony carriage and four; and Gen. Wemyss and Col. Bouverie were in attendance on horseback. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal accompanied by Lady Lyttleton, were taken their accustomed airings. The Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady C. Dundas, rode out in a carriage and four this afternoon. It is expected that her Majesty and Prince Albert will leave the Castle for Claremont, there to remain for seven or eight days, at the latter end of next week. The game of every description, more especially pheasants and partridges, in the delightful grounds at Claremont, has been most strictly preserved; indeed, the birds are far more numerous in the royal preserves in the neighbourhood of Esher than they have been for several past seasons. His Royal Highness, therefore, who will participate in the sports of the field during the sojourn of the Court at Claremont, may be assured of most excellent recreation and amusement. It is not determined upon whether the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal will accompany their illustrious parents, or remain during the short absence of the Queen and Prince at the Castle. The lateness of the season, however, renders it more than probable that the infant Prince and Princess will continue at the Castle.

STIRRUP CUP TO PRINCE ALBERT.—Previous to Prince Albert's departure from Taymouth, the Marquis of Breadalbane presented his Royal Highness with a stirrup cup, composed of Scotch pebbles and jaspers, richly mounted in gold, the pebble forming the bottom of the cup being a singularly beautiful specimen, the natural lines in which present the figure of a Highland loch, with the sun under a cloud.

THE COURT AND THE SCOTTISH PLAIDS.—Her Majesty, when in Scotland, was graciously pleased to express an anxious desire to promote, by every means in her power, the tartan manufacture of the north. Her Majesty (in order effectually to carry out her beneficent designs) has never appeared, either in public or private since the return of the Court to the Castle, without some portion of her attire being composed of the tartan manufacture of Scotland. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal have also invariably worn, in their drives and walks, sashes and ribbons of either the Victoria or Albert plaid. The lady and maids of honour in waiting upon the Queen have also followed the excellent example so tastefully and admirably set them by their Royal mistress. Plaid stocks and neckerchiefs are likewise general amongst the gentlemen connected with the Royal household.

CONTEMPLATED VISIT OF THE COURT TO BRIGHTON.—We understand that her Majesty and Prince Albert, with their illustrious family, intend to honour Brighton with a visit about the end of October, and to remain at the Royal Pavilion about a month or, six weeks. The Princess Royal derived much advantage from the air of Brighton at the last visit of the Court, and his Royal Highness Prince Albert expressed himself pleased with the place.

INDISPOSITION OF THE MARQUESS WELLESLEY.—We regret to learn that the above distinguished nobleman is suffering from severe indisposition, at Kingston-house. The venerable marquess was last week very unwell from a diarrhœtic attack, and now is labouring from its debilitating effects. Rumours of rather an alarming nature were in circulation at the western part of the metropolis; but the above authentic information sufficiently proves their exaggeration.

Wednesday afternoon, as her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent was leaving Frogmore on a carriage airing, a lady named Brown, having lost all control over her horse, was thrown off, and fell with great force on the ground. She was instantly picked up by the porter, and conveyed to his lodge in a senseless state, when, after a short time, she revived. Miss Brown has sustained but little injury, although she fell on her head. The fall was, however, broken by the strength of her hat. She was conveyed in a carriage to her home in Victoria-street. Her Royal Highness was most anxious in her inquiries.

The Duchess of Cambridge, accompanied by the Princesses Augusta and Mary, and attended by Baroness Ahlefeldt, visited Westminster Abbey on Friday week. Prince George of Cambridge, accompanied by the Prince of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, landed from the Antwerp steam-packet on Saturday, and immediately proceeded to the residence of Prince George, in St. James's Palace. They left Dusseldorf (where they had been present at the grand reviews) on the 11th instant. On Saturday afternoon Prince George left town for Kew. The Duke of Sussex arrived at Chatsworth, on Saturday, from Alton Towers.

The Prince de Joinville has for a month past been under medical treatment for the deafness with which he is affected. Th gentleman under whose care the Prince has placed himself is a military surgeon.

DOVER.—On Sunday Prince Esterhazy, who has been taking the benefit of sea bathing here for these several weeks past, left Dover for London. The Prince was accompanied by three carriages. During his stay amongst us, his Serene Highness has been an excellent patron to the theatre, &c. On Monday night the performances (for the benefit of Mr. Fitzjames, one of the "cropped" comedians) were under the Prince's immediate patronage, when there was an excellent house; and almost every evening he might be seen occupying one of the private boxes.

His Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick of Austria visited Covent Garden Theatre on Tuesday evening, attended by Captain Fitzroy, R.N., Baron Lebzeltern, and accompanied by Prince Esterhazy, the Austrian Ambassador. The Archduke occupied her Majesty's box, and appeared much gratified with the performance of Miss A. Kemble in Norma. His Imperial Highness remained to see the comedy of Gertrude's Cherries.

The Marquis of Breadalbane has forwarded one capercailzie, one blackcock, three red grouse, and three hares, shot by Prince Albert on the 9th instant, on the braes of Taymouth, to Mr. Carfrae, of Edinburgh, to be stuffed. The capercailzie is a remarkably fine specimen of that rare bird.

Captain Allen, senior officer of the Niger expedition, had an interview with Lord Stanley on Wednesday at the Colonial Office.

General Sancho, the Spanish Minister, transacted business on Wednesday at the Foreign Office.

Mr. George Lewis had an interview on Wednesday with Lord Stanley at the Colonial Office.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

LONDON FLORICULTURAL SOCIETY.—On Tuesday the fifth annual show of the London Floricultural Society was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand. The flowers were arranged in the long room of the tavern. The show consisted entirely of dahlias, one of which, a remarkably splendid specimen, called the "Essex Triumphant," of a fine dark maroon colour, nearly approaching to black, was purchased by Mr. Brown, of Slough, at the extraordinary price of 100 guineas. The flowers were arranged in classes, and the judges, Messrs. Davis, Bragg, Cook, Mountjoy, and Smith, awarded the prizes to the successful exhibitors as follows:—Amateurs, first prize, Mr. Bragg; second ditto, Mr. Cook; third ditto, Mr. Prockter. To the second class of amateurs, first prize, Mr. Wildman; second ditto, Mr. Headly; and third, Mr. Noakes. To professional florists the first prize was awarded to Mr. Brown, second to Mr. Widnal, third to Mr. Stewart, and fourth to Mr. Girling. This show is the last of the present year.

GENERAL PENSION SOCIETY.—Lord Viscount Lake takes the chair for the City of London General Pension Society next Monday. This institution boasts more rank in its patronage than any other society in London. The praises should be loud and long in favour of their indefatigable Secretary, H. F. Richardson, Esq., to whose perseverance the present position of the charity is to be mainly attributed. Its principal president, the Duke of Buccleuch, gave £95 in aid of the funds last year.

ACCIDENT TO DANIEL CALLAGHAN, ESQ.—On Wednesday afternoon, as Daniel Callaghan, Esq., M.P. for Cork, was taking his customary promenade in the enclosure, St. James's Park; whilst walking musingly on the extreme verge of the lake, slipped into the water, where it was some four feet deep. The hon. gentleman struggled hard for some minutes, though not altogether free from danger, as the bank shelves into deeper water. He was fortunately extricated by the prompt assistance of two young ladies near the spot, one of whom threw him the end of her long scarf, by which he was much assisted in getting out. A cab was soon procured by one of the gate-keepers, in which Mr. Callaghan proceeded to his residence in Pimlico with no further damage than wet clothes.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT TO MR. HARDINGE, SON OF THE RIGHT HON. SIR HENRY HARDINGE.—We regret to hear that Mr. Hardinge, son of Sir Henry Hardinge, met with a serious accident on Monday morning. Mr. Hardinge was on his way to town from the family seat in Kent, and on landing from a steamer at Hungerford, by some means his foot was jammed between the vessel and pier. The injuries he received were very severe, and immediately on being conveyed to the family mansion, in Whitehall-gardens, two medical men were called in. It was judged expedient by these gentlemen that, in order to obviate fatal consequences, the affected leg should undergo amputation just above the ancle, which operation was performed with every success. Lieut.-Colonel Wood, M.P., shortly after the lamentable accident, left town with all despatch for Penshurst, near Tunbridge Wells, to fetch Lady Emily Hardinge, who arrived in town shortly after six o'clock.

FATAL ACCIDENT AT THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND'S.—On Tuesday a melancholy accident occurred at the Duke of Cleveland's, in St. James's-square, by which a bricklayer, named William Hales, lost his life, by falling off a scaffolding.

LISTS OF VOTERS.—The Registration Courts, for the City of London and Westminster, have been sitting during the past week.

MASONRY.—A highly respectable meeting of members of the Masonic body was held on Tuesday night, at Radley's Hotel, Bridge-street, Blackfriars, to take preliminary steps for forming a London committee in aid of the subscription which has been commenced in Lincolnshire, for a testimonial to the talented and highly-esteemed brother Dr. Oliver.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.—Within the last few days Mr. Braidwood, the superintendent of the fire brigade force, has caused to be distributed to every policeman in the metropolis and its suburbs, printed instructions for the purpose of preventing the spread of fire on occasion of its outbreak. The instructions contain the situation of the whole of the stations of the fire-engine establishment, where there is constant attendance of engines and firemen night and day. It then proceeds:—"Any police constable who first discovers a fire, without having his attention called to it by any one, is allowed by the establishment a sum not exceeding ten shillings, provided no human lives are lost. Upon a discovery being made, it is exceedingly prudent, to prevent the flames from spreading, to keep shut the doors and windows of the premises (after the escape of the inmates) till the engines have arrived, or water is procurable to be thrown on to the fire, as nothing causes it to burn so rapidly as the admission of air.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.—The court will resume its sittings on Monday after the vacation, for the hearing of cases. The sittings will be continued to the 14th of October, when another recess to the 1st of November is appointed. Days for the hearing of cases have been named to the 20th of December. During the vacation three regular bail days were set aside, and no fewer than 195 applications entertained. It was an act of humanity on the part of the commissioners to apportion the bail days, as they are authorised by the Act to adjourn for a period of six weeks at one time.

ALARMING FIRE AT WHITBREAD'S BREWHOUSE.—Thursday morning, shortly before one o'clock, an alarming fire broke out in the above brewery. The firm have long been in the habit of making their own gas, and at the above house the private watchman observed a strong glare of light through the windows of the building containing the apparatus. The private engines were got out, and several others soon arrived, when, a good supply of water being obtained, the ravages of the fire were confined to the building in which it originated. The accident is supposed to have originated through the gasometer having been overcharged, and the damage is very considerable.

DETERMINED SUICIDE.—At a few minutes before nine o'clock on Wednesday evening, a respectably-dressed woman was observed to enter the recess over the second arch from the Surrey side of London-bridge, and deliberately precipitate herself into the river. A little boy who was near at hand caught hold of the woman's clothes, but had no power to prevent her commission of the rash act. Boats put off and the drags were used for some time, but without avail; and, as the tide was running down fast, the probability is, the body must have been washed away. A report prevailed that the unfortunate creature had a child in her arms, but it could not be traced satisfactorily.

OMNIBUS RACING.—The driver of an omnibus called the Hope was committed a few days since to take his trial for manslaughter, for driving over and killing a man in the City-road. One of our correspondents, who resides in York-place, declares that most of the omnibuses, and particularly the Hopes and Favorites, drive down that part of the City-road at the rate of ten or twelve miles an hour. The passers-by look on with astonishment, and wonder why this dangerous nuisance is not put a stop to. The inhabitants would willingly join in endeavouring to abate this nuisance, but it appears totally useless to take these reckless vagabonds (the drivers) before a magistrate; for, after all the time and trouble expended, the fellows are generally fined a few shillings (which, by the by, the master immediately pays), and get a gentle admonition from the magistrate, which produces not the slightest effect.

FROM OUR LATE EDITION OF LAST WEEK.

INDIA RUBBER PAVEMENT.—Who would have thought of paving our streets, stables, and passages with India rubber? Yet such a thing seems to be expected; for we find in a monthly periodical the notice of a plan for so doing. The price will be about the same as the best asphalte pavement. It is so elastic that it will not fracture with the heaviest blow, which property prevents its wearing away. It can be altered, repaired, or relaid, at a small expense, as the old material can be taken back and reworked. We have understood that many persons of high rank have ordered that their stables be laid down with the caoutchouc pavement; the advantage of which to the feet of horses, must immediately suggest itself.—Journal of Commerce.

DISCOVERY OF THE BODIES OF TWO INFANTS.—On Thursday evening, about seven o'clock, as Thomas Jones, a waterman, was perambulating the causeway near Whitehall stairs, he observed a large box, which the tide had washed against the wall. Having secured the box, he conveyed it on shore, when, to his infinite surprise, he discovered that its contents were those of the bodies of two infants—one a male, the other a female, each wrapped in a piece of coarse linen. He lost no time in giving information to the police, and the box with its contents were conveyed to St. Margaret's workhouse, where they at present remain. The bodies were on Friday morning examined, but, from their state of decomposition, it was impossible to ascertain with any degree of certainty whether the infants were still born or were born alive, and had been unfairly dealt with.

A WHOLESALE MURDERER.—A man of the name of Lynch was hanged for murder at Sydney, last April, and at the scaffold he confessed having been a principal in no less than ten murders.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY.—Four beautiful Spanish entire horses arrived at Windsor yesterday morning as presents from Isabella II. of Spain to her Majesty. These horses reached this country shortly after her Majesty had left for Scotland, and were landed at Woolwich, where they remained till yesterday morning. Her Majesty having made a selection of two for her own use, presented the others to her illustrious consort.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, attended by the Earl and Countess of Denbigh, arrived at the Castle to-day, from her residence, Bushy-house, Bushy-park, on a visit to her Majesty.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken their usual airings to-day.—In the forenoon her Majesty and her illustrious consort took their accustomed walking exercise.

PRESENTATION OF COLOURS TO THE 16TH REGIMENT.—PORTSMOUTH.—The imposing ceremony of presenting this gallant corps with new colours took place on Thursday afternoon, on Southsea Common, in the presence of a vast assemblage of persons. A grand dinner was afterwards given to the principal officers of the navy and army; and in the evening there was a ball, at which between 400 and 500 persons attended.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—At a court held on Thursday, a long discussion took place on the affairs of Alderman Thomas Wood, who stands next for the honour of being Lord Mayor. The alderman has been, it was stated, a loser in the Tilmore Coal Company to the amount of £30,000; and it was doubtful whether the losses would not fall on him; if so, a bankruptcy was feared—and hence the discussion. Alderman Thomas Wood said he had been elected alderman of his ward, and he believed he had given satisfaction as a magistrate; he had received the thanks of his fellow-citizens, too, for his conduct in the shrievalty. As for all that had been said about bankruptcy, the suspicion of such an event existed but in the imagination of those who alluded to it. He must declare that a more persecuted man, or one who less deserved persecution, did not exist. Sir P. Laurie then moved that the Court should go into committee on Saturday or Monday on the subject. Alderman T. Wood approved of the motion, and said he should submit all the papers to the committee. He was determined to have inquiry, and had never refused to give all the information in his power. The motion was then put and negatived, four hands having been held up for it and five against it. The matter remains for future discussion.

A very handsome silver medal has been ordered to be struck by the Admiralty, to be presented as rewards to engineers of the first class, serving in her Majesty's navy, who by reason of good conduct deserve such a mark of esteem.

The deceased was a porter out of place, and resided in the Hampstead-road.—Sun. [The Globe states the man was not drowned; but, with assistance, was led away.]

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

In the proper department of our journal will be found a continuation of the account of the royal visit through a portion of Scotland up to the auspicious return of her Majesty, even to her ancient castle of Windsor; and some portion of her happy route homeward is still to be illustrated in the columns of this paper. In the present number, however, our artist has presented a splendid collection of subjects connected with the tour itself; and, more particularly, that portion of it, in the beautiful Highlands of Scotland, which was marked by such an enthusiastic display of loyalty on the part of the people, and such a magnificent series of festivities on that of the old nobility of the land. The detail of the royal journey, and the incidents contingent upon its progress through these inter-

THE QUEEN'S TOUR.

DALKEITH PALACE, Wednesday night.—Yesterday evening, shortly after five o'clock, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert reached the palace from Drummond Castle and the Highlands, after an absence of eight days. The royal cortège was escorted by a party of the Enniskillen Dragoons, and about 400 of the Duke of Buccleuch's tenantry on horseback, accompanied the cavalcade to the castle, having joined the royal cortège about four miles from the palace, on the Edinburgh road. On her Majesty's arrival at the palace, the 53rd Regiment received the august visitors with all the honours due to their elevated station, the band at the same time playing the national anthem; and immediately on the Queen and Prince alighting from their carriage the royal standard was hoisted amidst the cordial cheering of an immense concourse of spectators, admitted into the park through the liberality of the noble duke. Her Majesty and the Prince were not so much fatigued with the harassing duties inseparable from their progress through the towns and villages intervening between Drummond Castle and Dalkeith as might be expected, but both her Majesty and his Royal Highness appeared in excellent health and spirit, and seemed to have derived considerable benefit from the pure and bracing air of the Highlands. In addition to the Queen and Prince, and the noblemen and ladies in the royal suite, Lord Frederick and Lady Augusta Fitzclarence, Earl and Countess of Cawdor, Viscount and Viscountess Emlyn, Lord and Lady John Scott, and the officers of the Enniskillen Dragoons in command of the escort, and the officers of the 53rd Regiment commanding at Dalkeith, were the only guests who had the honour of joining the royal dinner circle. As usual, the fine band of the 53rd regiment performed during dinner. This morning her Majesty and Prince Albert walked for some hours in the grounds, quite privately, unattended by any member of their household. After luncheon, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, Sir James Forrest; Sir William Dryscale, the city treasurer; and Bailie Richardson, waited upon his Royal Highness Prince Albert, as representatives of the council, to present his Royal Highness with the freedom of the ancient and loyal city. The Duke of Buccleuch, Sir Robert Peel, and the Earl of Aberdeen, then gave audiences to the Lord Provost and civic deputation, when they had the honour of receiving the freedom of the city of Edinburgh. After the usual replies had been made, the Lord Provost and deputation retired. The Earl of Liverpool, acting for the Earl of Delawarr (lord chamberlane), went to Granton Pier before noon to-day, to personally inspect the preparations made on board the Trident, General Steam Navigation Company's vessel, for the comfort and convenience of her Majesty and Prince Albert, and their extensive retinue, in which steamer it is intended her Majesty should return to Woolwich, in order that the passage shall not be so tedious as was the case when in the Royal George yacht. The Very Rev. Dr. Lee, Principal of the University of Edinburgh, waited upon his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and had the honour to deliver to his Royal Highness the diploma of an honorary LL.D., conferred by the Senatus Academicus of that seat of learning. The Lord Provost and civic functionaries, Curators of the University, having retired, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch and a select circle, went out for a drive, and visited Roslin Chapel, Hawthornden, and returned to Dalkeith Palace about half past six o'clock. The dinner-party this evening was very select, it being confined entirely to the royal party and the officers of the Enniskillen Dragoons and the 53rd Regiment.

HER MAJESTY'S DEPARTURE FROM DALKEITH PALACE.

At an early hour—indeed before daybreak the inmates of the Palace were a-stir, from the active preparations which were being made for the departure of the Queen. The weather was most propitious. It had just gone seven when the Queen and Prince breakfasted together, and at about a quarter to eight her Majesty and his Royal Highness passed into the gallery. At precisely ten minutes after eight o'clock her Majesty and her august consort entered their carriage, when the military presented arms, and the regimental band struck up "God save the Queen." A detachment of the 6th or Enniskillen Dragoons immediately formed in front and rear of the royal carriage. The royal cortège passed out of the noble duke's princely demesne by the King's gate, and from thence by the Niddry-road to Edinburgh.

PROGRESS THROUGH THE CITY OF EDINBURGH.

The royal cortege entered the city by Preston-street, about twenty-five minutes before nine o'clock, and hundreds of respectably-dressed persons had congregated, and loudly hailed the royal party with boisterous cheering. From Preston-street the royal route was by the South and North Bridges, where barricades were erected to prevent the unruly pressure from the general populace. On her Majesty's carriage passing across High-street to the North Bridge, a salute of twenty-one guns was fired from the castle heights; and, as the crowd had greatly increased, the pace of the horses was slackened. At the end of North Hanover-street, Sir John Hope, Bart., commanded a company of the Royal Archers, the Queen's Body Guard for Scotland, and on the cortège reaching that part of the city from Princes-street, the archers ranged themselves in single file on each side of the Queen's carriage. The windows of every house in Pitt-street, and the whole length of the Cannonmills Bridge, were occupied by elegantly-dressed ladies, and the multitude thronging those thoroughfares was so intense as to render it necessary to have parties of the military stationed at the entries to prevent any accidents. The slopes on the side of the Queensferry-road were literary covered by thousands of persons, who sent up an enthusiastic burst of applause as her Majesty and the Prince passed to the pier, the ladies waving their handkerchiefs in token of their exultation. It was half-past nine when the cheering of the people announced the near approach of the Queen and suite, and almost in lastly the royal carriage passed on to the pier amidst the incandescent demonstrations of the rest of the hundreds of thousands congregated in all directions and places that could command even a glimpse of the pier and the Frith.

EMBARKATION OF HER MAJESTY.

On Thursday morning her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert embarked at Granton Pier on their return to Woolwich. Owing to a circular having been issued by the Lord Provost on the preceding morning, the public were made fully acquainted with all the necessary details respecting her Majesty's embarkation. As early as seven o'clock hundreds were making their way to the vicinity of the pier, and the whole line of the royal route was densely thronged by thousands of respectably attired persons. The Commander of the Forces, Major-General Sir N. Douglas, K.C.B., with Lord Robert Kerr, and the officers composing the Staff of North Britain, were on the spot by half-past seven. A guard of honour of the 53rd Regiment arrived on the pier at half-past seven, with the band of the Enniskillen Dragoons, and shortly afterwards a guard of the Royal Archers (the Queen's Body-guard for Scotland), under the command of Lord Elcho, the Earl of Dalhousie, and Sir George Al'eanzie, arrived from Edinburgh, preceded by the efficient band of that ancient military corps. The 53rd Regiment formed themselves in double column by the second jetty and along the edge of the pier, the Royal Archers lining the gangway on each side. The Trident was moored on the east side of the pier, and about this time a signal was given, and nearly every vessel in the Frith, with the exception of the Royal George yacht, the Daphne, and other vessels of war and steamers in her Majesty's service, dressed their rigging with their signal flags and streamers. The firing of the Castle guns on the entrance of the royal cortège into the city from Dalkeith, was responded to by the firing of a salute from on board the Daphne corvette and Juseur brig. The face of the Frith presented a most lively and animated appearance, from the numberless craft that crowded its surface, all displaying a national flag. On her Majesty's arrival on the pier, the carriage drew up near to the end of the platform, and the Duke of Buccleuch and the Earl of Liverpool were instantly at the carriage door to assist her Majesty to alight. The guard of honour of the 53rd Regiment saluted her Majesty, and the bands of the Enniskillen Dragoons and Royal Archers played simultaneously the national anthem. The Queen passed along the platform to the steamer, leaning on the arms of the Duke of Buccleuch and the Earl of Liverpool, closely followed by his Royal Highness Prince Albert. It was exactly twenty-four minutes to ten o'clock when her Majesty stepped on board the steamer, amidst a salute from the artillery in the meadows near Queensferry-road, and the hearty cheers of the sailors who manned the yards. Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Brace, K.C.B., the Admiral in command, Captain Bullock, Commander Crouch, Lieut. Cantram, and several other naval officers in commission with the steamer, were on board to receive her Majesty. The Admiralty flag was, on her Majesty's going on board, hoisted from the fore-mast, and the royal standard was hoisted on the mainmast, Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Brace displaying his flag on the mizen topmast. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert then took farewell of the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, the Earl of Cawdor, Lord and Lady John Scott, and Viscountess Emlyn. Major-General Sir Niel Douglas, K.C.B., Commander of the Forces, and Admiral Sir P. H. Durham, had the honour of being introduced to her Majesty, and before the steamer got under weigh, Lord A. Fitzclarence took leave of the Queen and the Prince, some remark on the part of his Lordship to her Majesty exciting the laughter of the royal pair. On his Lordship retiring her Majesty and the Prince ascended the poop, and their appearance was again the signal for a burst of enthusiastic admiration, and ten minutes before ten the steamer got fairly out at sea, the wind blowing lightly from S.W. The Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward; the Duchess of Norfolk, Lady in Waiting; Earl of Hardwicke, Lord in Waiting; Major-General Wemyss, Equerry in Waiting; and Hon. Miss Paget, Maid of Honour in Waiting on her Majesty; and Colonel Bouverie, and Mr. G. E. Anson, in attendance on his Royal Highness Prince Albert, were on board. The Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, Earl of Cawdor, Lord and Lady John Scott, Viscount and Viscountess Emlyn, on the steamer getting into the roads, left the pier, on their return to Dalkeith Palace. On the Trident passing, the Daphne corvette fired a salute, an example which was followed by the other vessels of war in the Frith of Forth. The Royal Archers next retired, and the military shortly afterwards proceeded to their barracks.

The following facts, regarding her Majesty's voyage, are extracted from a private letter. Her Majesty and the Prince kept on deck all day. They were determined to have one more look at every interesting object, and their questions showed some knowledge of the coast. As they approached the district of Alnwick Castle they began a little debate as to whether the edifice would be seen or not. The Queen thought they should see it; Prince Albert was of the contrary opinion; and one word brought up another, until they appealed to Captain Bullock, who gave his casting vote against her Majesty, explaining that it was covered by a dip in the land. However, if the castle was not seen, it was very well heard, for it fired a royal salute in excellent style. On Friday morning the Trident was off Flamborough-head. When islands were approached they sailed between them and the main-land, steering as well as possible through the centre of any fleet of merchant ships which they came up with, her Majesty being desirous that all parties should have an opportunity of seeing and being seen. When they made the Fern Islands her Majesty remembered the heroism of Grace Darling, and was evidently touched on hearing that the brave young woman had died a few days before. The Queen is a good sailor, but as yet Prince Albert does not relish the salt water. He was so distressed at one time that he was obliged to say he was "struggling between nausea and hunger." The Queen assured him it would be all over by the time he reached Windsor Castle, at which he could not help laughing a little. The redundancy and curiosity of the fair sex astonished him. "Wherever I go," he said, "I see as many women as men, even here at sea in open boats."

HER MAJESTY OFF THE COAST OF NORTHUMBERLAND.—On Thursday the Vesta steamer sailed from Newcastle with a very respectable though not very numerous party, desirous of meeting her Majesty on her return from Scotland. About six o'clock, P.M., when opposite to Dunstanborough, the vessel spoke the Black Eagle steamer, which formed part of the royal squadron, and from which it was learned that her Majesty was approaching. With this encouragement the party pursued their course, and quickly saw the Trident steamer coming from between the Fern Islands. The captain of the Vesta, with a desire to oblige to the uttermost, strove as much as possible to lessen the distance from her Majesty, and ultimately came within about fifteen yards. The Queen and Prince Albert, with Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, were on the quarter-deck, and no sooner were they seen, than they were greeted with loud and enthusiastic cheers—the united bands struck up the national anthem—and a royal salute was fired. Her Majesty acknowledged this mark of loyalty in the most condescending manner, and Prince Albert took off his cap and bowed repeatedly. Her Majesty wore a pink bonnet and blue mantle, and her royal Consort was enveloped in a large blue coat, with a military cap. Captain Sharp was at the helm of the Trident, and many officers were observed on board. About a quarter of a mile astern was the Monarch steamer, and behind that another vessel. The Vesta sailed alongside her Majesty as long as she could, and on parting the cheering was renewed.—Newcastle Courant.

PROGRESS TO TOWN.—Upon the royal cortège leaving Woolwich Dockyard, her Majesty and Prince Albert were loudly cheered by an immense concourse of persons that had lined the lower road leading to Greenwich. Her carriage proceeded at a quick pace, preceded by outriders, and escorted by a detachment of the 8th Hussars, under the command of Captain Rolles. On passing the Royal Hospital, Greenwich, the veterans of that institution hoisted the royal standard, and the out 1000, that were drawn up on the lawn with their officers, strove to excel the demonstrations of loyalty that the boys of the Naval School opposite, to the number of 800, manifested as her Majesty passed. The band of the Naval School played the national anthem, and on the spire of St. Alphage church proudly waved the royal standard. The royal carriages proceeded through Deptford, Peckham, and over Vauxhall-bridge, through Hyde Park, to the terminus of the Great Western Railway, at Paddington, where her Majesty arrived at a quarter-past eleven.

DEPARTURE FOR WINDSOR.—The Directors of the Great Western Railway Company, to prevent any delay, had directed a special train to be in readiness for her Majesty's use from seven o'clock on Friday evening, and the principal officers of the company were kept in attendance during the night. The engine chosen on this occasion to give impetus to the royal train was the "Erebus," which was decorated with a large union-jack at each of the four corners, whilst a profusion of laurels adorned the top and sides of the boiler, &c. The temporary platform on the side of the line, used by the down trains, which has been before used, was again brought into requisition, and every preparation made for the accommodation of the royal party. Shortly after eleven o'clock, a messenger from the Admiralty arrived at the railway with information that a telegraphic despatch had been received from Woolwich that her Majesty and Prince Albert had landed at the dockyard at half-past ten, and would reach Paddington shortly before twelve o'clock. By half-past eleven o'clock a large number of elegantly dressed females, friends of the directors, who had been admitted by tickets, had taken up a position on either side of the platform, which was covered with handsome crimson carpeting; and precisely at a quarter to twelve o'clock the advance of the escort entered the terminus. The royal cortège consisted of two of the royal carriages, each drawn by four horses, preceded by outriders, and escorted by a troop of the 8th Hussars. Her Majesty, who, although labouring under the effects of considerable fatigue, appeared in the enjoyment of good health, was dressed in a tartan silk dress, and was received on her alighting by Charles Russell, Esq., M.P., the chairman of the company; Mr. C. Saunders, the secretary; and Mr. S. Clerk, the superintendent of the line, by whom she was conducted to the royal saloon carriage, which, with two other saloon carriages and one of the second class, formed the special train. Her Majesty, we rejoice to say, appeared in high spirits, as did also her illustrious consort Prince Albert, whose sunburnt countenance gave him a much older appearance. At eleven minutes to twelve o'clock the engine was set in motion, and the royal train, which was accompanied by the above officers of the company, sped on its course to Slough, amidst the enthusiastic cheering of the persons assembled.

THE STEAM-SHIP TRIDENT.—This fine vessel left her moorings off Woolwich dockyard at an early hour on Sunday morning, and came up to the General Steam Navigation Company's wharf at Deptford. In addition to the medical staff which accompanied her Majesty, the royal suite consisted of three dressers, two pages, three cooks, and four footmen. The ladies' saloon was converted into the admiral's mess; and, in order to disturb the privacy of the royal couple as little as possible, an additional staircase was opened from the deck. Her Majesty suffered from sickness during the first night, but afterwards recovered, and had no relapse. The Trident had no freight on board, but carried nearly 500 tons of coals as ballast. Captain Sharp, her commander, had the active superintendence of the vessel during the voyage, and was in constant communication with Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Brace and Captain Bullock. The Trident lay at anchor off the Nore on Saturday morning for four hours and a half, in order to allow the Black Eagle, with the Duchess of Norfolk and Miss Paget, to arrive at Woolwich before her Majesty. After the landing of her Majesty on Saturday, the Trident was placed in a convenient position off the dockyard, Woolwich, that the arrangements made on board for the reception of her Majesty might be inspected by the officers and authorities. It was stated to be the intention of the directors that the fittings and furniture used on the occasion by her Majesty should be immediately taken down and carefully preserved, that they may not be employed in any less dignified service.

PROVINCIAL.

NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

NORWICH, Sept. 15.—The excitement exhibited this morning in this quiet and peaceful town was quite extraordinary. Every street was thronged with equipages, and parties hastening towards St. Andrew's-hall, and with crowds of people assembled to gaze on the brilliant scene. Within ten minutes of the opening of the doors, every part of the spacious hall was completely filled, and those who came afterwards found admission out of the question. Before the performance began, Professor Taylor addressed the audience, and said, in the name of the committee, that they had occasion, for the first time, to regret that the size of the hall was insufficient for the company who wished to be present, and that those who found themselves unpleasantly crowded, if they chose to leave the hall, should receive tickets of admission to either of the subsequent performances they might prefer. Besides the 2000 persons who filled the hall, 500 at least could not obtain admission.

The first part of this day's performances consisted of several fine specimens of ecclesiastical music. First of all, there was the chorus from Joshua, "Ye sons of Israel," one of Handel's most sublime efforts. Now came the great object of expectation, The Fall of Babylon, an oratorio, by Louis Spohr, Maestro di Capello to his Serene Highness the Elector of Hesse Cassel, which same Elector, exercising his sovereign will and pleasure, has been graciously pleased to refuse permission to the illustrious composer to superintend the performance of his work. It has fortunately happened that this superintendence has been committed to able hands; and Spohr's confidence in his friend and coadjutor, Professor Taylor, has been amply justified by the result, for a more perfect performance, and a more enthusiastic reception, could not have been witnessed. Both as a dramatic poem, and as a musical composition, this oratorio is entitled to high consideration. The poem is, in the strictest acceptance of the word, an oratorio, or sacred musical drama. Its subject is of the grandest description—the destruction of the Assyrian power, and the restoration of the Hebrew people from their long and seemingly hopeless captivity. Its incidents are few, simple, and striking, such as can be rendered intelligible without the aid of theatrical exhibition and action; and its poetry is of a much higher class than is generally to be met with in the libretti of musical compositions.

At present a short account of the subject of the poem must suffice. At its commencement the scene lies on the banks of the Euphrates, near Babylon. A chorus of Jews are bewailing their captivity, and crying to Jehovah for deliverance. The prophet Daniel joins in their prayers, and predicts their approaching restoration. The scene changes to the Persian camp; and, amid the most animated strains of martial music, the soldiers of Cyrus invoke the vengeance of Heaven on the criminal and devoted city. Within the city a Jewish mother is represented watching her sleeping child, and weeping over the unconscious innocent, doomed to a life of bondage in a strange land. Her husband enters, bringing joyful tidings. Their inspired prophet has seen, in a vision, the long delayed redemption of the Hebrew race. In the second act, the scene is laid in the banquet-hall, in the palace of Belshazzar. The Assyrian monarch is feasting amid the magnificence of his voluptuous court, when the joyous strains of the festive group are interrupted by the dark and boding murmurs of the Jewish captives, assembled, we may suppose, round the doors of the hall. The King addresses them in terms of anger and contempt; and, by way of insult, commands the rich and sacred vessels, which once adorned the Temple, to be brought before him and employed in their unholy festivities. While he is exulting in fancied power and security, the terrible handwriting appears on the wall. The revellers fly in terror and dismay. The King calls for his soothsayers to explain the portentous prodigy, and, on confessing their inability, Daniel, the Jewish captive, is called for. While he is speaking, the distant march of the Persians is heard, and a soldier, with breathless haste, announces to Belshazzar that the foe is upon him. Cyrus, by turning the course of the Euphrates, has been enabled to enter the city; the Babylonian empire is destroyed; and the deliverance of the chosen people is celebrated in songs of devout and pious rejoicing. Its performance was admirable. The dramatis personæ were cast thus:—Daniel, Mr. Hobbs; Cyrus, Mr. Phillips; Belshazzar, Mr. Balfe; Israelitish Man, Mr. Young; Soothsayer, Mr. Walton; Persian Soldiers, Messrs. Perring and Bradbury; Israelitish Women, Madame Caradori and Miss Rainforth; Nicotris (Mother of Belshazzar), Miss Hawes. The chorus consisted of Israelites, Persian and Babylonian soldiers, and priests of Bel. The performance was wonderful. Listening to it with the score in your hands, not a single error could be detected. By the regulations, no applause was permitted, but everybody accustomed to observe the demeanour of large audiences knows that besides the vulgar demonstration of clapping of hands, there are many signs by which the general feeling can be discovered. The universal impression is, that The Fall of Babylon is the greatest work which its illustrious author has yet produced, and the tidings of its triumphant success will console him for having been deprived of the gratification of witnessing it.

The concert of Thursday evening was composed of very popular materials. Mozart's Symphony in D, with which it commenced, was followed by the Irish ballad, "The meeting of the waters," sung by Mr. Hobbs with the utmost delicacy and feeling, qualities in which, among the tenor singers of the day, this gentleman has no rival. It was encored. We may observe, that the same compliment was paid to the other national ballads sung in the course of the evening. "Auld Robin Gray," sung by Miss Rainforth, and Dibdin's "'Twas post meridian," sung by Mr. Phillips. The second part commenced with Weber's imaginative overture, "The ruler of the spirits." Madame Caradori then sang the cavatina, "In questo semplice," from Betly—a pleasing trifle, which she warbled very gracefully. Rubini was much more at home in his favourite air from Lucia de Lammermoor than in Adelaida.

The morning performance of Friday last, which closed this great festival, was one of a most extraordinary character, and will long live in the memories of those who were so fortunate as to witness it. The oratorio performed was that of the Samson of Handel, with new words, selected, arranged, and adapted to Handel's music by Mr. Taylor.

The oratorio was performed with an unction, energy, and expression which appealed irresistibly to the feelings of the audience. Every feeling had its just development: whether the deep pathos of distress, the fervid prayer of faith, the loud and heart-rending wail of misery and death, the cold starlight of the funeral wail, the anticipations of celestial happiness—each and all were depicted with a truth and intensity which leave admiration nothing to desire. The music and expression of it were unparalleled in grandeur and sublimity. The personages of the drama were represented by Mr. Hobbs, Mr. Phillips, Mr Balfe, Mr. Bradbury, Miss Hawes, Madame Caradori Allan, and Miss Rainforth. To each all were assigned exquisite songs, which were, in truth, exquisitely delivered. The hall was not so crowded as on Thursday morning; but had the same care been taken in announcing the merits of the new oratorio of Handel as with that of Spohr, it would have certainly drawn as great an audience. Thus has terminated the Norwich festival for 1842, the most successful, in a pecuniary point of view, that has yet taken place. It has been attended by great and unprecedented audiences, by those who love music for its own sweet sake, by those who have laudable but limited perceptions of its beauty, and by those who like it for the sake of amusement, for worldly objects, and other extraneous influences. The sale of tickets exhibits an increase of receipts amounting to nearly nearly £700 above the festival of 1839. The attendance on the oratorios and concerts included almost every family in the county, as well as vast numbers from Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, London, and a greater distance.

We are sorry to learn that the demonstrations of gladness that welcomed her Majesty's arrival in the Highlands was attended with a painful and fatal accident. On the night her Majesty reached Taymouth, among the most prominently illuminated features around was that of Birnam, on the top of which hundreds had been carrying materials throughout the day, to have a blaze worthy of the occasion on so classic a spot. Among those employed in conveying faggots to the top of the hill was a forester, residing in the neighbourhood, who had been taking up a load pretty late at night, when he missed his footing, and fall.ng over one of the steep precipices that abound there, was killed on the spot. He has left a wife and numerous family to mourn his loss.—Perthshire Courier.

It is proposed to raise a subscription on behoof of those who have suffered from the melancholy accident which occurred during the Queen's progress through this city. Her Majesty has left £100 to be applied to this purpose. Sir Robert Peel has also contributed £20.—Caledonian Mercury.

Sir Matthew Wood has purchased the property belonging to the late Mr. James Wood, in Cheltenham, on which he intends to make great improvements.

AMERICAN FLOUR.—The Athlone steamer arrived in Belfast on Thursday week, from Liverpool, having on board between 400 and 500 barrels of prime American flour.

STATE OF TRADE IN PAISLEY.—By vigorous efforts made by the Relief Committee for reducing the number on their list for assistance, the amount of persons dependent on them has this week been brought down to less than 7000. During the week work has still continued scarce, and there are a considerable number of persons suffering severely.—Glasgow Argus.

STAGE-COACH DUTIES.—By an act of the last session of Parliament, which is to come into force on Saturday week, the 1st October, the stage-coach duty, per mile, is reduced one-half—viz., from 3d. to 1½d.

EXTRAORDINARY TRAIN ON THE PRESTON AND WYRE RAILWAY.—On Friday week, being the Guild week, the scholars of the different Sunday-schools in Preston were treated by their teachers and other friends with a trip per railway to Fleetwood-on-Wyre, which delightful place they enjoyed themselves most heartily in, parading the different streets, &c. The number of scholars was 2164, exclusive of teachers and others, to the number of 200, making in the whole train 2364 persons, which were gallantly drawn by the Preston and Wyre No. 1 engine, in 27 open carriages.—Preston Chronicle.

STRIKE AT ABBEY WEAVING MILL.—On Monday last the females employed in the weaving factory, Abbey Close, struck work for an advance of wages. The claim made is a rise from 10½d. to 1s. At an interview with the workers on Tuesday, the master stated his willingness to raise the sum to the price sought, provided he could obtain a corresponding rise on his goods; but this being conditional, the strike continues. Several of the workers were willing to continue at work; but on Monday female sentinels stood near the gate to prevent them from going in. The number of weavers is from 70 to 80, and the wages would run 8s. to 10s. a fortnight. The other workers thrown idle amount to from 20 to 30.—Paisley Advertiser.

EXTENSIVE SEIZURE OF TOBACCO.—An extensive seizure of contraband tobacco was made at Passage, Waterford, late on Friday afternoon, on board the schooner Eliza Ann, John Adair master, of and from Liverpool, bound for New Ross, apparently laden with salt. The vessel had just arrived in the port when she was boarded by the revenue officers of Passage. She was brought up to the city on Saturday morning, and her salt and tobacco were taken out and landed: 470 bales of tobacco were found, which, at 60lb. each, amount to 28 200lb. The captain, mate, and master sweep, on board the schooner Eliza Ann, John Adair master, of and from Liverpool, bound for New Ross, apparently laden with salt. The vessel had just arrived in the port when she was boarded by the revenue officers of Passage. She was brought up to the city on Saturday morning, and her salt and tobacco were taken out and landed: 470 bales of tobacco were found, which, at 60lb. each, amount to 28 200lb. The captain, mate, and crew were brought before the mayor, and committed by him for further examination. The vessel is new, and of about 70 tons burden. It is believed that she had been a long time out of Liverpool, and strong reason exists for thinking that in the interim she went over to Holland to take the tobacco on board. The duty on the quantity seized would exceed £4000.—Waterford Mirror.

EMPLOYING A CLIMBING BOY.—CAUTION TO HOUSEKEEPERS.—On Saturday, at the Police-court, Liverpool, John Martin, a master sweep, was fined £5 for sending a boy, aged 16, up a chimney. The housekeeper escaped the fine by pleading ignorance.

FORFAR—DEPLORABLE SUICIDE OF THE REV. MR. ROGERS, OF ROSCOBIE.—Mr. Rogers, it seems, has for some years back been subject to temporary fits of insanity. He had been suffering under one of those fits of mental aberration for the last few weeks. Early on the morning of Saturday last, about four o'clock, it is thought, he went out of the manse. His family were in the greatest distress at his disappearance, and they knew not what had become of him till the heart-rending intelligence was brought to them that their father's lifeless body had been found in the Loch of Roscobie. From the appearance of the body—all it was accidentally discovered by two men fishing—it is supposed that it must have been twelve hours amongst the water. The night preceding the day on which Mr. Rogers committed the rash act of suicide, his family thought him so much better that an attendant was considered unnecessary. No person, therefore, was with him to see to his security, and none saw him depart from the manse. By Mr. Rogers's untimely end his family have been plunged into the deepest distress.—Caledonian Mercury.

INCENDIARY FIRE AT BRADFIELD ST. GEORGE.—About eleven o'clock on Wednesday week a fire was discovered on the premises of Mrs. Laite, of Bradfield St. George, the barn, which stood alongside the road, being completely enveloped in flames. The property destroyed consisted of the large barn, containing the crop of wheat off fifteen acres, and the barley off thirteen acres; the old barn, containing a quantity of barley, oats, and peas; one bean stack, one clover stack, one hay stack, and a stack of tares; the granary, containing twenty-five coombs of corn, some turnip seed, and some wool; the great stable, the little stable, in which a pony was burnt to death; two sows in pig were both burnt to death, and a number of fowls. The stock and crops were insured in the Suffolk Fire-office to the amount of £300; but the amount of property destroyed will most likely prove to be £600 or £700. The premises were the property of the Rev R. Davers. The present occupier was about to quit, and an auction was to have taken place in a few days. It is generally believed to have been the diabolical act of an incendiary.—Essex Herald.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT EXETER.—Between nine and ten o'clock on Friday week an extensive fire occurred in Exeter, which in a short space of time burned down a spacious warehouse in the occupation of Messrs. Hall and Parnell, wholesale grocers, situate in Waterbeer-street. Although no precise information could be obtained as to the origin of the fire, no doubt is entertained but that it arose from a spark of one of the workmen's candles falling amongst a heap of rice bags in the lowermost floor. The amount of property destroyed is calculated at £3000.

SINGULAR AND FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Saturday evening a fatal accident took place on the sands in the river Ribble, about seven miles from Preston, under very distressing circumstances. Warton, seven miles from Preston, is the nearest way to Lancaster and Lytham, and the unfortunate individual whose life was lost was William Grimbaldeston, the landlord of the Hesketh Arms, on Hesketh Banks. He was accompanied across the first channel by the guide on the opposite side, from Warton, until he was considered out of the reach of danger. Subsequently, however, he mistook his way, and got entangled amongst some fishing-nets, when the tide, rapidly approaching, he was surrounded by the water, and his cries for assistance were heard on both shores for upwards of an hour. A boat was put off, but the night being very dark, the persons on board could not reach him, although they heard him in his last dying agonies. His body was not discovered until the next morning, when it was found entangled amongst the fishing-nets.

CRIME IN ESSEX.—We observe with regret that the number of prisoners within the walls of the convict gaol, Springfield, is increasing to an extent most unusual at this period of the year. Last night 246 were in custody of Mr. Neve, in that gaol, no fewer than 42 of whom have been committed within the last week. On the corresponding day in the previous year there were only 171. It is difficult to account for this state of things just at the close of harvest.—Essex Herald.

FATAL PRIZE-FIGHT.—Salisbury was on Monday last disgraced by a prize-fight, in which a young man, eighteen years of age, named James Lenton, fell a victim to his adversary, a person about his own age, named Joseph Coombs. It appears that a spirit of rivalry has for some time been manifested in both the combatants, who were first cousins, and both of them by trade cordwainers, and Monday was fixed upon for a trial of prowess. Accordingly a wager was laid, and the parties, having calmly selected their seconds and bottle-holders, proceeded to a field near Lobcombe-gate, about a mile on the London-road, where they were prohibited by the owner from exhibiting their brutal-like passions. Nothing disconcerted, however, they repaired to a meadow some quarter of a mile nearer the city, but also within the precincts of the borough, and commenced fighting. The combat lasted nearly an hour, with half-minute intervals between the rounds: but before many had been fought the deceased was beaten "stone-blind." In order, however, that this misadventure should not interrupt the exhibition, his eyes were lanced, and he continued to fight until nature became entirely exhausted, and he was heard to say that he would give in. At this time he was ghastly pale, and trembled from head to foot, but being overpersuaded to have one round more, he stood up for that purpose, and while Coombs was again putting himself in a fighting attitude, the deceased fell to rise no more. At this period, although life was evidently all but extinct, the conquering party drew the stakes, and almost immediately repaired to their rendezvous, leaving the deceased upon the field. There he was allowed to remain about a quarter of an hour, and was then removed on a hurdle to the Salisbury Infirmary, but before the poor fellow reached the institution death put an end to his sufferings. The magistrates immediately ordered the police to apprehend the parties concerned, and one of the seconds, named Read, is already in custody; and, as the others are known, we trust that every one will be punished. We regret to add that upwards of 200 persons witnessed this revolting transaction.

A LOCUST.—A specimen of the locust tribe, an uncommon visitor in this country, was found on Monday, in the Town-well-field, by a boy.—Stafford Examiner.

LITTLE HAMPTON, SUNDAY.—DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—A little before twelve last night, this town and neighbourhood were thrown into the greatest consternation and alarm by a fire breaking out on the premises of Mr. John Butt, jun., timber merchant and builder, ending in the total destruction of the workshops, deal houses, and paint stores, together with a considerable portion of the brewery adjoining, belonging to Mr. Butt, sen. The cause of the fire is unknown.

SHARK CAUGHT IN BERWICK BAY.—On Friday, as one of the boats was engaged in the turbot fishing, to the eastward of Berwick, the crew was surprised by a fish of unusual shape and dimensions becoming entangled with their net, and which, on being taken up with some difficulty, proved to be a fine young shark. He measured eight feet in length by four feet eight inches of girth.—Berwick Warder.

THE HARVEST, &c.—Along the whole range of the Clyde, from its source downward, upon the holms and early lands, there is scarcely a stook to be seen out, and the appearance of the barn-yards indicates what kind of return the farmer has had. We observe that, in several places in our own locality, the farmer has begun to clear out his potato ground, and make preparations for another crop.—Reformer's Gazette.

HARVEST IN SCOTLAND.—Although in some very late situations and on the late-sown lands, a few stooks are still visible in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, they are so few in number as to scarcely be worthy of notice. In the district of Gala Water, and in the whole valley of the Tweed from Peebles to Berwick, the crop is secured; and although in the high and late tract of land from Fala to Spott, along the northern edge of the Lammermoors in East Lothian, there is still a small quantity to carry, the bulk of the crop there also is in the stackyard.—Caledonian Mercury.

THE DISTURBED DISTRICTS.

PRESTON, Monday Evening.—In the course of last week a writ came down from the Lord Chancellor, addressed to the Clerk of the Crown for the Duchy of Lancaster, ordering a gaol delivery for October 1st at Lancaster. The prisoners in the gaol at Salford from Manchester and the surrounding neighbourhood are very numerous, but in the Preston House of Correction there are only five, and in Lancaster but two, committed on charges connected with the late riots. There will be two courts open. The three individuals who were wounded by the fire of the soldiers on the same day still remain in the House of Correction, enduring considerable suffering. One of these, a steam-loom weaver, 21 years of age, who was shot through the cap of the knee, had his leg amputated immediately about six inches above; another, Bryan Hutchings, a shoemaker, was wounded in the side, the bullet still remaining in the body; and the third, aged 21, was shot through the wrist. It will be some time before they can leave this benevolent institution; but, in consequence of their sufferings, the Recorder has kindly informed them, that although the two former were recognised as amongst the most active leaders of the mob on the late fatal occasion, their prosecution will not be proceeded with. In addition to Lancaster and Merser, the individuals who died in this establishment, these are the only ones amongst the wounded who were taken there. The two other men died at their own homes, where also many of the other wounded were conveyed, whose number is not estimated, but the same forbearance is shown to them as with those at present in the House of Recovery. The spirit of chartism and insurrection is entirely broken in the town. The people are all orderly and quiet, and remain content at their work. The Mayor and magistrates have wholly forbidden political or other meetings of a dangerous character.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday Morning.—During yesterday and this morning, more of the power-loom weavers have returned to labour, and now several large factories are at full work. There are also symptoms of a general resumption of labour in this town, and it is expected before the end of the week the general strike, so far as regards Manchester, will be at an end. The weavers, however, affirm, that the return to work is merely temporary, and they assert that preparations are making for another extensive cessation from labour until they obtain better terms with the masters. This, it is to be hoped, will not be carried into effect. The town this morning presents a more healthy appearance than it has done for more than a month past, so far as regards peace and order; but yesterday there was very great excitement, arising out of the determination of the weavers and others to march in public procession from the house of the deceased rioter, to the burial ground of the Rev. Mr. Scholefield, in Every-street, Peterloo, where it was determined to inter the corpse. This intention was frustrated by the police.

During the presence of the police force at the funeral, a small mob of about twenty persons attacked the factory of Messrs. Thompson, in Wharf-street, Canal-street, demolished all the windows and window-frames on the lower story, and broke about 150 squares in the other windows. This accomplished, they scampered off before the arrival of any of the police force.

WEDNESDAY.—The "turn-out" is rapidly approaching to a close. This morning an additional number of weavers resumed labour, and in Ashton, Staleybridge and Hyde the operatives have gone to work, in some instances at an advance, but chiefly at the old rate of wages.

ASHTON.—The Ashton and Staleybridge districts (three are the only exceptions, viz. Messrs. Hyde, Sons, and Sowcroby's; Mr. J. S. Buckley's, and another) are in full work, or are preparing to start this (Wednesday) morning. Mr. Buckley's hands, we are informed, after going to work on Monday morning, turned out yesterday evening. Mr. Buckley having discovered that he had been giving more than his neighbours for similar work, and having resolved that he would pay just the same prices as the other manufacturers in the town, which was not acceptable to his hands. The others not now at work are expected to recommence in the course of a day or two.

BOLTON.—The operative cotton spinners, to the number of 401, employed by the associated millowners in this town, have turned out, the masters having refused to give the advance which they demanded. If to the number of spinners be added those who are unable to work without their aid, the number of turn-outs may be said to be at least 1400. The town, however, is in a peaceable state.

STOCKPORT, Monday.—This morning witnessed the general resumption of labour in this town. All the factories are now at work, and nearly with a full complement of hands. In this town there has existed the most protracted distress and the most prolonged turn-out.

THE COLLIERS' STRIKE.—The strike of the colliers in the Airdrie district continues in the same state as mentioned in our last. Rumours are in existence of some violent measures having been resorted to by the turn-outs, such as forcing those who have begun work to leave the pits, and other acts of intimidation; but these appear to be, after all, very trifling in their character, and are creating scarcely any alarm. Several persons have lately been taken into custody, charged with intimidating their fellow-workmen.—Glasgow Chronicle.

esting localities, were abundantly given and described in our last; and we now present the localities themselves, in a pictorial form, together with the scenes of all the gratifying events that marked her Majesty's excursion; the spots visited; the triumphal arches of welcome, with their flower-festooned architecture, gaily erected for the nonce; the rare and graceful devices by which they were surrounded; and all the elements of taste and fancy which contributed to adorn the natural, and to heighten the picturesque. To these illustrations we further append such statistical and historical descriptive notices—(gleaned from one of the best books of its kind ever published; Black's "Picturesque Tourist of Scotland")—as will serve to interest our readers, and identify our letter-press with what our artist's pencil has chosen to reflect or record. Meanwhile a reference to last week's paper will also always furnish a key to the news detail of each separate event. We begin with the entrance of her Majesty and her illustrious consort to Taymouth Park.

INVERKEITHING,

a royal burgh of very great antiquity. By its first existing charter, which it received from William the Lion, the town obtained jurisdiction over a very extensive tract of country, but its importance is now greatly reduced. It was frequently the residence of David I. and of Queen Annabella Drummond, wife of Robert III., and an antique house is yet pointed out which she is said to have inhabited. Great quantities of coal and salt are annually exported here. In the neighbourhood of Inverkeithing a body of Scottish loyalists were defeated with great slaughter by a superior force under the command of Lambert, the English Parliamentary general. In this engagement a foster-father and seven sons sacrificed themselves for Sir Hector M'Lean of Duart; the old man, whenever one of his boys fell, thrusting forward another to fill his place, at the right hand of the beloved chief, with the words, "Another for Hector." This incident has been introduced with great effect by Sir Walter Scott, in his description of the combat between the Clan Kay and Clan Chattan, in the "Fair Maid of Perth."

KINROSS,

the capital of the county of that name, is pleasantly situated on the banks of Loch Leven. Kinross House (Sir J. Graham Montgomery of Stanhope), erected in 1685, stands on the edge of the lake. The promontory on which it stands was once occupied by a stronghold, long the residence of the Earls of Morton. By far the most interesting object in the neighbourhood of Kinross is the lake, on the banks of which the town is situated. Loch Leven is remarkable not only on account of the beautiful scenery with which it is surrounded, but especially on account of the historical associations with which it abounds. This lake is of an irregular oval figure, and extends from ten to eleven miles in circumference. It contains four islands, the chief of which are St. Serf's Isle, near the east end, so named from its having been the site of a priory dedicated to St. Serf; and another, about two acres in extent, situated near the shore opposite Kinross, on which are the picturesque ruins of Loch Leven Castle, celebrated from its being the prison-house of the unfortunate Queen Mary.

"Gothic the pile, and high the solid walls,
With warlike ramparts, and the strong defence
Of jutting battlements: an age's toil!
No more its arches echo to the noise
Of joy and festive mirth. No more the glance
Of blazing taper through its windows beams,
And quivers on the undulating wave:
But naked stand the melancholy walls,
Lash'd by the wintry tempest, cold and bleak;
That whistle mournful through the empty halls,
And piecemeal crumble down the towers to dust."
Loch Leven, a Poem, by Michael Bruce.

ABERFELDY.

Three miles from Grandtully is the village of Aberfeldy, near which are the beautiful falls of Moness, said by Pennant to be an epitome of everything desirable in a waterfall. The description which Burns has given of these falls is not only beautiful in itself, but strikingly accurate:—

"The braes ascend like lofty wa's,
The foaming stream deep roarin fa's,
O'erhung wi' fragrant spreading shaws,
The burks of Aberfeldy.

"The hoary cliffs are crown'd wi' flowers,
White o'er the linn the burnie pours,
And rising, weets wi' misty showers
The burks of Aberfeldy."

The falls are three in number; the lowest is a mile from the village, the upper half a mile beyond it. The glen is deep, and so exceedingly confined, that the trees in some places almost meet from the opposite sides. The lowest fall consists chiefly of a series of cascades, formed by a small tributary rivulet pouring down the east side of the dell. The next series consists of a succession of falls, comprising a perpendicular height of not less than a hundred feet. The last and highest cascade is a perpendicular fall of about fifty feet. Here the traveller may cross the dell by means of a rustic bridge, and return to the inn by a varied route. Opposite Aberfeldy the Tay is crossed by one of General Wade's bridges. About a mile in advance, on the north side, stands Castle Menzies, the seat of Sir Neil Menzies, the chief of that name, erected in the sixteenth century. It stands at the foot of a lofty range of rocky hills, and is surrounded by a park filled with aged trees. Weem Castle, the former seat of the family, was burned by Montrose. About a mile further is Balfrax (Sir Neil Menzies, Bart.) and about a mile beyond, the Lyon water joins the Tay.

LOCH TAY.

Six miles from Aberfeldy the tourist reaches the beautiful little village of Kenmore, situated at the north-east extremity of Loch Tay. It consists of an inn and fifteen or sixteen houses neatly whitewashed, and some of them embowered in ivy, honeysuckle, and sweet briar.

The most remarkable object in the vicinity of Kenmore is Taymouth Castle, the princely mansion of the Marquis of Breadalbane, with its much-admired environs. The castle is a magnificent dark-grey pile of four stories, with round corner towers, and terminating in an airy central pavilion. Its interior is splendidly fitted up, and it contains one of the best collections of paintings in Scotland. The pleasure-grounds are laid out with great taste, and possess a striking combination of beauty and grandeur. The hills which confine them are luxuriantly wooded and picturesque in their outlines, and the plain below is richly adorned with old gigantic trees. The view from the hill in front of the castle is reckoned one of the finest in Scotland. On the right is Drummond hill, and behind it the lofty Ben Lawers, with Ben More in the remote distance. On the left two hills, partially wooded, rise from the water, one above another. In the foreground a portion of the lake is seen, and the village and church of Kenmore, and to the north of them the bridge across the Tay, immediately behind which is the little wooded island of Loch Tay, with the ruins of a priory founded by Alexander I., whose Queen, Sybilla, lies interred here. The scene is thus described in an impromptu of Robert Burns, who visited the spot in August 1787:—

"Th' outstretching lake, embosomed 'mong the hills,
The eye with wonder and amazement fills;
The Tay, meandering sweet in infant pride;
The palace rising by his verdant side;
The lawns wood-fringed, in Nature's native taste;
The hillocks dropt in Nature's careless haste;
The arches striding o'er the new-born stream;
The village glittering in the noontide beam."

Along the north bank of the river there is a terrace sixteen yards wide and three miles in length, overshadowed by a row of stately beech trees, and, on the opposite side, there is a similar walk extending a mile from Kenmore. These promenades are connected by a light cast-iron bridge.

TAYMOUTH CASTLE.

Taymouth Castle was first built by Sir Colin Campbell, sixth knight of Lochaw, in the year 1580. It was then, and until lately, called Balloch, from the Gaelic bealach, a word signifying the outlet of a lake or glen. The builder being asked why he had placed his house at the extremity of his estate, replied, "We'll brizzyont" (press forward), adding, that he intended Balloch should in time be in the middle of it. The possessions of the family have, however, extended in the opposite direction. They now reach from Aberfeldy, four miles eastward, to the Atlantic Ocean, a space upwards of one hundred miles, and are said to be the longest in Great Britain. Leaving Kenmore and Taymouth, the tourist proceeds along the shores of the loch to Killin, which is sixteen miles distant at the opposite extremity.

AUCHMORE HOUSE.

On leaving Killin the tourist proceeds up Glen Dochart, and passes, on the right, the mansion-house of Achlyne, a seat of the Marquis of Breadalbane. A little beyond, at a place called Leeks, a road strikes off to Crionlarich Inn, from which the tourist may either go by Tyndrum and Dalmally to Inverary, or he may descend by Glenfalloch till he reach the head of Loch Lomond. The traveller now enters Glen Ogle, a narrow and gloomy defile, hemmed in by the rocky sides of the mountains, which are here strikingly grand, rising on the one side in a succession of terraces, and on the other in a steep acclivity, surmounted by perpendicular precipices. At the distance of eight miles from Killin is the little village of Lochearnhead, with a good inn. From this point the tourist may turn southward by Balquhidder, the burial-place of Rob Roy, and through the wild pass of Loch Lubnaig and Lenny to Callander, a distance of thirteen miles.

LOCH EARN.

Loch Earn is about seven miles in length, and at out one mile in breadth. "Limited as are the dimensions of Loch Earn," says Dr. Macculloch, "it is exceeded in beauty by few of our lakes, as far as it is possible for many beauties to exist in so small a space. Its style is that of a lake of far greater dimensions—the hills which bound it being lofty, and bold, and ragged, with a variety of character not found in many of even far greater magnitude and extent. It is a miniature and model of scenery that might well occupy ten times the space. Yet the eye does not feel this. There is nothing trifling or small in the details—nothing to diminish its grandeur of style, and tell us we are contemplating a reduced copy. On the contrary, there is a perpetual contest between our impressions and our reasonings; we know that a few short miles comprehend the whole, and yet we feel as if it was a landscape of many miles—a lake to be ranked among those of first order and dimensions.

"While its mountains thus rise in majestic simplicity to the sky, terminating in bold, and various, and rocky outlines, the surfaces of the declivities are equally bold and various, enriched with precipices and masses of protruding rock, with deep hollows and ravines, and with the courses of innumerable torrents, which pour from above, and, as they descend, become skirted with trees, till they lose themselves in the waters of the lake. Wild woods also ascend along their surface in all that irregularity of distribution so peculiar to these rocky mountains, less solid and continuous than at Loch Lomond, less scattered and romantic than at Loch Katrine, but, from these very causes, aiding to confer upon Loch Earn a character entirely its own."

There is a road on each side of the lake, but the southern route is to be preferred. About a mile and a half from the inn we come to Edinample, an ancient castellated mansion belonging to the Marquis of Breadalbane. There is also a beautiful waterfall here, immediately below the road.

GATE AT DRUMMOND CASTLE.—THE 42ND HIGHLANDERS MARCHING OUT.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, Sept. 21, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Such is the rage for the promenade à cheval amongst all ladies of fashion, that one of the first requisites of elegance has become la recherché du costume amazone. Black is always the favourite colour for habits; the long skirt, of course, is unchangeable; the corsage is ornamented with buttons, and has no collar; the sleeves plain, and tight at the wrist; gloves of doeskin, turned up with velvet, and fastened with gold buttons. As regards the hat, most ladies still keep to the becoming man's hat, but some élégantes, to whose faces or figures this coiffure masculine may not be suitable, wear very pretty hats either of black or violet velvets; of these the crown is round, the brim large and turned up a little on one side with a loop, a black feather falling on the other side. A black lace fall round the brim of the hat sometimes takes the place of the veil. This hat is worn rather on one side, and its large brim is sufficient to keep off the sun's rays. This hat is considered the extreme of fashion in riding costume. For the country, a straw hat with green velvet ribbon and green veil is always considered as most appropriate.

Satin mantles are beginning to be worn, as suitable both to the autumnal and winter seasons. They are of pearl grey, bordered with a magnificent design in braid-work of the same shade. The lining is of rose colour; the collar is very large, and formed of round folds in quilling, and is closed at the top by a plain square collar.

And now as to the dress of which I send you a sketch. Bonnets are worn of crape, which material still takes the lead. You will perceive they are very open under the chin, and the strings are placed as far back as possible. A ruche is worn inside, and the outside is trimmed either with a rosette of ribbon, with broad ends, placed high on the side, or a demi-wreath of flowers. Curls are worn in promenade costume. The sleeves of the dress are made tight and braided in a small pattern up the seam: the body is tight, and high, the waist rounded; the skirt plain, but embroidered en soutache (braid) in a rich pattern from the throat to the hem. The skirt is worn long; a small lace collar and ruffles complete the dress, over which hang the graceful folds of a Cashmere shawl, embroidered in rich and bright colours. JULIE.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

Wednesday being St. Matthew's day, in pursuance of annual custom, the orations were delivered, in presence of the Lord Mayor and other civic authorities, by the senior scholars of Christ's Hospital, in the great hall of that ancient and truly valuable institution. In the morning the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, with the governors of the several royal hospitals, attended divine service at Christ Church, in Newgate-street, where a sermon of much excellence, and most appropriate to the occasion, was preached by the Rev. William Harrison, the domestic chaplain to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, morning preacher at the Magdalen, and one of the classical masters at Christ's Hospital. At the conclusion of this service, the civic functionaries and the governors of the various hospitals of royal foundation in the metropolis, repaired to the great hall before named, where a very crowded assemblage of visitors had already arrived, principally composed, no doubt, of the parents and friends of those who are deriving the blessings of a sound classical and religious education within the walls of the venerable establishment of which it forms a part. There was a large attendance also of the metropolitan clergy, and of members of many of the leading mercantile families of London, among whom there has always been exhibited a very laudable energy in advancing the interests of an institution which is at once an ornament and an honour to their city.

These annual academic celebrations are always occasions of the liveliest interest to those who reverence such monuments of the piety and considerate providence of our forefathers as Christ's Hospital, and some other foundations of a kindred character, present; and we have little sympathy with the man whose philanthropy is not animated by the sight of upwards of 800 young persons deriving the advantages of education, and enjoying the comforts of a peaceful asylum, in an institution like the ancient "Blue Coat School," which has for centuries been, as it were, the parent and benefactor of thousands, who but for it would have scarcely been enabled to have received an education to qualify them to fight their way through this busy and bustling world. The delivery of periodical orations, too, in scholastic establishments, is particularly conducive to emulation on the part of the students, and affords a most gratifying public acknowledgment of the proficiency of those who have done their teachers, their school, and themselves honour by their industry, conduct, and ability. Of such a character was the scene of yesterday, and we have much pleasure in shortly bearing testimony to the excellence of the speeches which were delivered, and, with few trifling exceptions, the very correct emphasis and expression by which their delivery was marked.

The following is a summary of the orations:—

Latin Oration, on the Benefits of the Royal Hospitals, George Edwin Patteuden, second Grecian, who is proceeding to St. Peter's College, Cambridge.

English Oration, on the same subject, Peter Hamil Hamill, first Grecian, who is proceeding to Pembroke College, Cambridge.

Greek Oration, on the same subject, Wm. Haig Brown, fourth Grecian, and Classical Medallist, who is proceeding to Pembroke College, Cambridge, as Thompson Exhibitioner.

French Oration, on the same subject, William Romanis, third Grecian, and "Times" Scholar, who is proceeding to Emmanuel College, Cambridge.

Latin Alcaics, on Alexander at the Tomb of Achilles, George Barnstre Pix, seventh Grecian.

Greek Iambics, on Saul at Endor, Augustus Spiller Harrison, fifth Grecian, and Mathematical Medallist.

English Ode, on the Birth of the Prince of Wales, John Smith Benfold, eighth Grecian.

Latin Hexameters, on the Praise of Alfred, Morton Amos Leicester, ninth Grecian.

Greek Sapphics, on the Power of Poetry, Arthur Chubb, sixth Grecian.

Latin Sapphics, on the Repeated Preservation of the Queen, Langham Dale, tenth Grecian.

Latin Elegiacs, on the Praise of Nelson, George James Gill twelfth Grecian.

English Poem, on Edward the Sixth, Edward Taylor Hudson, eleventh Grecian.

Of these speeches, the first was decidedly the one to which, without invidious distinction, the chief praise is due. It was a specimen of most elegant Latinity; and the allusions it contained to the many benefits attached to the institution, Christ's Hospital, to whose celebration it principally referred—the illustrations in which it pictured those great advantages, were as happily conceived as they were elegantly expressed. We are sure there were none present to whose ear the language of old Rome was familiar who did not appreciate, in the fullest extent, the excellent taste and feeling of the composer; and when the speaker, turning to the hundreds of his fellow-pupils in the gallery, referred more particularly to the asylum which the foundation afforded so many—who received gratuitous instruction and protection at the same time, omnibus miseris omni inopiâ—the appeal, we are sure, was met with the warmest sympathy from many a manly and generous bosom. We plead "not guilty" to so abundant a recollection of our Greek as to warrant any minute criticism of the Orations which were delivered in that language. We were enabled, however, to detect some expressions in these compositions which did ample credit to the acknowledged superiority of the classical instruction inculcated within the walls of this Hospital, and the Greek speeches were certainly delivered with much spirit, and with that ore rotundo which is requisite to give the proper fulness of sound and expression to the comprehensive language in which Demosthenes spoke and Homer sang. The "French Oration," by Mr. Romanis, was excellently well worded, and his pronunciation of the tongue, which enjoys the distinction of being "the language of the world," was more correct than we had anticipated. The "English Ode, on the Birth of the Prince of Wales," contained some allusions which were well introduced, and feelingly expressed, both with regard to manner and matter. Among these, a reference to the recent fatal accident to the Duke of Orleans was touchingly made; and the whole of the ode was very creditable to a schoolboy poet—on such an occasion fully justified in considering himself an embryo laureate. Some Latin sapphics, on the repeated preservation of the Queen from the hands of the assassin were very happy, and we cannot refrain from joining Master Dale in his expression of wonder that any one, humanam retinens figuram, could attempt to injure so amiable and excellent a Sovereign. The "Oration on Edward the Sixth," which was not so good in point of composition or delivery as the other speeches, concluded the proceedings of the day, which were on the whole, of a particularly pleasing and interesting character.

CHRIST CHURCH BOY.

We give the annexed figure of a Christ Church boy in his proper costume, so familiarly known in the streets of London. We deem it, however, necessary to say that the cut has been already published in an early number of our journal.

It is but fair to observe that even the senior Grecians were very youthful, and that the majority of the twelve were quite young. Altogether the greatest gratification appeared to be felt by all present.

[So much space is occupied with the engravings of the Scottish tour of her Majesty; that we must postpone our promised view of the interior of Christ's Hospital during the above interesting scene till next week, when we shall give a short history of the Institution.]

SOMERSET HOUSE STAMP OFFICE.—THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS PAPER UNLOADING.

Somerset House!—what takes your journal there,
(The anxious reader naturally axes
With very fairest of polite digressions)—
Somerset House—the house of stamps and taxes?
To which we answer in a tone as fair,
'Tis for such merchandise that we go there—
To buy up stamps before we sell impressions!

The process this—as first important dodge,
We seek the firm of Spalding and of Hodge,
And purchase paper there—
Ream upon ream, enough to make you stare,
Until in one grand solid pile it seems
As big as the Cathedral built of Rheims,
With which we do—what you of course desire
To know, and very naturally in-quire!

Well, then, we put a portion in a cart,
And give our man another cart to start
A carte-blanche, bless your heart!
Away he goes at once, and never tarries:
Meanwhile his laden dobbin little knows
Between the shafts (or how his heart 'twould please),
That by and bye, such shafts of wit as these
Will surely lighten all the load he carries!
When loads are thundering heavy, labour-heightening,
'Tis strange what penchant horses have for lightening!

Arrived at Somerset House, our cart gives not
Its freight a somerset upon the spot,
But is unladen there—
Taken down steps, and placed to get the air
In an official area of the nation.
Yes, all our reams go sliding down below,
In all of which there's nothing wrong, you know,
If station-ary suits an area station;

Although we should be done uncommon brown,
If rain came on, and it got wetted down!

Then by and bye—
It under shelter goes,
With load on load the groaning porters tramp,
Till Government, with a distinctive die,
Alters the colour of its worth, Heav'n knows,
And makes it of a very different stamp!
They print it red, by process quick and clever;
But when we print it 'tis more read than ever!

Next, they return our paper, that well earns
A right to boast of those same stamp returns,
Which prove,—and not a doubt the fact encumbers,—
That although young, we've learned to "lisp in numbers,"
While any little gentle castigation
That we receive but aids our circulation!
For let our brethren cut us as they may,
'Tis clear we still have better cuts than they!
Well—so we print with all our might and main—
Our steam gets up in Palmer's Court of Crane,
The willing engine deftly rolls along,
While blankets turn our sheets off throng on throng:
In trucks the reams, fast as they come to hand,
Are wheel'd into our office in the Strand;
And who that among hand-loom weavers dwell,
E'er saw truck-system ever work so well?
Then comes the business of the day—to sell!
Though publisher counts on with all his speed,
Our sale grows unaccountable indeed;
While all the newsmen—of our varied charms
Have quite enough of folding to their arms.
So numbers fly, until we grow too stint;
THE ILLUSTRATED NEWS is out of print?
Ho! rush to Palmer, then! bid him endeavour
Perpetual motion!—Print away for ever!

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—TUESDAY.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Merivale.)

IN EXPENSIVE COACH ACCIDENT IN RE JOHN IVORY.

The bankrupt carried on the business of a carpenter and waggoner, at High Wycombe, and his case has been frequently before the court. This day was fixed for his final adjournment examination. Mr. Edwin James said that the bankrupt's balance-sheet extended from July 1838 to the time of his failure in 1842, and he had not a single voucher or paper to verify his accounts. As to his assets, they were entirely unilateral, for all the debtors to his estate had either left their residences, or could not be found. Mr. Commissioner Merivale: There will be a great deal more examination, perhaps, to New York. The Official Assignee (Mr. Alsager): Or I suppose, sir, to Texas.—Mr. E. James: I find on the balance-sheet, sir, an extraordinary entry of £507, as the result of an accident caused by one of the bankrupt's waggons to the "Age" Oxford coach. This lumping sum is stated to be for doctors' expenses; repairs of coach and harness, innkeepers' bills for the support of passengers who were injured by the collision, and law expenses: and I want to know how the bankrupt computes all this to amount to £507, for up to this moment we have nothing to show even that the accident occurred.

Mr. Commissioner Merivale: There can be no difficulty, I suppose, in procuring a newspaper of the next day, containing an account of the accident, or, at all events, the doctors' bills for their attendance on those persons who were injured by the accident.—The bankrupt, being sworn, was examined at very considerable length by Mr. E. James, and stated in substance that his balance-sheet was made out by Mr. Perkins, and the items were supplied from his (bankrupt's) memory. The accident referred to occurred at Dashwood-hill, and for several weeks he had to pay from £11 to £15 for the support of the parties who were injured, both at Wycombe and Oxford. In one or other he had paid upwards of £200, and after that a person of the name of Simms brought an action against him for injury sustained by his wife, but which he obtained a friend to compromise for him for £190. The accident, which occurred four or five years ago, was well known to many persons now in this room, and his losses in consequence of it were so great, that a subscription was set on foot to reimburse him, but he never received a farthing of charity in his life. The "Age" coach was repaired and painted on his own premises, and he paid £15 to Dr. Jackson, and about £35 to Mr. Turner, of Wycombe. He paid £20 for post horses, to convey the passengers (upon their recovery) to their respective homes, and he besides lost a cart-horse worth £50. The bankrupt said he had no documents, and therefore could not produce them. A gentleman here stepped forward, and said that he had been in the bankrupt's counting-house lately, and there saw his papers labelled for five or six years back. The bankrupt vehemently denied this, and added that he never had a paper labelled in his life.—The trade assignee observed, that about five months since the bankrupt had sold goods to the amount of nearly £300, and absconded from his creditors, and all his explanation relative to it was, that he had put it in his pocket, and that it was now all spent.—The bankrupt denied this; and, after some further conversation, the case was adjourned sine die, but with protection to the 8th of October next.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

SALFORD SESSIONS.

These sessions, which were adjourned on the 7th instant, in consequence of the annual general session being fixed for the following day, were this morning resumed at the New Bailey Court-house, in Salford, before the chairman, Mr. F. Foster, and several other magistrates, for the disposal of the remaining cases of riot which were yet to try. Several rioters were brought up, convicted, and sentenced to various periods of imprisonment, regulated by the part they took in the recent outrages.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

[Before the Recorder.]

The trial of Percival Hamilton Chamberlayne, George Fuller, Jane Sophia Matilda Fuller, and William Napier Reeve, for conspiracy to bring false charges of felony and misdemeanour against Thomas Alley Jones, adjourned from Monday, was resumed on Tuesday. The prosecutor was again placed in the witness box, to answer various questions by the Recorder, regarding the dates of his acquaintance with the several defendants, and also the dates of different transactions.—Mr. Charles Lawrence deposed that he was a medical student at St. George's Hospital, and resided with his father at Hammersmith. Witness knew the defendant. Was present when a conversation arose between Chamberlayne and Jones at witness's father's house. Chamberlayne told Jones that Mr. Blythe [illegible] wished to have out of Fuller's stock, in Regent-street, he [illegible] purchase at the sale, as he would give directions to Mr. Bingham to let [illegible] them, or if he chose to take them out at the [illegible] take them at cost price; and added, that the proceeds of the sales might be applied by Jones in reduction of the debt [illegible] Chamberlayne to Jones. Chamberlayne also added that, when [illegible] property, which he was then going to [illegible] he would give Mr. Jones £100 worth of plate, [illegible] best friend he had in the world. Witness also heard Chamberlayne direct Jones to go to the house in Regent-street, and pay the man in charge of the property (Hood) his wages and discharge him, first getting Hood to pack up whatever things were there which had been left for his accommodation, and requesting Mr. Jones to send them to his (Chamberlayne's) house by the carrier. In the evening of the same day witness saw the parties together again at his father's house. Mr. Jones took a snuffers and tray out of his pocket and handed them to Mr. Chamberlayne, saying that he had received them from Hood, at Fuller's house. Chamberlayne laughed at the idea of Mr. Jones having brought such paltry things in his pocket. Chamberlayne took the articles. Witness was present when the same parties met again in October, at his father's. Mr. Jones produced a list of articles which he had purchased at Fuller's. Mr. Chamberlayne said they were charged at too high a price, and reduced the charges opposite some of the articles. Amongst other things there was a marble slab, which Mrs. Chamberlayne wished to have. Shortly after that the parties were again assembled at Chamberlayne's, when the servant came into the room and said that her brother (whose name was Cooper) had brought some things which had been taken by mistake to Mr. Jones's. Mr. Chamberlayne then said he was glad he had got all his things back. Witness knew Mr. Reeve; he became acquainted with him in June. On the 9th of June Mr. Reeve called on witness at St. George's Hospital, and introduced himself. He asked if witness had been in Regent-street on Sunday the 12th of June, and took from Fuller's house some goods. Witness said, "No he never had been in Regent-street on a Sunday in his life." Mr. Reeve then asked if witness knew Thomas Alley Jones, to which he replied in the affirmative. Reeve then said that Jones was a scoundrel, a villain, and a thief; that he had nothing in his house worth thirty shillings, except what he had taken from the bankrupt Fuller. He said he knew Jones was not worth a shilling in the world, and added, "If you have not been in his house, my dear Mr. Lawrence, go and see for yourself. You will find in one cupboard a lot of miscellaneous property and other suspicious things, such as plated candlesticks, &c. I hope that you and your father will take care your sister does not marry such a scoundrel; but I will take care she shall not. for we are determined to transport him for stealing property from Fuller's creditors." Witness said that he must be mistaken, as he knew Mr. Jones to be a man of property, and it was only a day or two since he saw his banker's book, by which it appeared that he had lodged £3000 that year. Mr. Reeve said that it was all stuff. He would prove that it was no banker's book at all, but a mass of forgery. He added that Mr. Fuller was below stairs, and asked if he should call him up. Witness declined. He was examined before the Commissioners of Bankruptcy. He told Reeve he had made a note of the conversation; but as it was not very material to the case, he (witness) did not mention it to the commissioners. Shortly after that, on the 18th June, witness, when travelling in an omnibus near Hammersmith, met Reeve, who told him he had a warrant against Mr. Jones for felony. In the course of the same evening witness again saw Mr. Reeve with Chamberlayne and two constables, and about fifty people. They were opposite to witness's father's house. Mr. Reeve rang the bell, and inquired for Mr. Jones, who was not there. Mr. Reeve desired a policeman to take Mr. Jones's servant, who was in the crowd, into custody, but the policeman refused. Mr. Reeve, with the constables, remained about the place until a late hour of the night. Witness had been at Westminster-hall in the morning of that day, when Mr. Jones's action against Mr. Chamberlayne for £500 was to have been tried, but was postponed to the 23rd. On the following Monday morning, witness was at Kensington Police-court, and saw all the defendants there. Mr. Reeve acted as law-agent, and gave his evidence besides against Mr. Jones. Mr. Jones was then liberated on his own recognizances until the Wednesday following. The witness underwent severe cross-examination from Mr. Clarkson, but nothing material was elicited.—After the examination of other witnesses, the case for the prosecution closed.—Mr. George Fuller addressed the jury for his own defence, asserting that Mr. Lawrence and Mr. Jones had induced him to take the steps which had led to the bankruptcy; and that Mr. Jones, Miss Lawrence, and Mr. Charles Lawrence, had taken away, at various times, a large quantity of property from the house in Regent-street. But the defendant, being conscience-stricken, revealed the entire nature of the proceedings to his creditors, and thus it was that the criminal indictment had been laid against the prosecutor. [Some letters of Jones to Fuller were then put in.]—Mr. Phillips then addressed the jury for the defence of Mr. Chamberlayne.—On Mr. Clarkson rising to address the jury for Mr. Reeve, the Recorder suggested that there was not sufficient evidence against him.—The jury then acquitted Mr. Reeve. Mr. Balantyne called several witnesses to the characters of Mr. Chamberlayne and Mr. Fuller.—Mr. Bodkin replied.—The Recorder summed up the evidence, divesting the case of the several circumstances which had been introduced, and directing the attention of the jury to the mere facts of a charge of felony having been made and sworn to by Chamberlayne and Fuller, they having been fully aware that the articles which they swore were stolen by Jones had been removed by him under the direction of Chamberlayne, and actually delivered up to him.—The jury immediately returned a verdict of guilty against Chamberlayne and Fuller.—The Recorder said that the court would postpone judgment, in order to give the case the most careful consideration.

The court adjourned at a quarter past eleven o'clock, the case having occupied upwards of thirteen hours on Tuesday, and six on the day preceding.

THURSDAY.

(Before Mr. Justice Wightman and Mr. Justice Cresswell.)

POST-OFFICE FORGERY.—James Samuel Brown was indicted for forging, on the 24th August, eight money orders for £39 9s. 5d., with intent to defraud her Majesty's Postmaster General. There were three other indictments against the prisoner. He pleaded not guilty to them all. A case of decided insanity was proved, and the prisoner was sent to Bedlam for the rest of his life.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—On Tuesday a ticket-porter, named William Liscomb, who has borne a very good character for many years in the city, was charged upon suspicion of having been concerned with another in a transaction of a dangerous character. A man named Henry Hoskins had been brought before the Lord Mayor on Saturday, and accused by Mr. Palmer, of the private drawing-office in the Bank of England, of having sent a forged order by a porter for a check-book for Messrs. Deane and Hatton, extensive salesmen in Newgate-market. Mr. Palmer, finding that the writing on the order did not correspond with that to which the establishment were accustomed, detained and questioned the porter, who, after some hesitation, not at all reconcileable with what is called straight-forward business, stated that he had received the paper presented from Hoskins, who had been a porter to the Bank. The dangerous nature of the application, as a matter of course, caused some stir amongst the authorities in the Bank, and Mr. Freshfield, the solicitor to the establishment, proceeded to investigate it. Hoskins was apprehended, and charged with having sent for the check-book for the purpose of availing himself of the advantage which blank checks have so often presented to dishonest men. The wretched man, who, upon the preceding night, gave himself a severe wound in the throat in attempting to destroy himself, fell in a fit upon being charged, and was conveyed to the infirmary in Giltspur-street Compter, and the necessary directions were issued by the Lord Mayor, at the request of Mr. Freshfield, as to the future proceedings. The Lord Mayor said, the transaction required much deeper investigation, and desired to hear what Liscomb had to say.—Liscomb declined in the most solemn manner he was not aware that he had been employed in a suspicious affair, and appealed to the unexceptionable character which he had maintained for a great number of years in the city of London as proof that he could have had no dishonest purpose.—Mr. Hobler observed, that the ticket-porters were frequently entrusted with very large sums of money, and the society would, as a matter of course, enter into an investigation under their chairman, Sir Matthew Wood, for it was necessary that a ticket-porter should be above all suspicion.—Liscomb: The fact is, that I am not guilty. I told a lie. It was a lie without meaning, but I had no right to tell it. I am being forward several persons of the first respectability to speak of the excellence of my character. I never had a stain upon my name.—The Lord Mayor: You must leave your ticket with me, and you are bound over in the sum of £100 to appear here on Saturday next, when Hoskins will be brought up for examination.

WANDSWORTH. EXTENSIVE EXCISE SEIZURE AT A SUGAR-MAKER'S, AND CONVICTION FOR ILLICIT DISTILLING. Mr. Thomas Green, Mr. Young Green, his son, and Mr. Richard Wright, entered proprietors of a sugar-making manufactory, situated in Bolingbroke-row, Battersea, were summoned to appear at this court, to answer an excise information, which contained no less than six counts, charging them with offences against the excise laws.—The defendants failed to appear, but deputed Mr. Druce, a solicitor, and the clerk to an attorney, to defend them.—It was stated that the penalties that might be recoverable would amount, in the aggregate, to £600. The stock of machinery, &c., which had been seized on the premises and brought to the court, must have been worth a very considerable sum of money.—Robert Francis, the first witness sworn, said he was an excise-officer. He gave proof of the service of the summons, after which he proceeded to make the following statement: The defendants had, for some time past, carried on the business of sugar-makers, and, as such, they were entered by the Excise. The [illegible] to be in respect thereof; at all the times, when [illegible] was, as an excise officer, to enter defendant's premises, he [illegible] saw a quantity of liquor occasionally [illegible]. The materials and utensils found in the premises caused the witness to make a report thereof to Mr. M. Duncan, the supervisor, and on the 30th of May last, they went to the defendant's premises in Bolingbroke-row, Battersea. Witness rang at the gate, and a man named [illegible] defendant's answered it; he was accompanied by a [illegible] dog, from which the witness received a great deal of annoyance, as the dog also his superior officer. By the attack of the dog a very considerable delay took place, and it became necessary for the man to tie him up before they could enter the premises. Witness and the supervisor afterwards searched the house, and found in the cellar forty-five gallons of plain British spirits, or low wines, and in a small room on the ground floor, thirty-three gallons of the same materials. After the search had continued for some time for a still, they examined the steam boiler, and found it in every respect fitted up as a still; in it was a quantity of wash. An evaporating tub was found, nearly filled with water, and in its centre was placed an overflow-pipe, which was quite unnecessary in the manufacture of sugar. Defendants came on to the premises at this time. Mr. Wright said it was an experiment. Mr. T. Green said he was ruined; it was a last resource; and Mr. Young Green said they were driven to it. Mr. Wright afterwards said that Mr. Thomas Green suggested the experiment, and wished it to be tried; and Mr. T. Green, in reply, said it was Wright's fault. The three conjointly afterwards said the alteration in the sugar duties had ruined them.—The supervisor, after corroborating the previous witness, put in a letter signed by the whole of the defendants, stating, in effect, that all they were trying to manufacture was bottoms of British wines, which were 25 per cent. under proof.—Mr. Druce and the attorney's clerk admitted all the facts, but prayed for mercy for their clients, who by the seizure of their machinery had become ruined men.—The supervisor pressed only for one penalty, namely, £100, and that was inflicted by Mr. Paynter, the magistrate.

QUEEN-SQUARE.—CHARGE OF MURDER.—On Tuesday, James Kack, a tall powerful man, upwards of fifty years of age, was placed at the bar for re-examination, charged with having caused the death of his wife.—Prisoner and his wife lived at No. 38, Old Pye-street, Westminster; and, on the 14th inst., about five in the evening, the deceased went to the station-house, and complained to Inspector Barefoot that she had been much ill-used by her husband. At that time she had a black eye, and was bleeding from the lip and nostrils, and the inspector despatched a constable to apprehend her husband. The officer returned with the man in custody, and as the wife was walking to the station-house, to charge him, she dropped down dead. The defence set up was, that the prisoner and his wife had been out drinking all day, and on their return she became very violent, and rushed towards him with a knife, when he struck her with his fist in his own defence.—The evidence adduced not being of a conclusive character, Mr. Burrell said there was a great uncertainty as to the causes which produced death. It was evident the deceased was labouring under both strong excitement and partial intoxication. There was a want of all evidence in this case to show that the prisoner was even guilty of manslaughter; nor did he (the magistrate) think that even, morally considered, the prisoner could be accused of having caused the poor woman's death. Under these circumstances the prisoner was entitled to his discharge.

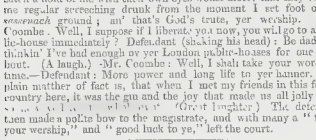
WORSHIP-STREET.—On Tuesday, Richard Boynett and Henry Castle, young men well known to the police, were charged with having taken a basket containing a quantity of linen, valued at £20, the property of Mr. Hannell, a diamond merchant, residing in Southampton-street, Bloomsbury-square. It appeared that on the preceding afternoon the property was delivered to the charge of a carrier, named Robinson, for the purpose of its being conveyed to the house of a laundress at Edmonton. The carrier quitting it proceeded in safety as far as Stoke Newington, but whilst passing through that place a witness named Judd, observed the prisoners following closely behind it, and soon afterwards they detached the basket from a chain, with which it was secured, and carried it off. An immediate pursuit took place, and after a short chase the prisoners were overtaken and given into custody. The basket was found in the road, the prisoners having dropped it in order to facilitate their flight.—The property was identified by Thomas Budd, the prosecutor's footman.—The prisoners, by the advice of Mr. Hunt, their solicitor, declined saying anything.—They were committed for trial.

KENSINGTON.—Mr. John Webber, of 26, Suffolk-street, Pall-mall East, has been committed to Newgate for trial for an outrage on a boy aged 14, named Dawler.

CLERKENWELL.—HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—Henry Morgan, who was remanded on Friday last, on a charge of robbing several ladies in the neighbourhood of Islington, was brought before Mr. Coombe on Tuesday.—Mrs. Smith, a widow lady, residing in Hemingsford-terrace, Islington, who deposed to having been stopped by the prisoner a few nights previously, in Amwell-street, with intention to rob her; and Miss Whelsby, of Doughty-street, who deposed that she was stopped by him, and that he threatened to murder her on the previous Tuesday night, in Shadwell-street, were both bound over to prosecute him at the ensuing sessions of the Old Bailey. Two policemen recognised the prisoner as having been an associate of Cooper, who was executed for the murder of the policeman Daly at Highbury. He has been, since Cooper's execution, prowling about the neighbourhoods of Islington and Pentonville, and numberless little robberies of servant girls and single ladies during the last three months are attributed to him. When asked by Mr. Coombe if he had anything to say why he should not be committed for trial? he replied that he robbed some ladies, but did not threaten to murder them. He was remanded until Saturday (this day), when two other ladies residing in the Lower-road, Pentonville, will tender information against him for robbing them, and he will be fully committed.

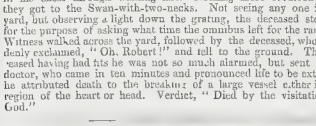
AN INCORRIGIBLE RUFFIAN.—Dennis Denny was charged with violently assaulting 63 G and two other constables. From the statement of the complainants, it appeared that between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock on the previous night, the prisoner was disturbing the peace in Gray's inn-lane, by swearing and shouting at the top of his voice. G 63 desired him to desist, but he became more vociferous. The constable then arrested him. He walked with him a little distance quietly, but in an unguarded moment felled the policeman to the ground, and kicked him most brutally. Two other constables heard the cries of their brother officer, and hastened to his assistance, but not before he had received a kick on the cap of the knee, from which he is quite lame. The struggle then fell on the two constables, one of their coats off his back, and gave the other a violent blow on the breast. So powerful and so obstinate was he, that it required eight men and the inspector to convey him to the station-house. Inspector Penny stated that he had received twelve months since the prisoner had broken the leg of one of the constables (Chink) of his division, and the fracture was of so compound a nature that Chink, who was an excellent officer, was rendered a cripple for life by it. He was, however, allowed a superannuated pension of ten shillings a week by the commissioners of police. The prisoner was tried at the Old Bailey for the offence, and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. He had not been more than a week from [illegible] when he perpetrated this assault. In all his experience he never met so sanguinary a ruffian as Mr. Coombe at first was going to send the case to the Old Bailey, but afterwards said he thought it better to try the effects of hard labour and the House of Correction for two months. The prisoner would hardly desist from assaulting the police until he killed one of them and was hanged for it.

AN IRISHMAN'S DEBUT IN LONDON.—A rather innocent-looking re-spectably-dressed young man, who gave his name Patrick Mulcahy, and who certainly appeared "neat as imported" from the isle of shillelah and shamrocks, was charged with being drunk and disorderly on the previous evening at an early hour. When placed at the bar the defendant appeared to be in a state of serious illness; but Waddington having informed the magistrate that the defendant was perfectly conscious of what was passing around him, Mr. Coombe decided upon going into the case. The police-constable deposed to the fact of finding the defendant in a state of utter helplessness in the kennel in Gray's-inn-road, "rowling," as the witness (who is an Irishman) waggishly stated, "for all the world as if he wur howldiug an be the ground to keep himself steady." (Great laughter.)—Mr. Coombe: What have you got to say for yourself?—Defendant (with an air of bewilderment very possibly assumed): O, yer worship, durle a know I know about the matther at all at all. How long have you been in London? Eight-and-forty hours, yer worship. Where did you come from? From the Cove of Cork, yer worship.—Mr. Coombe: Well, and what brought you here? Defendant (scratching his head and looking silly at the magistrate): Faith, to the best of my recollections, yer worship, I'm thinkin' it was the King William the Foorth. (A laugh.) Oh, but I mean what have you come to London for? Well, yer worship, my friends towld me that in regard of the larnin' I was able to fulfil any situchation that may offer itself for my acceptance. But for me own likins, I would rather prefer the situchation of a brick layer's clerk. A bricklayer's clerk! What is that? O, yer worship, in my country it's commonly called a hod-man; but it's the larnin', yer worship, that makes all the differ. (A laugh.)—You have been pretty sober since you arrived in London, I suppose? Oh, divle a bit of that, yer worship; for my friends here wor so glad to catch a hold of me with their own eyes wonst more, that they've med the regular screeching drunk from the moment I set foot on on sassenach ground; an' that's God's truth, yer worship. Mr. Coombe: Well, I suppose if I liberate you now, you will go to a public-house immediately? Defendant (shaking his head): Be dad, I'm thinkin' I've had enough ov yer London public-houses for one small bout. (A laugh.) Mr. Coombe: Well, I shall take your word this time.—Defendant: More power and long life to yer honner. The plain matther of fact is, that when I met my friends in this forrin' country here, it was the gin and the joy that made us all jolly; and [illegible] (Great laughter.) The defendant was made a present of his discharge.



SUSPECTED POISONING.—Mr. Payne held an inquest on Tuesday, which occupied several hours, at the Bridge-house Hotel, Borough-road, on the body of Joseph Bowdler, who was found to have died from the effects of arsenic. The deceased's wife stated that he became ill on Wednesday, after eating some apple-pudding, and remained ill till Saturday night, when he died. The coroner said it was a most mysterious case, as did the jury, and adjourned the inquest eventually till Monday.

AWFUL SUDDEN DEATH OF A GENTLEMAN.—An inquest was held on Tuesday evening before Mr. Payne, at the Swan-with-two-necks, Lad-lane, on the body of Mr. Richard Carbery, an independent gentleman, aged 65. Mr. Robert Carbery, the deceased's son, said that after an absence of fifteen years in India, he returned home to his father's house, in the Lambeth-road, about twelve days since. On Monday night the deceased supped with him at his lodging in Stamford-street, and they agreed to proceed into the country together on Tuesday morning. About half-past four the deceased called upon him, and they walked together to that hotel at rather a quick pace. On arriving near the Post-office, the deceased complained of a pain in his chest through walking fast. Nothing more occurred until they got to the Swan-with-two-necks. Not seeing any one in the yard, but observing a light down the grating, the deceased stooped for the purpose of asking what time the omnibus left for the railway. Witness walked across the yard, followed by the deceased, who suddenly exclaimed, "Oh, Robert!" and fell to the ground. The deceased had said he was not so much alarmed, but sent for a doctor, who came in ten minutes and pronounced life to be extinct; he attributed death to the breaking of a large vessel either in the region of the heart or head. Verdict, "Died by the visitation of God."



CORN EXCHANGE.—Since the date of our last report, the arrivals of English wheat up to Mark-lane have been somewhat on the increase, and of fair average quality, parties only as regards the Essex and Kent samples. As most of the millers have become well in stock, they have refused to purchase any description, except at lower rates, hence the demand has proved excessively heavy, and, in order to effect sales, it was necessary to submit to reductions of from 3s to 4s per quarter has been submitted to by the factors, and large quantities have remained unsold. Although the quantity of foreign wheat pressing on the market has not been so extensive as of late, so much waste has proved the sale for it, that the currencies are nominally quoted 2s to 3s per quarter cheaper. In barley scarcely any business has been done, but we can notice no alteration in the value of that article. Malt has moved off slowly. Good second oats have maintained their figures; but other kinds, as well as beans and peas, have had a downward tendency. Flour has fallen 1s to 2s, the top price now being 250s.

The Seed Markets.—We have had very little business passing in seeds this week, yet there is scarcely any variation to notice in the general currencies. The following are the present rates.—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 50s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 46s; hemp seed, 35s to 38s; per quarter, coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt, brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 6d to 6s 6d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 32l per last of ten quarters. PROVISIONS.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten Bread in the metropolis are from 7½d to 8d; of household ditto, 6d to 7d for the 4lb loaf.

Sugar.—The market for West India sugar has proved inactive, and the private sales have amounted to not more than 1300 hogsheads and tierces. At public sales 1000 bags yards Barbadoes have gone off at 63s to 68s 6d for middling to fine upright yellow. In Bengal a fair business has been done, and at auction 3800 bags went at full rates, low to good white fetching 64s to 66s, and brown 43s to 56s per cwt. Mauritius has sold freely—low to good yellow has fetched 38s 6d to 64s; and brown 32s 6d to 38s per cwt., with good arrivals. Foreign sugar is somewhat dearer. Standard lumps are 2s 6d to 3s.

Tea.—The public sales of tea this week, at which 22,456 packages have been offered, have been well attended; and out of the quantity brought forward nearly 3000 found buyers, at prices about equal to those previously quoted.

Coffee.—Some large public sales of this article have again taken place, at which the biddings have not been to any animated, and some of the parcels have been taken in. Ceylon has sold at 88s 6d to 115s for middling; 65s 6d to 87s 6d for good ordinary; 63s to 74s for fine ordinary; while Jamaica has gone off at 63s to 130s per cwt.

Cocoa.—The demand is limited for West India; and 400 bags Trinidad, at auction, went at rather lower rates; common, to good red, fetching 32s to 37s per cwt.

Rice.—A large quantity of rice has been brought to public sale this week, it having comprised nearly 13,000 bags, and prices have declined 3d to 6d per cwt.; middling to good white has sold at 11s 6d to 12s 6d.

Pepper.—Forty-nine bags of white offered at public sale were sold at 54d for middling.

Saltpetre.—At public sale, 437 boxes pearl, sold at 12s 6d to 21s per cwt.

Saltpetre.—There is not quite so much activity in this market, and a public sale of 1500 bags Calcutta went off at 6d per lb.

Linseed.—We already noticed a large business done, an advance of from 3s to 3s per cwt. There are free buyers of Irish butter, of fine quality, at the extreme quotations, and the best Carlow is worth 114s. Of bacon there is a good sale, at full prices; but interest is still very heavy. In other kinds of provisions we can notice little variation.

Tallow.—The market is dull for tallow, yet there is more business passing than last week. New tallow is 47s 6d to 47s 9d for delivery all the year.

Potatoes. The arrivals of potatoes are now rapidly increasing, yet the demand is tolerably steady, at from 40s to 60s per ton.

Wool. The public sales of wool have been concluded. On the whole, they have gone off tolerably well, and, in most instances, full prices have been obtained by the importers. The imports, this week, have consisted of nearly 2700 packages.

Hops.—Owing to the immense supply of new hops on sale in the Borough market, the demand is somewhat inactive. The duty is called £100,000. Picking has been already concluded in some of the forward districts. New Kent pockets are selling at 100s to 130s, Sussex do., 90s to 100s; and Farnhams, 130s to 200s per cwt.

Smithfield.—Our market has been extremely well supplied with stock since our last report, which has caused the demand to rule heavy, and the quotations have declined about 2d per 8lbs, for beef and mutton; the rates of lamb, veal, and pork remaining about stationary. Beef 3s 4d to 4s 4d; Mutton, 3s 6d to 4s 6d; Lamb, 4s 4d to 5s 10d; Veal, 3s 10s. to 4s 6d; and Pork, 4s to 4s 10d per 8lbs. by the carcass.

PRESTON GUILD.—All vestige of this guild, for another twenty years, passed away on Friday week, when a tradesmen's fancy and dress ball was held at the Guild-rooms in the Corn Exchange, and at which about four hundred persons attended. Although not so numerous as on the previous occasion, many of the dresses were very superb; and amongst the company were the Mayor and Mayoress, the Recorder and Town Clerk, Mr. Townley Parker, the late member for the county, and many of the leading gentry. The total sum received on the occasion of the guild was about £2500, and, after the payment of all expenses, there will remain a surplus of about £300, which will be devoted to the public charities of the town. A sum of £50 has been awarded to the different Catholic, and one of £65 to the Protestant schools, being in the proportion of about 3d. per head for each scholar, and a large sum will be given to the House of Recovery.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE LORD VIVIAN. The City of Limerick steamer entered our harbour on Monday last with her colours half-mast high, having the remains of Lord Vivian on board. ARREST ON THE DUKE OF BRUNSWICK ON SUSPICION OF BEING ONE OF THE SWELL MOB.—In the evening of Thursday week a dashingly-attired foreigner entered one of the hotels in the town of Preston, and called for a pint of wine, tendering a £5 Bank of England note in payment. The waiter having heard a description of the persons by whom the robbery of Mr. Marquis had been effected, fancied that the personal appearance of the strange guest tallied with that of one of the parties implicated in the theft; and this supposition was converted into almost absolute certainty when the foreigner threw from his purse a note of the Liverpool bank whose promissory obligations constituted the bulk of the stolen property. Fired with the supposed discovery, he communicated his suspicions to the proprietor of the hotel, who concurred in the probability of the supposition, and despatched a messenger in quest of a policeman, who was ushered into the room where the supposed "conveyancer" was luxuriously reclining on an ottoman, and humming snatches of an opera tune, when his privacy was thus rudely disturbed. The constable, without ceremony, marched up to the sofa, grasped its occupant by the collar, and, after stating the nature of the charge against him, blandly desired the favour of his company to the station-house. Words are wanting to describe the mingled air of rage and astonishment with which the "strange gentleman" received this intimation and its accompanying infringement of personal liberty. For some moments he seemed deprived of utterance, but at length his tongue resumed its office, when, in terms of indignation and disdain, he haughtily repelled the charge, declaring himself to be no less a personage than the Duke of Brunswick. This avowal, however, was disregarded by the policeman and his abettors, who considered it a mere artifice resorted to in the hope of overawing them; and, in spite of his earnest protest against such a proceeding, dragged him to the police-office, a distance of from four to five hundred yards, attended by crowds of persons following, attracted by the rumoured detection of one of the scoundrels by whom Mr. Marquis had been plundered. On arriving there, the stranger reiterated his former declaration, and in proof of his assertions referred to the owner of the mansion where he had taken up his stay, and also to several distinguished individuals whom he named. On inquiry, this statement proved correct, and his Serene Highness, after being literally overwhelmed with apologies, took his departure.—Lancaster Guardian. The above has since been contradicted; but if not the truth, it looks so very like it, that we give our readers the benefit of it.

SALE OF FOREIGN OXEN.—Thirty-nine oxen, which were landed at Falmouth on Wednesday se'nnight, from Corunna, were sold by auction in the rope-walk of Messrs. Carne, the importers, last Wednesday. None exceeded 700lbs. in weight, and the average was about 500lbs. They were all either cream or fawn colour, and about the head looked much like the buffalo. They were very deep in the shoulder, but thin in the hind quarter, and realised about £10 a head. The highest price given was £14 5s., and the lowest £6, being about 40s. per cwt.—Cornwall Advertiser.

BIRTHS EXTRAORDINARY. A Scotch paper states that the wife of John M'Neil, residing at New Muir, Balvaird, parish of Fearnitosh, was delivered, on the 10th inst., of three children, two females and one male. The wife of Mr. Henry White, bookseller, 350, Oxford-street, corner of Blenheim-steps, was safely delivered on Sunday night of three fine children, two girls and a boy, who, with their mother, are doing well.

LOSS OF A RUSSIAN MAN OF WAR.—A Russian ship of the line, a new 74, going from Archangel to the Baltic for her stores, was lost last Sunday week on the coast of Norway, off Christiansand, with about 400 men. The wind was a high northerly gale, off the land, and it is not known whether she sprang a leak or was out of her reckoning, but many reports, all unfavourable to the captain and officers, were in circulation at Gottenburg.

THE ARMY.—The Board of Ordnance have been pleased to notice "the field-train department" in their order to the officers of artillery for the income-tax; but they were forgotten by the Board in the naval and military inquiry, and neglected in the Ordnance regulation of the 10th April, 1841. The public ought to know these acts of injustice to men who have served their country twenty years in the late war.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. IX.

ALL SOULS' CHURCH, LANGHAM PLACE.

The improvements which originated in the regency of George the Fourth, and converted Swallow-street, with its filthy labyrinthine environs, into the most picturesque avenue of the metropolis, may be considered as the first step in the march of architectural embellishment which is now visible from the western entrance to Babylon the Great, at Hyde-park-corner, to the "far east," where sits the old lady of Threadneedle-street, rubbing her eyes and spectacles in astonishment at finding herself the heart and centre of a city of palaces.

> Where has commerce such a mart,
> So rich, so throng'd, so drain'd, and so supplied,
> As London—opulent, enlarg'd, and still > Increasing London? Babylon of old
> Not more the glory of the earth than she,
> A more accomplished world's chief glory now!

Writing in 1842, we may fearlessly affirm that, taking the improvements effected and in progress, the capital of the British empire contains a greater variety of grand and tasteful objects for graphic delineation than any other city in Europe. Nevertheless, except as adding to the general effect, our new churches, it must be confessed, do not exhibit favourable specimens of the architectural abilities of the nineteenth century. With one or two pleasing exceptions, they are certainly flat, jejune, incongruous, or grotesque, and serve but as foils to the edifices of Wren, Hawksmoor, and Gibbs. This may appear a sweeping censure, but its unpleasant truth few will dispute; yet, viewing them in conjunction with the which rose simultaneously with them on the site of pestilential alleys and squalid hovels, the spectator must be churlish indeed who would not overlook trifling defects where the amount of positive improvement is so large. But our business is now with the Church of All Souls, and to it we will devote ourselves.

> Stately streets, and squares that court the breeze,

Place yourself by our side, reader, as, standing at the south-eastern corner of Langham-place, we take a pleased survey of the singular originality of the church before us. Our position here, if the carriages of the ambassadors will permit it (for it is the last drawing-room of the season, and the wealth, the splendour, the chivalry, and the aristocracy of Europe are rolling towards the palace to pay homage to the beloved and bright Queen of the Isles) is of the best for seeing.

The circular peristyle of Mr. Nash's whimsical Ionic portico, the capitals of which are composed of cherubim, whose heads peer between the volutes with which their wings are intermingling, have a good effect from where we stand. True it is that they have been likened by a critic to owls displayed as trophies on the posts of a Dutch barn; nevertheless, they are original, and their effect is good—which is much to say of anything in these days of plagiarism. The circular tower within it, that pierces the soffit of the portico, is solid and effective, and where it rises above the crowning balustrade of the cornice into a circular stylobate to the bell-tower, it is really beautiful, both in form and proportion. And, now we have accustomed our eye to the daring novelty, we can look with complacency on the impaling spire, or spike, and at the whole tower, which come, with more wit than charity, have compared to a flat candlestick, surmounted by a thick candle, crowned with a little misfitting extinguisher.

We cannot always have elegancies on the model of the steeple of Bow or St. Bride's. Such objects, however commendable in themselves, would cloy and become offensive, if stuck all over an extensive city: we therefore hold it unfair to deny a large amount of credit to Mr. Nash for the bold originality of this singular tower and spire; really possessing much intrinsic beauty of form, and standing forth an ornament of no mean pretensions at the apparent terminus of a vista of elegant architectural detail—the boundary of the commercial portion of Regent-street.

Having inspected the tower, let us now turn to the body of the church. This is plain even to meagreness. It has a smooth-shaven, factory, or rather packing-case look, which gives one the idea of an elevation for the board-room of a committee of New Poor-law Guardians. It is of Portland-stone; and the best that Mr. Elmes, the laudator of Mr. Nash's doings in brick, stone, plaster, and stucco, could say for it, when lecturing on "Metropolitan Improvements," was, "that it seems rather designed for accommodation than ornament!" This is "damning with faint praise" with a vengeance. There is, however, one consolation—one mitigation of this architectural offence—namely, that from the angular recess in which the church stands, the body of the building is out of sight, in the best points of view for seeing the other parts of the structure and the surrounding erections. Its absolute want of harmony with the ornamented tower and porch is therefore less offensive to the judicious eye; unless the nakedness of its deformity come upon him from some other point of view.

The ground on which All Souls', Langham-place, stands, formed part of the site of Lord Foley's mansion, which, with several adjacent houses, was removed to complete this end of Regent-street. The church is situate at the angle where Portland-place may be said to commence, presenting a fine termination to the view from the end of the Quadrant, at Vigo-street.

The manufactory of Messrs. Marks, the coach-builders, on the south side of the church, would have been admired in the plain days of the Portman-square architects, even as a mansion, but it is now lost among the magnificence of the new metropolis in the nineteenth century. The façade to the fronts of the row of stables fronting the coachmaker's, is a skilful contrivance to conceal an obvious defect, and is creditable to Mr. Nash's taste; the little contiguous portico of Doric order to the front of the dead wall is a happy thought, and——. But we must not stand here, obstructing the way, and wasting a day in architectural criticism; see the sweep yonder splendid carriage, with the armed heyduke behind it, was compelled to make, to avoid macadamizing Langham-place with our bones! That is prince Esterhazy's; and contains diamonds enough to purchase an Austrian province. The crowd yonder is waiting to see the splendid cortège of the ambassador of the King of the French. The Spanish Ambassador is his near neighbour; while the representatives of Leopold and William of Holland, each in equipages of no small beauty, roll southward to pay their court to her who sits throned in the hearts of her subjects—the amiable, the lovely Queen of Britain. These men, in the council or the field, in bygone years, waged, with us, or with each other, wars of devastation and bloodshed; but now, thank Heaven, our only rivalry is in the arts of peace—in commerce, in literature, in the fine arts, in science, and in all the elegancies that adorn and dignify social and civilized man.

THE NEW FRENCH PROTESTANT CHURCH NEAR THE POST-OFFICE.—This church, which has lately been built as a substitute for the one which formerly stood in Threadneedle-street, on the site now occupied by Mr. Moxhay's new building (of which a view was given in our journal) is now nearly completed, and will be opened for public service in the course of next month. It is built under the powers of the charter granted by King Edward VI., in the 16th century, to the French Protestant Consistoire, and which, amongst other things, commends the order to the care and protection of the Archbishops and Bishops of this realm. The cost incurred in its erection, including site, is estimated at between £7000 and £8000, which has partly been defrayed out of the funds at the disposal of the order for supporting their aged members, and partly out of the compensation made them by the City authorities on the removal of the old church in Threadneedle-street. It is built in the florid Gothic style, by Mr. J. W. Higgins, the architect, from designs by Mr. T. Owen, of Portsmouth. Two French divines, M. Martin and another, have been appointed to officiate by the Consistoire, in whom the patronage is vested.

LAMBETH.—The number of persons applying for relief and lodging at Lambeth workhouse has so increased lately, that the five beadles are ordered to be on duty throughout the night, to prevent disturbances, and peremptory orders have been given to admit no one who does not belong to the parish. On one night as many windows were broken as will cost £5 to replace.

ADVANCE OF IRON.—We have seen two letters to a merchant in this city, one dated London, the 1st instant, and announcing an advance of 10s. per ton upon bars, rods, hoops, sheets, &c. The other letter, dated September 7th, and announcing a further advance of 10s., being a total advance of £1 per ton.—York Herald.

SINGULAR PROFILE OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—A correspondent of the Greenock Advertiser, in a letter complaining of the present broken dilapidated state of the flag-staff on Dunbarton Castle, adds:—"In reference to this far famed rock, I may inform your readers that a very singular phenomenon may be seen on this ancient fort, viz., a profile of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, which is allowed to be an excellent one, formed by the natural structure of the rock, and may be seen in going out or coming into the river Leven, by passengers on board the Dunbarton steamers, when betwixt Leven Perch and the Castle, on the west side of the rock, looking towards Greenock; any of the captains or pilots of the Dunbarton steamers will point it out, and it has only to be seen to be admired."

HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT LANDING AT GRANTON PIER.

Our journal is this week full of interesting details and illustrations of the recent royal tour, and, although the necessities of the non-coincidence in time, as well as circumstance, between literature and art have obliged us to place some of our engravings out of the regular routine of her Majesty's journey, yet it has been well remarked to us by a loyal and intelligent correspondent, that such has been the enterprise of this journal with regard to the number and finish of these beautiful embellishments, that, although some of them may be out of order, there can none of them be out of place. When, therefore, we cannot maintain the mere regularity of our design, we are content, as in the present instance, to sacrifice a point of precedence to completeness of illustration; and we would not withhold from our readers so spirited a cut as is here given of the Queen's landing at Granton Pier, merely because our artist could not, in the course of events, produce it until the return of the Sovereign to this country. Although, however, it was one of the beginning events of the tour, it makes an admirable finish to our general embellishments, and is no small acquisition to the last page of the present gorgeous number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

OUR RELATIONS WITH AMERICA.

The relations of this country with the United States have assumed an aspect that cannot be regarded otherwise than with gratification by every lover of peace. The horizon is fairly cleared, and the sunshine of friendship and goodwill is already shedding its warm and gentle influences upon the hearts of both nations. Their hands are joined, and the grasp of cordiality is given with an earnestness and sincerity which it would be almost dishonourable to doubt. There is, however, a portion of the press cavilling not only at the nature of the secured tranquillity, but over all the items of the friendly treaty by which it has been consummated; and the malice of party, in its effort to disturb the public mind, has spat so much of venomous misrepresentation in the face of society, that it is almost incumbent upon the honest public journalist to put the question before his readers in a true and intelligent light.

One of the most important features of the news of the week in the daily papers has been the publication of an elaborate report of a banquet given by the citizens of New York in honour of Lord Ashburton, our English plenipotentiary to the United States. At this banquet were elicited from persons of influence and authority in the American city the strongest expressions of regard for the people of this country, the warmest rejoicings over the prospects of an enduring alliance with us, the most fervent aspirations for lasting concord, and the most gratulating compliments to Lord Ashburton upon the success with which his mission had been accomplished—a success which they very properly declared to be honourable and advantageous to both the high contracting powers, and in its spirit conciliatory without humiliation—a triumph of peace without a sacrifice of justice. And so it is, in spite of the ravings of men who, because they hate the party that has achieved it, have not the integrity to bestow their approval upon the act itself. It is of no avail that benefits which may almost become blessings are prominent among its results; it is of no avail that it is the firm and stringent bandage to a wound which it has now closed for ever; it is of no avail that, in confirming it, we are kissing the hands of commerce and folding the wings of war; it is of no avail, in a word, that a permanent good is done to two great nations; none of these considerations serve to satisfy the unnatural rancour of these rabid politicians, who forget truth, patriotism, and generosity in the rage of opposition, and yet, in the matter of their invective, are not less silly than unjust. Nobody shall accuse us rightfully of being either Whig or Tory, or of giving to any party a support that shall not be in every instance qualified by our sense or knowledge of what is right. We oppose the Income Tax on the ground of its injustice, the Poor Law for its cruelty, and every other act of domestic policy on the part of the Government in which we discover a sacrifice of principle or a single germ of what is unvirtuous and wrong. But we cannot be lured into the hue and cry of party upon such a question as we are now discussing. We will not consent to prostitute even the humble intellect which God has given us for the mere purpose of slurring a treaty or baffling a minister. We will not, in a word, for considerations of policy cast shame where we feel honour to be due; and it is only a source of humiliation to us to find that there exist public writers who will. Among these the Morning Chronicle has taken the lead, and in a series of articles, of which, although perverted into falsehood, the information is well derived, has opened all the annoying points of the boundary question, and discussed its settlement with a malignity of design which has for its animating purpose the fixing of cowardice and dishonour upon the English name. There are two or three crawling Sunday journals that have also followed in its wake, but as they are of that class which can only circulate without influence, abuse without talent, and report without truth, we need not condescend to name them in the category with the daily champion of the anti-ministerial press. We are not going into an argument with the Chronicle upon the abstract Boundary Question, but only to vindicate the extreme value of its settlement. For the purpose of obtaining that settlement we have ceded a certain portion of wild territory which we might have claimed, and admitted a geographical position which we might have resisted; and for this cession, and for this admission, we have (besides having in our turn something ceded and admitted too) closed the avenue to a war, opened sources of commerce, and quenched a dangerous spirit of hostility upon our Canadian frontier, which was fostering rebellious predilection among the subjects of the English crown. About the acres of territory squabbled we do not believe there is one man in England who cares a doit; and, if the truth is told, perhaps not one in America either; they were only held to be important in the event of certain political contingencies which the settlement of their dispute has almost rendered impossible to arise; and as for the navigation, or portal navigation, of the St John's River, the Americans are welcome to it in peace, and we should like to know how they would manage it in war. It is unquestionable that the great object of British diplomacy was not the amount of territory, or the nicety of the line of demarcation, but the final settlement of the whole dispute. That it has remained so long unsettled was the great reproach of Lord Palmerston by diplomatists of all ranks during his administration. It was held that the Foreign Secretary was bound to see it brought to a termination, and shame and blame were cast vehemently upon him for neglecting the opportunity when the King of Holland made his award. There was always impolicy in keeping open a dispute which left at any time to another power the choice of a war—which left it in fact to pick its own war—when it might best suit its own purpose, and be most destructive to the strength and interests of Great Britain. This was never more felt than when our Canadas were in rebellion, and when the course of our Eastern policy was doubtful, and it was uncertain, both upon French and Turkish questions, how soon we might be plunged into an European war. America could then have taken advantage of the general dilemma, and aided it by a war of her own, plucked at a moment's notice out of the Boundary dispute. But civilization has now progressed too far for nations to make war upon each other without strong pretext or reason; and from America, by the Ashburton treaty, both pretext and reason are emphatically taken away. Under any circumstances we should not be alarmed at the consequences of any war in which we might find our country justly engaged; but there are times when the advocates of the peace of the world are most properly honoured; and we hold it to be a crime in any minister who permits any road to national commotion to remain open, or any natural avenue to the temple of Concord to be closed, so long as he can control the chances of the one, and ensure the foundation of the other.
